Industrial problems: What to do with the new manufacturing capacity we are creating?

Labor problems: Where to find jobs for the men we are training for the production of wartime materials?

Political problems: Who is to own and operate the plants that the Government is building or paying for in one form or another?

Financial problems: What to do about the Federal debt incurred by necessarily huge spending for defense?

Monetary problems: What about the gold base when we own most of the gold in the world?

All these and many more will present staggering difficulties.

Distinguished from these future problems are the day-to-day overwhelming difficulties which present themselves to the men now working on the defense program. How and where to manufacture sufficient aluminum and magnesium; how and where to obtain adequate supplies of power; how to allot shipping space and priorities for all materials and products? Such problems alone are enough to tax the men who are engaged in the immediate and urgent task of arming the Nation. The others—more complex and long range—are those for which these men have little time. Moreover, the men who are working directly with the defense program have one and only one supreme task—to get the required equipment produced in the least possible time. We should not ask them to be concerned about the long-term implications of how they get it. What then must we do? Let me repeat to you what I said in a speech last December.

"It seems to me essential that we immediately create a small group of the ablest men in the country who would be charged with studying these long-range problems and working out solutions in advance. They ought to be set off in a corner by themselves, instructed to forget all about the immediate problems of procuring war matériel, except as it affects the future national economy. They should set to work now on the preparation of an industrial demobilization plan. Nations have spent decades preparing plans for the conversion of a peacetime economy to a wartime economy. So far as I know, nobody has seriously undertaken the preparation of plans for the opposite process—converting a wartime economy back to a peacetime economy. That might involve the discovery and development of new processes and new products for civilian consumption that could be manufactured on the same machines that now are turning out or preparing to turn out products that are useless in times of peace; plans for the absorption of our newly trained labor in peaceful pursuits; the fundamental policies of foreign trade in a world that will be vastly different from that with which we have ever dealt before.

"This group would need to employ inventors and research scientists, trade experts, and fiscal experts, men of practical knowledge and great vision. They should devote their entire time to the formulation of the best plans that could be evolved for the utilization of our entire resources for the improvement of our standard of living, for the protection of our national economy from the repercussions not of war but of peace, for the conversion of the processes of economic waste to the processes of economic usefulness.

"It is immensely important that we try * * * to make out at least the type and possible shape of the problems we shall meet face to face in the future. And when we discover that these problems will be many and varied and of tremendous significance to our future well-being, then we must meet the next challenge of duty, which is to undertake immediately the formulation of plans for their solution. This was entirely ignored during the World War, and we have not yet rid ourselves of some of the problems that might have been solved before the war was over, if we had had the foresight to do it. In the meantime a new war has come along that will create changes of far greater importance. The men who are devoting their time and efforts to the solution of our armament problem have no time for worrying about the disarmament problem. If we wait until the end of the war, it will be too late.

"There is, in Washington and elsewhere, a general recognition of the importance of planning for post-war adjustments. But as far as I am aware, there is no coordinated thinking along these lines, no organized group with this specific directive. I think that there should be, and I hope to see it accomplished in the near future, for there is no time to waste."

I am of the same mind now as I was then. Since I spoke last December some groups have been studying the problem. The Business Advisory Council of the Department of Commerce, the National Planning Association, and the National Resources Planning Board have all, among others, been at work on initial discussions. But more than that must be done. I sincerely believe that if we tackle this problem of post-war demobilization of industry and manpower with an energy comparable to that which we are now devoting to the opposite process, we can build an economy and a standard of living the like of which the world has never dreamed. We can, in that process, lay the ground-work for an industrial system that will have as its only limits the limits of available manpower for production. This system would be based on a price structure designed to reach a vast reservoir of potential consumers that have in the past only been able to afford the basic necessities of life.

I do not want to bore you with my own philosophy, but it is because of certain beliefs that I hold that I am so strongly in favor of the sort of thing the two resolutions before you propose to do. I have a great and abiding faith in the rightness and the potential good inherent in democracy and in private enterprise. I also have a strong conviction that the dynamics of this system must be consciously planned, directed, and harnessed so that it grows, progresses, and improves. It can neither remain motionless nor be permitted to drift aimlessly. If either of these things happens, our system will be supplanted by something else—something more violent, more restrictive, more suppressive than any of us would like to see.

In other words, I think we should not only be making plans for the demobilization of a wartime economy but also planning for the mobilization of all our resources—human and material—for better living in a world at peace. If I may borrow a phrase from Henri Bergson, it is time "to think as men of action and to act as men of thought."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAMILTON FISH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. KARL STEFAN, OF NEBRASKA

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by my distinguished and able colleague, Mr. STEFAN, of Nebraska. No Member of Congress has been more outspoken and consistent in his efforts to keep America out of European and Asiatic wars.

Fellow citizens, we are almost midway between Flag Day, which is past, and the Fourth of July, which is to come. We are in the midst of this marvelous shelterbelt of trees. Someone has so well said: "Only God can make a tree."

I want to talk to you today about what these trees mean to all of us here in our own State of Nebraska, and in every section which will be touched or influenced by this great project. Before I talk to you about these trees, however, I want to talk to you about the question of war, which I know keeps you awake nights as it has kept me awake nights, pondering, wondering, yearning, praying to know what to do. This is a time, my fellow citizens, when we all are torn between our emotional impulses on the one hand, and our logical conclusions on the other. This is a time that rends society if we are not careful. This is a time that divides the sentiments of men; that ruptures friendships between men; that may even divide families. That must not happen in the United States of America.

You know—many, if not most of you here today know—what it meant for you or your forefathers to pull up by the very roots of their heartstrings their love and associations in their native land and come to what, to them, was far away America, their land of opportunity.

Let us be frank with one another here today. Your forebears and my forebears wrenched loose from all they loved on their native soil and came to the shores of the North American Continent and trekked their way across hill, dale, and plain because they wanted to get away from the hatreds and the jealousies and the conflicts and the fears of Europe.

Because I want to talk to you heart to heart, man to man, let me clarify our feelings in this matter at once. We want to stay as free as possible—and when I say "we," I mean you folks and me and all American citizens—we want to stay as free as possible from any foreign entanglement of any kind. We want to stay as far as possible away from the aggressions or the effects of agressions by dictators. We want to maintain and perpetuate free constitutional government in these United States of America. We have a stake in that free constitutional government. We have a stake—not only a material stake of soil and homes but a cultural and spiritual stake—in the Bill of Rights. We have a stake in the biparty system of government, which guarantees that you and your views, be you majority or minority, will be treated with respect and consideration by your Government, by your Congress.

We have a stake in the protection and perpetuation of personal liberty in this Nation because every one of you here today knows that only in personal liberty, only in economic as well as religious freedom, only in equality of opportunity, can there be found those things which make of human life and experience something beautiful and worth while instead of an insane nightmare of horror and suffering.

You and I have a stake, my fellow citizens, in the protection and perpetuation of our system of government, of our system of enterprise, of our system of education, of our system of religious instruction that in a hundred and fifty years have given to America not only the richest, most powerful Nation in the world, but has given to us as a people the highest living levels, the best working conditions, the highest wages, the greatest amount of creature comforts and luxuries, the greatest opportunity for education and spiritual and cultural advancement ever achieved by any people since the history of man emerged from the dim mists of tradition and dawned into written chronicles.

We need, we must have, and we will have a national defense that will be invincible against the assaults of any nation or group of nations which might at any time in the future consider assaults against us—a national defense so invincible that no groups of nations would even consider trying to come across 3,000 miles or 7,000 miles of stormy seas to disturb us in our peaceful way of life.

I want here, today, to say to you that I refute and deny with every ounce of energy in my being the assertion that dictator-driven slaves are the masters of freemen or ever will be the masters of freemen. I want to say to you here today that with our unequaled capacity for mass production, America, given that unity of purpose, given the spiritual unity which necessarily must be behind unity of effort, can outbuild the world in the luxuries of peacetime or the armaments of war.

I want to remind you and to cheer your hearts today by saying to you that our geographical location on the globe is, of itself, almost as great protection to us as armies and navies. Given an adequate army and a two-ocean navy, in addition, our position will be impregnable.

My fellow citizens, America has been the beneficent and hospitable haven of people from every country in the world. Men and women of every race have found sanctuary and opportunity in this great, wonderful, free Nation of ours. America has been the great melting pot. What do we mean by that term "melting pot"? We mean, my friends, that under the benign influences of a free government, of a free economy, of free enterprise, free speech, free press, free religion, and free politics, men of different races and different tongues have learned to modulate and to adjust their suspicions, their hatreds and even their desires, so that here in this great free land, each man, each woman, each child, can have equality of opportunity.

In God's name, let us respond to those benign influences now. Let those of us of different races and different tongues remember that first and foremost we are Americans of America. Let us remember that first and foremost, while we want to see freedom from oppression reestablished everywhere in the world, we want to make certain that it will not disappear here at home. While we want to help every other country in the world in whatever way we may, to have freedom from want, let us be certain that we eliminate want here at home. There is no tenet of religion or of charity or of generosity that says that we must deny our own to provide for others. Share? Yes; but not to pauperize our own to enrich others. Not to starve our own to feed others.

Our national defense, my friends, must be built as quickly and as efficiently and as economically as an unequaled American ingenuity and capacity to produce can build. We must practice the most rigid self-denial. We must save every possible penny in every department and operation of the Government, because at best the burden of taxation that will be made necessary by the national defense will bear with galling heaviness upon our backs as we work in our Nebraska fields. Many an acre of corn, many a thousand head of hogs, must be produced out of the labor and out of the sweat and the sacrifices of all of us in order that we do not pass on to our posterity, to your children and mine, a burden of debt so great that they will be overwhelmed by a sense of futility and despair.

The countries of Europe must be free again. They will be free again. But we must never lose sight of the fact that our first duty is to keep America free. We must recall what Washington and Jefferson and Lincoln and so many others have told us over and over again—that if ever the torch of liberty and free government flickers out on the continent of North America the hope of the world is gone for a thousand years.

We are all grieved by this madness of war. We are all grieved and worried by the stresses and the strains and the unspoken embarrassments which come to us as we meet and talk with our fellow Americans of races different than our own. Let me urge you, today, to forget everything else but that you are Americans, soldiers of the common good here in a great country of riches and opportunity, soldiers under the torch of liberty and the cross of Christianity, soldiers of the lost horizon to maintain in this world, enshrouded as it is in the ruddy clouds of war, Shangri La, the last repository of the highest ideals of man to be kept inviolate and unimpaired and passed on to those who are to come after us.

Oh, if I had a thousand tongues that I might make you realize the more, that you, the landowners, the soil-loving Americans, are the last great hope of a free America.

We have seen groups led astray by leaders who were self-seeking and greedy for power and profit. We have all been alarmed and made anxious by the interferences in the national defense which have been allowed to go to inexcusable lengths. We have all been worried by the constant encroachment of demands for more wages for work in which there was less pride of accomplishment and integrity of effort. All of these internal problems, not the least of which are those which constitute what we commonly term the farm problem, must be solved. These problems have, for the time being, been obscured by the hysteria of war and the haste of national defense. They have been aggravated rather than relieved by the war.

I am not making any appeal to either sectional or group consciousness when I say that as in times past so again will the American farmers prove the salvation of the Nation. Whatever may be the results of the wars in Europe and the Orient; whatever may be the reactions upon our social and economic structure, the foundations of free enterprise, the foundations of the very Bill of Rights itself, will still be rooted in the soil. Regardless of how misguided man may desecrate the world and disrupt human society, we still can and we must go back to the generous breast of Mother Nature for our sustenance and our hope.

That is why, today, this shelterbelt of trees seems to mean so much more to me than it ever has before. We planted this shelterbelt not so much for ourselves as for our posterity. Everything that pertains to farming in America today is being pointed toward a faithful stewardship by us, the faithful discharge by us as trustee of that which is rightfully ours for our lifetime and which must be passed on, not exhausted, not depleted, to our children and our children's children.

As I said a moment ago, we are conserving the soil. We are planting these trees for posterity as well as for ourselves. We all hope and pray that wars may cease; that just peace may be established; that subjugated peoples may be freed again; that leaders so lustful for power that they are willing to wreck civilization may be curbed or reformed. And so, too, do we all pray that the sons of America shall never again have to cross the seas to shed their blood in foreign lands.

If an unhappy turn of events should result in our beloved country becoming involved in armed conflict, then, of course, as American citizens, it would be both our duty and our impulse to render to our Nation every help within our power to come out of such a conflict victorious. Pray God that we may not be involved in armed conflict. Pray God that we may have the opportunity to work out our future in peace. But, should we become involved in a conflict of arms, I know that the love of America will, without hesitation, impel every one of us to perform our patriotic duty.

It is so refreshing to be back home again. Each time I come back to Nebraska, I realize more clearly that in the crowded marts of the eastern cities, that in the smoke-filled atmosphere of the factories, dangerous philosophies of collectivism, of absolutism, of totalitarianism, take root and infect the Washington atmosphere. But when I get back home to Nebraska and look into the clear eyes and honest faces of my own people and feel the firm, honest grip of hands that till the soil, I realize anew that no philosophy of despotism or absolutism, or totalitarianism, or collectivism, will ever eat out the vitals of this free people because the people of the soil and those who breathe the free air of our plains simply can't be fooled that way.

Now, my good friends, I hope I have crystallized in the last few minutes all of our hopes, all of our yearnings to stay out of war, to help the rest of the world in a peaceful way.

Before I pass on to the subject of these marvelous trees, let me say one thing to you and that is, we must ever be vigilant that under the pretense of war, under the pretense of carrying freedom to other peoples throughout the world, we do not give up our free way of life and government at home.

Always, when I return home, I cannot help but think of how fortunate it was, even though partly a matter of chance, that this whole Great Plains region was included in the Louisiana Purchase. It was a matter of chance, at least in part, because the United States intended to purchase only a port at New Orleans, and because Napoleon had his hands full with the English and was in no position to fight for this vast French territory in the New World, and because he needed money badly, this great, rich area was included in the deal. In fact, he would sell the port only if the United States also took the rest of the French possessions. It is idle to speculate what the destiny of this country would have been had we not acquired this rich agricultural land. Certainly it has been, with its tremendous productiveness and its millions of virile people, a vital factor in the making of this Nation, the most powerful nation on this earth.

This great region, one of the finest parts of which is right here in northeastern Nebraska, has become one of the great food-producing regions of our country. It is generally known as the bread basket of the Nation. Its settlement gave impetus to the development of great industries affecting the economic life of the whole Nation. Its products supplied the railroads with the business, for which they stretched into the Plains and on westward; the building of homes for our people provided great markets for lumber and other necessities; the barbed-wire and windmill business developed because people in the Plains needed wire and windmills. Its large farms and great grain fields created the necessity for and resulted in the development of a vast industry producing farm machinery of all kinds. Its corn provided feed for fattening its own livestock and those from ranges farther west.

I could recall more to you, but that is sufficient to illustrate how important these Plains, which we all love as our homeland, are, not only in production of food but in our whole national economy. Just as they were so important in the building of a strong national economy, so are they important in retaining it.

I am glad with you that this year you are receiving again an abundant rainfall. Those who know these plains and know of the drought which prevailed for the past 10 years must think deeply of the courage and the fortitude of you people who have had to contend with such great hardships. There are many who, through no fault of their own, were unable to stay here, and they moved out. In fact, this is the only region in the United States in w ich county after county lost 10 percent or more of its population during the past decade. This is unfortunate. To many of these people it was tragedy.

I have studied this situation, and I have worried about it. So long as we use these lands, so long as we keep our homes here, we will have to contend with drought, dry winds and blizzards, hail and other things, all of which directly affect our livelihood and our security and happiness. I do not believe that this region is growing steadily drier and more droughty. Those who have studied this question scientifically tell me that there is nothing to show that such is true. The best information I can get shows that we will continue to have wet years and wet periods and dry years and dry periods. If this is true, we must think of this country in those terms and prepare to manage our land and our business in such a way as to minimize the effects of the droughts and enable us to stay on the land and in the towns during times of drought. After all, we have farmed these plains for a comparatively short time, measured by the age of European farming countries.

The first of all homestead patents was issued in Nebraska in 1869. That was only 72 years ago. But much has happened in that short time. Drought and wind and water have taken their toll in fertility of the land. Many of our farms are not capable of producing as they have in the past. Farmers and rural people need many things. They need adequate credit at reasonable cost, they need equitable taxation, good rural roads, good schools, and other public facilities. But as a bedrock support for all these things, there is the necessity to perpetuate a profitable agricultural industry based upon a good sound system of land management that will keep the soil productive for all time to come.

The lessons learned during the past period of drought and wind should not be forgotten when better rainfall years are here. Rather than that we should all be working hard during the good years to put our management of the land on such a sound basis that the periods of drought may not have such disastrous effects.

It is a wonderful inspiration to me, that in spite of the hardships and difficulties you people have undergone in the past few years, in spite of a world torn by war, in spite of all the uncertainties of the future the people of 21 towns in northeastern Nebraska can come together to celebrate and stimulate the planting of trees.

Tree planting both for beautification and for conservation is something very close to my heart. I traveled, as you know, in Europe in 1939 to see and learn what they were doing over there that might be of benefit to us out here. I was struck by the way they have used trees. Wherever I went in those lands which have been farmed for centuries I found trees. And how those trees are cherished, protected, and used. Permission must be obtained to cut a tree, and when one is cut it is used down to the smallest twig. I want to see this tree planting in this country go on and on until our fields, our homes and buildings, our schools and playgrounds, our roads, churches, and cemeteries are beautified and protected by trees and shelterbelts.

Some people think it is strange that we want to plant trees in Nebraska. Some people probably think that I am queer some way because I have worked so hard to keep this tree-planting work going. They don't understand us and they do not understand our need for trees for the spiritual and the material benefits trees bestow in a plains country. And when I think of trees I think of those grand men who had the faith in tree planting that has made Nebraska known as the Tree Planters' State: J. Sterling Morton, who gave us Arbor Day; Dr. Bessey, who envisaged and who initiated the Nebraska National Forest in the sand hills; and I think of Dr. George E. Condra, who has encouraged and aided tree planting in all its aspects in this great State.

I think of the vision of that great forester, Dr. B. E. Fernow, who, away back in 1890—and that, my friends, is 52 years ago—said, "I believe that forest planting is one of the necessary requisites to reclaiming this vast domain. I believe that afforesting this large area deforested by fire and buffaloes and consequent desiccation, is not impossible, but I also believe that success can be attained only by cooperation, by strong hands working together upon a comprehensive plan on a large scale systematically but methodically carried out by commanding knowledge, means, and power such as government only, be it State or general, can command." And, too, I think with reverence of those intrepid pioneers who brought to this State in their covered wagons the first seedlings planted here, and who amidst hardship and danger still found time to dig and plant the wilding cottonwoods and cedars found along the stream courses, and who under the Timber Culture Act left many of the fine groves we have today.

These people, ancestors of many of you who are gathered here today, came from timbered regions. They knew the value of trees; they worked hard to put them here. Much of their effort resulted in failure because they did not know what trees to plant and how to plant and care for them.

A great deal of study has been given to tree planting out here since those early days. The State experiment stations, State forestry agencies, the Bureau of Plant Industry, and the Forest Service have developed a lot of sound scientific knowledge and have gained much experience in tree planting, which is resulting in much more successful work. The old idea that a tree would last forever is being rapidly replaced by the knowledge that trees have a definite span of life just as does a human being. The length of the life span varies according to the conditions under which the trees live. Eventually, however, trees grow old, become diseased, and die. We must all recognize that if we are going to have trees we must plant some new ones each year not only to replace the ones that die but to increase the trees we have now. The planting of new trees must go on year after year.

In my judgment this tree-planting work is one of the essential things that must be done to obtain the full development of our agriculture and the general improvement of living conditions. We need the trees which protect our homes, our land, our crops, and our livestock. We need the shelter which trees afford to our game birds and other wildlife. We need these trees which give us cooling shade in summer, fuel and warmth in winter, and which beautify our landscape. Trees which in their own and no other way will help us to do the thing which I have spoken of before; that is, to make of these plains a permanent and prosperous homeland.

I like to think of what Lydich has done with trees on his farm. As a young man stricken with asthma, the doctor tcld him he would have to move to the mountains among the pines and spruces and mountain breezes. But he didn't move there. He liked Nebraska and his farm and his neighbors too well to do that. Instead he brought the pines and the spruces to his farm. They are a beautiful sight, and many of you have seen them. Would he give them up? I think not.

Many of you here have seen the Earl Lewis, the Duhacek, and the Martischang farms, and how these good farmers have protected the land from blowing by planting shelterbelts; there are many others who have done the same thing. These trees have cost many hours of real effort; they have caused a lot of sweat, but I believe these good men would say they have been worth every bit of it in the protection they have given, and I think their good wives would say the same.

I commend the efforts of the State extension service and the Forest Service in the distribution and planting of millions of trees and fine shelterbelts in this area during the past several years, and I want to commend the farmers who have cooperated so willingly in this great work. After all, the big job of cultivating and caring for the trees after they are planted is the biggest and most important job. No work of this kind could be successful without the unstinting help of you farmers.

The Union Now Movement

REMARKS
HON. ANTON J. JOHNSON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am greatly concerned over the Union Now movement, reliably reported to be gaining support in governmental circles here and the British Isles.

I am strongly opposed to this country ever becoming a part of the British Empire.

I am certain the plan is unsound, for it is based on force.

There are strong indications when World War No. 2 ends an effort will be made to form what might be called a United States of Europe.

This merger of interests and resources would tend to increase trade between the have and have-not nations and produce prosperous conditions throughout continental Europe. Standards of living would rise and greatly reduce the possibilities of future wars for commercial advantages.

Certain international trade interests in this country and the British Isles foresee this eventuality and they do not like it. Therefore they propose to create a bigger and stronger merger of nations—the United States and Great Britain—for continued domination of world trade.

However, I am in complete sympathy with the idea of close and friendly relations among all English-speaking peoples. I likewise want to see this country enjoy the same good-will relations with all other peoples.

Hitler sold the war to his people on lavish promises of regaining lost trade advantages, and unless steps are taken now to remedy a basic condition, a more equitable division of international trade, the end of this war will settle nothing. It will only sow the seeds for future wars.

And I do not want to see this country voluntarily go into a deal whereby we shall become a party to the suppression of trade possibilities for small nations, and that is what the Union Now advocates contemplate.

I include as a part of my remarks the following editorial from the Moline (Ill.) Dispatch of June 4, 1941:

[From the Moline (Ill.) Dispatch of June 4, 1941]

EVENTUALLY—WHY NOT NOW?

Some evening when you are wondering how wars can be prevented and how mankind can be taught to live not only in peace but in a spirit of friendship, you might ponder what would happen if the people living immediately north of the Mediterranean were to organize what might be called a United States of Europe.

Europe, together with Europe's colonial possessions, forms a very good economic entity. As a country, Europe has access to remarkable reserves of cultivable land and minerals. It has access to products of both the frozen north and the Tropics. It has oil, coal, iron, and gold in abundance. If the people of Europe, from the Balkans to Normandy and from Spain to Finland, were to set about to create among themselves the standards of living known in the United States, such a work would take them a century of time and leave none of them the desire for aggression.

If you consider any one country of Europe separately you will see that it cannot survive properly alone. Austria, for instance, lacks a seaport if we think of Austria as separate from Germany. It is not self-contained. Switzerland has beautiful scenery but must import bread. Germany alone has coal but not enough iron or oil. Ninety percent of the people of Russia must find subsistence on 10 percent of the land. Holland is a great dairy country but must import fodder for her livestock lacking enough fields. Poland has been notoriously poor, the peasants of that country trying to survive on an average cash income of only $7 a year—and that was before the recent invasion.

But if Germany lacked iron she had coal. If Austria had iron she lacked coal. If Italy had agricultural lands she lacked oil, coal, and gold. A United States of Europe, with the people free to move about as they please, and to ship as they please and buy what they want without payment of penalizing duties, would give the people a chance to mix and understand one another.

It has been suggested that a United States of Europe might become too strong and want to go to war with the United States of America. But if Europe had plenty why would Europe risk a war to obtain more? Certainly Europe has nothing that we want and we have nothing that Europe could get even if tempted.

Eventually there will be a United States of Europe. It will be organized because that is the sensible way out of Europe's difficulties.

I Am An American Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS ROLPH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE SAN FRANCISCO EXAMINER

Mr. ROLPH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article from the San Francisco Examiner, commending Congress and our colleague the gentleman from Wisconsin, Representative JOSHUA L. JOHNS, for officially designating I Am An American Day:

[From the San Francisco Examiner of June 17, 1941]

"I AM AN AMERICAN"

The interest and patriotic enthusiasm of the American people for the I Am An American ceremonies held May 18 throughout the country have been satisfying to all who took part in the observance.

The Congress of the United States certainly made no mistake in giving official status to I Am An American Day, which it did by joint resolution finally approved on May 3, 1940.

It should interest the American people that the author of this resolution was Representative JOSHUA L. JOHNS, of Wisconsin, whose name should thus be permanently associated with future observances of the day.

It is particularly fitting that a Representative of Wisconsin should have contributed so importantly toward giving national character to I Am An American Day.

A Wisconsin community first successfully conducted the patriotic ceremonies which inspired the Hearst newspapers to urge Nation-wide emulation.

On June 4, 1939, the Hearst papers said editorially:

"A patriotic idea worthy of emulation throughout the Nation is that of Manitowoc County and the city of Wauwatosa in Wisconsin in observing Citizenship Day (I Am An American Day).

"All the young people of the country who have attained the age of 21 during the year are formally welcomed as new citizens by the community, each receiving a certificate attesting his citizenship, and each swearing his allegiance to his country and its constitution.

"Months of instruction in Americanism precede the ceremonies, with the result that young Americans reach the estate of citizenship with full knowledge of its rights and privileges as well as its duties and responsibilities.

"In Manitowoc County this year 350 young men and women, born in the World War year of 1918, assembled for this impressive ceremony, before a thrilled crowd of thousands representing the entire State of iWsconsin. This patriotic spectacle reflects great credit upon the people of Wisconsin.

"In administering the constitutional oath to the young citizens of Manitowoc County, Chief Justice Marvin B. Rosenberry of the Wisconsin Supreme Court, said:

" 'The principal purpose and object of this preparation for Citizenship Day is to enable you to exercise this great power wisely and to prepare you to participate as citizens and, if chosen, as officers, to participate in the government of your country.'

"Further emphasis upon the patriotic significance of the occasion was made by President C. A. Dykstra of the University of Wisconsin who, in reminding the newly made citizens that they had set their feet on the road of American democracy, said:

" 'Your fathers have traveled it for centuries. Continue on it and keep it open. Millions yet have the right to be born free.

" 'Let freedom ring. But also let freedom live and work.'

"District Attorney Thomas E. Dewey, of New York, sent a telegram to the class, which said, in part:

" 'This program is not a mere ceremony. It marks the completion of a formal course of citizenship. Citizenship is in truth a commencement. It is the beginning of a long journey, upon the success of which the future of our country depends.'

"The full measure of the occasion, however, was in the significant response of the young people themselves, as voiced by their spokesman, Jerome A. Mahlberg.

" 'Had it not been for these ceremonies,' he declared, 'many of us might have been content to take our citizenship responsibilities lightly and unthinkingly. But this program, climaxed by the inspiration of this day, challenges us to take our place.

" 'We accept the challenge to put our best thought and our best effort into the serving of our country, our State, and our Nation.'

"It has long been the custom in many American communities to make the induction of new citizens, who have come here from foreign lands, the occasion for formal recognition and observance.

"Native-born Americans, crossing the threshold of citizenship and taking up the burdens, duties, and privileges of citizenship, should be equally recognized and honored.

"It is one of the most important days of a young American's life when he reaches the age of active citizenship.

"He achieves on that day a vote and a voice in his country's affairs.

"Nothing can deprive him of those rights thereafter except his own criminal misconduct.

"He can vote or speak for or against the majority party in government, without risk of life, property, or standing in his community.

"He is an American in full standing, regardless of private wealth or position, regardless of creed or opinion, and regardless of the legitimate minorities or majorities with which he may affiliate.

"Few other countries put such responsibilities upon new citizens or confer such rights upon them.

"Having made the day of such importance, the United States should not let it pass unnoticed.

"The welcome ought to be in keeping with the occasion.

"Americans ought to be more impressed by and demonstrative of their heritage of freedom and their American principles and institutions.

"Certainly young Americans, newly arrived at the estate of citizenship, ought to be received and welcomed with pride and adulation.

"The Wisconsin idea deserves to spread and be Nation-wide, with annual citizenship ceremonies in every State."

Mr. Johns first offered his joint resolution, providing for a day of citizenship recognition, on January 23, 1940, and his earnest advocacy of the matter was properly recognized and rewarded.

The Hearst newspapers, as their readers know, have a deep and intimate interest in "I Am An American Day." They not only discerned the great patriotic merits of the early observances, but foresaw the eagerness and unanimity with which the whole American people would participate in similar observances.

Hence, when the ceremonies of Sunday, May 18, 1941, proved to be the greatest mass demonstration of patriotic enthusiasm and loyalty in our history they brought both satisfaction and credit to all who foresaw that consequence of their enterprise.

The Tanker Situation

LETTER FROM ADMIRAL LAND, A RELEASE BY THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR, AND A LETTER FROM THE ASSOCIATION OF AMERICAN RAILROADS

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from Admiral Land, a release by the Secretary of the Interior, and also a letter from the Association of American Railroads, with regard to tankers and tank cars, and the shortage of oil and gas:

UNITED STATES MARITIME COMMISSION,
Washington, June 20, 1941.

Hon. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MRS. ROGERS: With reference to our discussion today with regard to the tanker situation, you are advised that the Maritime Commission has made a current check of its records which show that American owned or controlled tankers are not carrying oil directly or indirectly to Germany, Italy, or Japan.

No owned or controlled tankers under American registry have engaged in trade to these countries since the outbreak of the war. A check of American owned or controlled tankers under foreign registry shows that none is currently engaged in such a way or has been for the last 6 months, with the exception noted below.

This record excepts the activities of five tankers registered under the German flag and five registered under the Italian flag. Owners of these tankers have been unable to exercise control over their movements during the last year and one-half and have no authentic reports on their activities. A solitary ship under another foreign registry is completing a voyage to Japan under a contract arranged some time ago. Upon completion of this voyage the vessel will be required for other trades.

American-owned or controlled tankers under all foreign registries have been and are now engaged in Western Hemisphere trades, trades to the United Kingdom and to the Dutch East Indies. This particularly applies to tankers which were at one time under American registry and were transferred to Panamanian registry. As will be seen from the table attached the largest single group of such tankers are under British registry and are chiefly engaged in United Kingdom services.

The Commission is cooperating closely with Coordinator of Petroleum for National Defense Harold L. Ickes, and the Commission's control over transportation will be exerted in the interests of inter-American trade, national defense, and aid to the democracies.

With best regards,

Sincerely yours,

E. S. LAND, Chairman.

OFFICE OF THE PETROLEUM COORDINATOR FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE

(For release Wednesday, June 18, 1941)

Action was taken today by Harold L. Ickes, Petroleum Coordinator for National Defense, to increase the prospective supply of petroleum products for the east coast by 5,000,000 barrels annually.

Conferences between the Coordinator and officials of the Sun Oil Co. and the Standard Oil Co. of California resulted in a recommendation by the Coordinator whereby tankers now engaged on routes between California and east coast ports will be switched to runs between Gulf ports and the east coast.

On the intercoastal route the tankers involved carried approximately 4,000,000 barrels of gasoline a year; in the Gulf to east coast trade their annual carrying capacity, due to the shorter haul, will be raised to approximately 9,000,000 barrels annually. (A barrel of gasoline is computed at 42 gallons.)

The Coordinator, in announcing the prospective increase in east coast supply, said:

"The diversion of these tankers to the Gulf to east coast routes involves a sacrifice by the two companies concerned, and will also cause them considerable inconvenience and financial loss. However, they have agreed to the arrangement as a temporary measure in the interests of national defense, and, as Petroleum Coordinator, I wish to express my appreciation of their cooperation in lessening, to some extent, the prospective east coast shortage."

The oil-company officials who participated in the conferences were J. Howard Pew, president, and Arthur E. Pew, Jr., vice president, of the Sun Oil Co., and J. L. Hanna, vice president of the Standard Oil Co. of California.

The tankers have heretofore been engaged in supplying the Sun Oil Co. with special grades of California gasoline under a contractual arrangement between the two companies of more than 10 years standing.

The Coordinator emphasized, however, that this increase in the east coast's supply did not greatly lessen the dangers of a prospective shortage in that area.

"Many additional steps must be taken," he said, "if a serious east coast shortage is to be averted."

The Coordinator's telegram to the two companies follows:

"With reference further to the movement of petroleum products by tanker from California to the Atlantic coast under the contractual arrangement existing between the Standard Oil Co. of California and the Sun Oil Co., the facts submitted and the discussions had with representatives of your company pursuant to my telegram of June 6, have had the careful consideration of this office. It is apparent that the problem is a complex one involving several important considerations which would not appear upon the surface, and I appreciate the enlightenment which your representations have added. That the discontinuance of this movement will considerably inconvenience the two companies involved and call for some sacrifice, I fully appreciate. At the same time we face a critical tanker shortage, with the prospect of a distressing stock situation on the east coast. The temporary diversion of these Pacific coast shipments to Gulf sources will, by reason of the shorter haul, make possible the movement annually to the Atlantic seaboard of some 5,000,000 barrels of petroleum products more than can now be supplied with the same number of tankers from the more distant California points. In the circumstances, even in the face of the facts and points of view which you have presented, I must recommend that the Standard Oil Co. of California and the Sun Oil Co., by mutual agreement, temporarily discontinue these intercoastal tanker movements of petroleum products and so make available for the shorter Gulf haul all of the tankers now engaged in such intercoastal movement. This for such period as a tanker shortage exists or until there is some change in the situation warranting renewed consideration by me and a different conclusion. The cooperation of your company in the development of this subject with my office is much appreciated and augurs well for the future success of our mutual efforts in the interest of national defense.

"HAROLD L. ICKES,
"Petroleum Coordinator."

ASSOCIATION OF AMERICAN RAILROADS,
Washington, D. C., June 19, 1941.

Hon. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MRS. ROGERS: Referring to your conversation with this office this morning concerning the question of tank cars available for the handling of petroleum and its products:

A very recent report of the American Petroleum Institute to the O. P. M. showed that the oil companies and the private car-leasing companies owned together approximately 125,000 tank cars of various kinds and capacities, divided as to ownership about one-third and two-thirds, respectively. The study indicated a present surplus of approximately 20,000 tank cars of various capacities now distributed all over the United States. Direct railroad ownership of tank cars over and above those listed above is somewhat less than 10,000. Approximately 7,000 are used for handling petroleum products. Of the approximate 20,000 surplus tank cars owned by the oil companies and private car-leasing companies, these are capable of handling 200,000 barrels of petroleum and products per day from the southwestern fields to the eastern seaboard.

If there is any further information you desire, will be glad to have you telephone me.

With kind regards, I am

Sincerely yours,

J. J. PELLEY, President.

Address to the Graduating Class of Howard University

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR W. MITCHELL
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. ARTHUR W. MITCHELL, OF ILLINOIS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address, which I delivered at Howard University on June 13, 1941, on the occasion of their commencement:

Mr. President, trustees, members of the faculty, distinguished visitors, members of the graduating class, ladies, and gentlemen, it is a great honor to appear as the principal speaker on this occasion; an honor to be cherished and remembered throughout a lifetime. Ordinarily, on such an occasion, my remarks would be addressed almost wholly to the graduating class representing the various departments of the university, and to the students of the university. I am deeply conscious of the fact that at this time there rests upon the shoulders of the speaker a responsibility which demands that this address must reach out and touch not only the graduating class and members of the faculty and the visitors who are present, but must include a message dealing with the great world emergency and the contribution that America's largest minority group is called upon to make in the struggle to safeguard the principles and the life of democracy. In keeping with this thought, I shall divide my speech into two parts. In part 1, I shall endeavor to deal in a brief way with the world situation to which I have already referred. In part 2, I shall address my remarks to the members of the graduating class.

As a Member of the Congress of the United States, it has been my privilege to observe conditions in the world as perhaps no other member of the race has had an opportunity to do. It is an accepted fact that not since this Government was founded has there been such a serious threat to the opportunities and blessings provided in the Government which we refer to as a democracy. At this moment there are powerful forces at work not only in foreign countries but in our own country, which, if successful, will destroy every vestige of liberty and freedom which we have enjoyed under the Government of this country. Indeed, the very Government itself is threatened, and if these forces to which I referred are not arrested, it is only a question of time before all that we hold to be dear and precious in our country and in our Government will be wiped out.

This Government, under the leadership of those charged with the responsibility of administering the affairs of government, is putting forth its greatest effort to defend itself and to guarantee the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity. To do this, tremendous burdens are being placed upon the backs of every American citizen in one form or another. Hundreds of thousands have been called from their homes and businesses to take up the life of soldiers. Every city and hamlet has sent thousands of youths to the training camps where they are now learning the art and science of war. The Negro youth, in this war as in all previous wars in which this country has engaged, is sharing this responsibility. Tax burdens such as we have not known in our lifetime are about to be imposed upon the jobs and the industrial activities of the country. We are just now having introduced in the Congress a tax bill which we are told will make the heaviest demand upon wage earners and salaried people ever known to us. In addition to this we are called upon to purchase war bonds and war stamps in larger amounts than has ever been true before. On all occasions where I have discussed these war burdens, I have said without hesitation that the Negro will be no slacker. He has always responded to the requests and demands of his Government and his country, and this will be no exception.

Please permit me to say that I am not at all unmindful of the fact that this Government and this country, which the Negro has so generously defended with his means, his blood, and his life, have not looked upon this group of citizens with the same degree of consideration and favor as that accorded all other groups. Maybe it might be that there are those among you now who would like to propound this question to me, namely, "Do you say to us that we should go forward meeting every request and every demand of this emergency without regard to the injustices and discrimination and handicaps which our Government has placed upon this group of citizens?" My answer to this is an unequivocal "Yes."

There is one fact in connection with our situation in America that we should recognize from the beginning. Without due recognition of this fact it is absolutely impossible to reach the right and proper conclusions in the consideration of all the other facts surrounding our case as American citizens. We are a minority group, still carrying upon our shoulders the stigma of slavery and servitude; a condition which cannot be explained away but must be fought and lived down, and when I say "fought and lived down," I mean we must fight to achieve all that any other race has achieved, and at the same time make due allowance for years to pass over our heads before we can receive at the hands of the majority group full consideration and justice, however much this fact might pain us.

I know how easy it is for us to think of our lot in this country and become impatient and thereby lose our balance. I resent with all of my soul and strength every racial discrimination practiced in this country, whether outside of our Government or inside the activities of the Government. I contend that no such discrimination can exist within a genuine democracy. At the same time, I have sense enough to know these things did not grow up overnight. Nor can they be wiped out during one or two short generations. General Armstrong well said that "it takes as long to right a wrong as it takes to commit the same wrong."

I know we are making substantial headway in this country. We have already come a long distance. This progress has been made through patience, tolerance, struggle, prayer, and extreme effort. I plead for a continuance of the exercise of patience and the other virtues which we and our fathers practiced.

In the Congress I have spoken time and again, urging justice for our group, but I have at the same time urged absolute loyalty on the part of our people. Here are extracts from two such speeches:

"THE LOYALTY OF THE NEGRO TO AMERICA IS PLEDGED"

(Speech of Hon. ARTHUR W. MITCHELL, of Illinois, in the House of Representatives, May 1, 1940)

"Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, during the nearly 6 years I have served as a Member of this House I have heard much said about different forms of government, dictatorships, etc. At times there have been statements to the effect that certain legislation which we had under consideration pointed toward the setting up of a dictatorship in our country. There is no doubt in my mind but there are subversive influences at work in America and that they are seeking to undermine our Government. They are making their appeal to all supposedly disgruntled groups. I am firmly of the opinion that such an appeal is being made to the Negroes, the largest minority group in this country.

"I have implicit faith in the loyalty of the Negro, but at the present time there are evidences of small groups here and there giving an attentive ear to doctrines which are subversive in their nature. I regard such teachings as being not only detrimental to our Government but most destructive and detrimental to the best interests of my group. I do not wish to go on record as being in sympathy with the injustices from which my people suffer. I have denounced them on the floor of this House time and again. I have pleaded for absolute justice, and I have asked the Nation to wipe out discriminations against the largest minority group; but I look with disapproval upon any activity which smacks of disloyalty to this Government.

"I believe that communism as taught and practiced in Russia is seeking through its agents to disrupt the good feelings between the two races in this country. I deplore this and disapprove it as does the great majority of Negroes. I have no confidence in these so-called revolutionary organizations springing up here and there among certain of our citizens, white and colored. It is my opinion that there are designing white men and women in the United States today who are deliberately seeking to take advantage of whatever dissatisfaction exists among the Negroes and are seeking to use the Negro as a tool against this Government. This I condemn with all of my heart.

"I wish to go on record as condemning the activities of the so-called National Negro Congress as expressed in a resolution which I understand was passed by the organization while in session here last week which resolution purported to set forth a statement that should this country become involved in war with Soviet Russia, Negroes would refuse to fight on the side of our Government. This I brand as a deliberate misstatement of fact. Negroes have always been loyal to this Government. In this time of unrest there might be a traitor found here and there, but I wish to assure this Congress and the Nation at large that the Negro is a lover of this country—it is his home; he knows no other, and while his country might withhold from him, and does withhold from him, many of the privileges of American citizens, the well-thinking Negro does not wish to and will not raise his hand against this Government, it matters not with whom we become engaged in war.

"It is my hope that the American people will never again have the occasion to engage in bloody conflict with any nation, but I say to you that should that day come when we must engage in such a conflict, the Negro will be found loyal to this Government, fighting for it just as he did in the Revolutionary War, just as he did in the Civil War, and just as he did in the War of 1812, and just as he did in the Spanish-American War and in the World War. These persons who resolve otherwise do not represent the feelings, thoughts, and intentions of the millions of well-thinking Negroes to be found in all parts of the country.

"I wish to go on record as thoroughly disapproving the appeal made to the Negro at this National Negro Congress by the labor leader, John L. Lewis. It is my opinion that John L. Lewis is the most dangerous, outstanding leader in America today, and it is his desire to change our form of government and to establish a dictatorship in America. I also believe that he wishes to be the American dictator. God forbid that any such day should come. My final word is this: The Negro stands loyally by the American flag and will give his blood and his life to protect it against any foe, whether German, English, French, Russian, or what not. We are Americans, all of us." [Applause.]

"THE COMMUNIST PARTY AND THE NEGRO IN THE UNITED STATES

"(Extension of remarks of Hon. ARTHUR W. MITCHELL, of Illinois, in the House of Repreeptatives, Tuesday, May 14, 1940)

"Statement by A. Philip Randolph

"Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, at this time, when there is rumor of much subversive influence at work in the United States, it is only natural for attention to be turned toward the American Negro, who constitutes our largest minority group and who, because of his economic status and political weakness, furnishes the most fertile field for subversive activities in this country. There is no doubt but that there is being made a very serious effort on the part of the agents of subversive propaganda to enlist and organize the Negro against this Government. I am therefore calling attention to a statement made recently by A. Philip Randolph, the former president of the National Negro Congress, an organization which is thought to be dominated by communistic influences and partially financed by Russian Communists.

"'WHY I WOULD NOT STAND FOR REELECTION FOR PRESIDENT OF THE NATIONAL NEGRO CONGRESS

"'(By A. Philip Randolph)

"'Notwithstanding the fact that these are serious and grave moments for the present and future of all democracies, I am firmly of the opinion that the Negro, because of his unfaltering trust in God, and his love for peace, transquillity, and justice, and because of his spirit of long forbearance and tolerance, will be the last of American minority groups to yield in any degree to these approaches and appeals from the agents of subversive propaganda. In this connection I should like to call the attention of white America to the fact that the Negro should be treated with fairness and justice in all matters. How long will white America disregard the rights of this group and expect it to withstand the teachings of those who are unfriendly to our country?

" 'If there should ever come a day when the Negro yields to these influences it will be because of the activities of such white organizations as the Ku Klux Klan and other similar organizations founded and sustained on racial prejudice. I think white America should take due notice and immediately modify its attitude in government and in economic opportunity toward the Negro; give him the same chance and the same consideration that is given all other racial groups. If this is done, there need never be any fear of the Negro going astray.' "

In closing a speech delivered by me in the Well of the House April 22, 1936, I used these words which I wish to have you consider:

"I do not lose patience because we are not doing this thing as rapidly as we would like to do it. I am a student of history. I know how long the white women of this country begged you to let them vote. Quite a change has come over this country. As I look into the Senate I see women there who, 30 years ago, could not even vote. I look at the President's Cabinet, and I see a woman sitting in the President's Cabinet. They tell me it took a century for these women to achieve the success they have achieved in that respect. If it takes a century to do what we would like to do, I still believe that that time will come, and I believe I will live to see the day when we will have the same rights in all of these States that are given all of the other citizens because we are loyal.

"Mr. Speaker, let me close these remarks by using this quotation from Laurence Hope:

" 'Men should be judged not by their tint of skin,
The gods they serve, the vintage that they drink,
Nor by the way they fight, or love, or sin,
But by the quality of thoughts they think.' "

Now, to the young people who are being honored on this occasion by having awarded to you degrees from the various departments of this great university. Let me first extend to you heartiest congratulations. You have made a noble fight—every one of you. I am familiar with the hardships, the difficulties that you have overcome, the struggles and sacrifices through which you have passed. I know this is a glorious moment in your lives. Thousands of persons here and elsewhere share with you that unspeakable joy which this occasion brings.

I shall now speak to you, emphasizing two things: the opportunity and the responsibility which you now assume as new leaders coming into power at this crucial moment. You are charged, every one of you, with the sacred responsibility of going out into the world and succeeding either as teachers, ministers, lawyers, doctors, scientists, engineers, or what not. It is a great thing to start out in active life with the resolution that you will not be a mere cipher in your community, but a real constructive force; that you will stand for something more than a real living-getter or a dollar-getter; that you will not be merely one more citizen, but a strong, robust, vigorous force—a power respected. A force that moves things; will be known as a progressive individual who stands for everything that is for the betterment of your community. You should be ambitious to be something as a citizen besides a specialist in your vocation or profession.

If you would succeed you will not wait around for chance or luck to aid you. You will not think that you must have a complete outfit of the finest tools before you can attempt to do anything. The men who accomplished great things in the past did not wait for fine tools, well-equipped offices, and other people to help them. Men who are doing things today did not wait for somebody or something to smooth the way and remove difficulties before they began their work. They did the thing they set out to do with whatever tools and equipment they could get hold of.

No; it is not fine tools and the best equipment or splendid opportunities, or influential friends, or access to money that make great men. The greatness is in the individual or nowhere. The golden opportunity you are seeking is neither in your environment nor in luck It is not in chance, nor in the help of others. It is in your self alone. You must forge your own key and unlock the door and enter each for himself.

More than a half century ago, Henry Ward Beecher, in addressing a group of young people, had this to say; I quote:

"There is no open door to the temple of success. Every man who enters forges or makes his own key. No one can succeed for another. The key that will unlock your great opportunity to you must be forged by yourself."

There is no happiness like that which comes from doing our level best every day, always, everywhere; no satisfaction like that which comes from stamping superiority, putting the royal trade-mark of excellence upon everything which goes through our hands. Rely on yourselves. This develops strength. Crutches were intended for cripples, not able-bodied young people; and whoever attempts to go through life on mental crutches will not go very far and will never be very successful. No matter where you go, young man or young woman, no matter who your ancestors were, what school or college you attend, or who helps you, your best opportunity is in yourself. The help you get from others is something outside of you, while it is what you are, what you do yourself, that really counts.

Today every word spoken comes from well-wishers. No one does other than commend and encourage you. Tomorrow the story will be different. You will find many who cheer you today will oppose you tomorrow. What now appears to be sympathy and love may prove to be jealousy and hatred, and in moments such as these the real test of your worthiness and your ability will be made. How will you meet difficulties? If you would succeed in any marked way, you must not only be bold, self-reliant, inventive, and original, but you must be determined and uncompromising in your effort to continue the fight through the bitterest kind of opposition, remembering that only a live fish can swim upstream. The force that will maintain you during such trying moments is coiled up inside of you. The reward for which you work is promised to the one who holds out, endures to the end, "to him that overcometh." This is the proof of greatness—when a man can stick to his aim, can deliver his message to mankind, accomplish his mission, in spite of all sorts of embarrassments, irritations, and disheartening conditions.

The Greek philosopher, Epictetus, in his story of how we should struggle with circumstances, says:

"It is circumstances (difficulties) which show what men are. Therefore when a difficulty falls upon you, remember that God, like a trainer of wrestlers, has matched you with a rough young man. For what purpose? you may say. Why, that you may become an Olympic conqueror; but it is not accomplished without sweat. In my opinion, no man has had a more profitable difficulty than you have had if you choose to make use of it as an athlete would deal with a young antagonist."

Epictetus, in writing on the subject How We Should Struggle Against Appearances, had this to say—I quote:

"Every habit and faculty is maintained and increased by the corresponding actions—the habit of walking by walking, the habit of running by running. If you would be a good reader, read; if a writer, write. But when you shall not have read for 30 days in succession, but have done something else, you will know the consequence. In the same way, if you shall have lain down 10 days, get up and attempt to make a long walk, and you will see how your legs are weakened. Generally, then, if you would make anything a habit, do it; if you would not make it a habit, do not do it, but accustom yourself to do something else in place of it."

You must subdue in a large measure self-interest and work for the good of your fellow man.

A few days ago I read from Dale Carnegie to this effect: That the one word which is used more than any other in the English language is the personal pronoun "I." When you look at a group of pictures made on this occasion, whose picture will you look for first? Will it be that of yourself or that of one of your many teachers and benefactors? If you are selfish you will look first for your own picture. We find that this spirit manifests itself in thousands of young lives. It is the spirit of selfishness, and in this connection permit me to say that I am told—and I think truthfully so—that the smallest package in the world capable of being wrapped up is an individual who is wrapped up in himself.

You must not go from these halls feeling that you have reached the goal of your life. You must remember that these degrees which you are receiving mark the commencement of a career which is to be lived out in each life. In this connection let me tell you the story of a cartoon I saw in a Chicago paper many years ago, depicting the graduation of a young man from the University of Chicago.

On the front page of one of Chicago's great metropolitan dailies was this young college graduate, dressed in cap and gown, holding in his hand the diploma. In the same picture stood the world. The conversation that took place between them was something like this: The young college man said to the world, I quote: "I am an A. B. from the University of Chicago." The world in turn said to the young man, I quote: "You have learned 2 alphabets and there are 26 in the language. If you will come over and grapple with me for a few years, I will teach you the other 24 alphabets." This is more than a mere story. It has in it a great lesson for the thousands of young people throughout this country who are today receiving their diplomas.

One writer has well said that the success of young graduates depends solely upon their efficiency. I think this is true, if taken in the broadest sense. My definition for efficiency is simply this: The ability and the willingness of one to do the right things in the right way at the right time without having to be told or helped.

In conclusion, let me say that you have been favored and blessed immeasurably through and by the unusual opportunities provided for you at this great institution—an institution which is semigovernmental in its existence, but thoroughly democratic in its operations. I regard this institution as being the most thoroughly democratic university in this country. You have been served here. Now with the choicest blessing of this institution and your Government upon your heads, you are sent forth to serve.

Will you go forward from this almost sacred spot to render every possible service to your fellowman, your community, your church, your race, your country, and your God, remembering as you go:

"The heights by great men reached and kept
Were not attained by sudden flights;
But they, while their companions slept,
Were toiling upward in the night?"

Proposed Trade-Treaty Agreement With Argentina and Uruguay

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK CARLSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

STATEMENT OF HON. FRANK CARLSON, OF KANSAS, BEFORE THE COMMITTEE FOR RECIPROCITY INFORMATION

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement made by me before the Committee for Reciprocity Information, Washington, D. C., June 23, 1941, on the proposed trade-treaty agreement between Argentina, Uruguay, and the United States:

Mr. Chairman, I regard it not only a duty but a privilege to appear before this body and express my views on the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between Argentina, Uruguay, and the United States. I appear here this morning as a representative of one of the great agricultural districts of Kansas, which, I believe, is typical of the other agricultural sections of the United States.

As a member of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, I believe I am familiar with the trade-treaty program. During the past few years much stress has been placed on the good-neighbor policy. The term we now hear used is "hemisphere solidarity." The present is a very opportune time to use these phrases, especially in dealing with pan-American countries.

Everyone realizes the seriousness of the present international situation, but even at that our Nation must think clearly and sanely on matters dealing with international trade. We must not be carried away by an idealistic approach to our problem. We must be realistic. The present world conflict, as well as every other international conflict in the past, is an economic one. In simple language it is a struggle for future trade. It is an easy matter to negotiate trade treaties on an idealistic basis. However, this method of negotiation can be very destructive to our national economy. The present proposals are no exception. It is my contention that the home market must be protected and preserved for our producers. This is particularly true as far as agriculture is concerned. The chief surplus product of Argentina and Uruguay is beef. What those countries desire and insist on having in trade treaties with the United States are tariff concessions that will make this country a permanent market for that surplus. As a concession on their part, Argentina and Uruguay would lower the tariff on motor cars, refrigerators, and products that are not produced in those countries.

Geographically, Argentina is so located from a climatic standpoint that it produces practically every farm commodity that we raise in this country. It is easily the leading agricultural nation of the world. With a population of only 13,000,000 people she leads the world in total agricultural exports, being first in the export of beef, linseed, and corn and second in wheat, wool, and mutton. With a population of only one-tenth of the population of the United States she has exported annually an amount approximating $400,000,000 to $650,000,000. She must export her beef, wheat, wool, etc., or become an industrial nation. The latter will not be easy as Argentina has no iron, coal, petroleum, gas, rubber, copper, tin, lead, zinc, or aluminum which are so necessary for an industrial nation. Under these circumstances she feels it is absolutely necessary to find a market for her beef and other farm products in the United States. The principal markets for surplus farm commodities for both the United States and Argentina are in Great Britain and continental Europe. The world conditions are such that neither the United States nor Argentina have been able to dispose of much of their surplus farm crops in this great market. It is true that the United States is at the present time shipping some surplus farm commodities to Great Britain through the lease-lend program. Everyone realizes that the farm commodities which are now moving on this basis will eventually be a direct gift to that nation. Few people realize that it is 6,500 miles from New York to Buenos Aires while it is less than 3,000 miles to important markets in Europe. The distance from Argentina to Europe is more than twice that from New York to the same points in Europe. This is a further reason why Argentina and Uruguay are so insistent on negotiating a trade treaty at the present time that will move their agricultural products into the United States. Argentina can produce food so cheaply on her new fertile soils that the United States cannot compete without shrinking the income of the United States farmer. The proposed trade treaties are considering concessions to Argentina on prepared or preserved meats, meat extracts, corn-beef hash, wool, hides, skins, tallow, grass seeds, alfalfa, broom corn, flax, and many other items that indirectly affect agriculture.

A glance at the list of proposed items shows that this country will undoubtedly receive many livestock and other agricultural products and commodities, either in the original or processed form, which we do not need, some of which we have surpluses so large that they are actually depressing prices on American markets.

American producers are not unreasonable in asking that the domestic market be reserved for their products in accordance with their ability to supply it profitably. The American farmer's economic position has become such that they now realize their own future welfare necessitates vigorous opposition to the admission of certain competitive farm products from other lands which they are in a position to supply. They know that the defenses and the welfare of their families depend upon what they and others employed by them do about the matter.

The total imports of agricultural products for 1940 represented a total paid value of $2,370,200,148. All American products displaced by these imports is estimated at 118,510,007 acres, or, stating it another way, 581,092 farms of average size (174 acres) were displaced.

Some folks are inclined to excuse or apologize for bringing in these imports on the ground that they represent only a small percentage of all our total production and requirement. In answer, it is important to emphasize the fact that with certain of these products the quantity brought in may represent the difference between profit and loss for the American producer.

Mr. Chairman, I want to call your attention to a wire I recently received from several of the livestock commission agencies at Kansas City, Mo., and ask permission to make it a part of the record. There is a prevailing impression that cattle producers and cattle feeders are all making money and the wire which I am placing in the RECORD gives some information on this. It states that since January of this year market prices for choice heavy beeves have declined until today we find the beef costing buyers in many instances within 1 cent per pound dressed of low-grade cow beef. The wire further states that "It is our opinion that the present semidemorialized condition of the market for thick, fat, heavy steers weighing 1,250 to 1,500 pounds could be alleviated and materially helped by purchases for Army and Navy use of this choice product." Quoting further from the wire: "We must not fail to remember the importance of beef cattle to our agriculture and the fact they constitute the largest money investment of all livestock, moreover that it takes 8 to 12 months at a cost per pound of gain of approximately 12½ cents to produce a choice mature steer which now sells on the hoof from $9.75 to $10.50. We earnestly request your support and assistance toward the end of helping maintain prices for beef cattle at a cost-of-production figure."

For the past few years the beef-cattle industry has been in a more favorable position than any other farm enterprise. We must remember that it was just 7 years ago that the farmers and stockmen of our Nation were forced to sacrifice nearly 15,000,000 head of cattle and sheep because of the severe drought and feed shortage. These cattle were disposed of at a price of from $15 to $20 per head. Many of these cattle represented investments of $40 to $100 each. It will take many more favorable years to repay the losses sustained in sacrificing these herds that it had taken a half century to build. We have not only the best cattle industry in the world but we have the best markets of any consequence in the world. If we reduce the tariff duties on meat and other livestock products so that this Nation becomes the dumping ground for competitive products and commodities produced with cheap labor we will revert to conditions existing in this country nearly a hundred years ago. For example, the producers of cattle that goes into South American canned beef on the average receive $3.43 per hundred, which is about a third the price to American beef producers. The laborer who processes this meat, the transportation company that moves it, the merchant who disposes of it, receives wages from one-fifth to one-tenth of what we pay in the United States. We do not believe anyone in this country wishes to place the farmers and laborers of this Nation in competition with this low wage scale and the economic conditions that surround it.

In conclusion I wish to state that the American stockman and farmer does not need to prove that he is a good neighbor and patriot. For centuries our ancestors have always extended a helping hand to the needy and oppressed. We have always been foremost in patriotism. We have always been in the front ranks of every patriotic move to protect our Nation and defend our principles. Agriculture is inclined to view a reduction of tariff rates to appease neighboring countries and certain groups at home with great misgivings. The American farmer and stockman has already suffered considerably in the past and present indications are that great readjustments will have to be made following the conclusion of the great struggle in the world today. No doubt at that time the farmer will be called upon to make even greater sacrifices in the form of taxes and the loss of markets. He has always met these conditions with great fortitude. However, he is now insisting that nothing be done in the way of tariff reductions that will place him in further competition with foreign producers. Let us give him the benefit of the American market, which is rightfully his. Thank you.

The telegram referred to follows:

KANSAS CITY, MO., May 19, 1941.

Hon. FRANK CARLSON,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Our Corn Belt and Midwestern States farmers and cattle feeders have on hand and are now offering on the public livestock markets of the country the finest selection of mature beef steers that has been presented in many years. They represent the product of long hours of careful and painstaking care and handling on the part of the feeder as well as a very substantial investment in money and feed. Since January of this year market prices for these choice heavy beeves have declined until today we find the beef costing buyers in many instances within 1 cent per pound dressed of low-grade cow beef. Conditions which permit of such an unheard of and deplorable situation in the beef trade should challenge and arouse to action all factors in the industry as well as people generally. The prosperity of America lies very near the soil; the products of 75 percent of all our cultivable acres finds its market through livestock. The successful defense of America will be closely bound up with our farmers. Ability to provide the storehouses with an abundance of health- and strength-giving meats. They cannot be expected to do this at a loss, however; prices presently prevailing for choice mature beeves are below the cost of production. This will result, if continued, in discouraging the feeding of beef cattle; in fact it has already done so. It is our opinion that the present semidemoralized condition of the market for thick, fat, heavy steers weighing 1,250 to 1,500 pounds could be alleviated and materially helped by purchases for Army and Navy use of this choice product. Meat to have quality must be rich in fat, yet we understand to come within Army specifications it cannot be too well-fatted. For the next 60 days an oversupply of this grade of beef will burden the trade and the feeders of such cattle will suffer tremendous losses unless something is done to provide an additional outlet for the meat. Our boys in the Army camps are entitled to the best. Giving them the top in beef at but slightly increased costs over inferior grades and thereby helping the men who produce it seems consistent with sound business practices. In the efforts now being made to make hog raising and grain production profitable, we must not fail to remember the importance of beef cattle to our agriculture and the fact they constitute the largest money investment of all livestock. Moreover that it takes 8 to 12 months at a cost per pound of gain of approximately 12½ cents to produce a choice mature steer which now sells on the hoof from 9.75 to 10.50. We earnestly request your support and assistance toward the end of helping maintain prices for beef cattle at a cost-of-production figure.

Farm-Labor Shortage

OF

HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

LETTER OF HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE, OF INDIANA, TO INDIANA FARMER'S GUIDE

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a letter concerning the shortage of farm labor which I have written to the Indiana Farmer's Guide, an agricultural magazine published at Huntington, Ind.:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 17, 1941.

Mr. C. E. HUGHES,
Indiana Farmer's Guide, Huntington, Ind.

DEAR MR. HUGHES: Glancing through the June 14 issue of the Farmer's Guide, I came across an article dealing with the agricultural labor shortage which interested me very much.

Although outside of farm publications this problem has been given very little publicity, there is no denying the fact that this is a serious bottleneck in our defense program—one which should be dealt with promptly and effectively if the Government program calling for increased production of farm commodities is to be successful.

What is the answer? Your article suggests a partial solution through the utilization of C. C. C. and W. P. A. labor. I believe you are on the right track, and that a practical plan along these lines could be developed.

Supplementing this, however, should be the general deferment by local draft boards of all young men engaged in agricultural pursuits. Brig. Gen. Lewis B Hershey, Selective Service Director, is aware of this problem and has recommended a more liberal interpretation of the draft law as it affects registrants employed on farms.

As a further suggestion I have in mind the possible establishment of farm employment agencies in rural counties, through which farmers could fill their part-time and seasonal employment requirements. A plan similar to this has operated successfully for generations in my native Scotland.

These agencies could operate in cooperation with representatives of local branches of the W. P. A., the C. C. C., and township relief organizations. Relief recipients and other able-bodied, unemployed men could be registered to provide a reservoir of farm labor for the busy seasons. Registration should be compulsory and relief should be withheld from those unwilling to accept farm employment at a reasonable wage.

I feel confident that with the full cooperation of the Government, and of the above-named agencies, such a plan could be made to work.

Certainly something must be done to meet this problem if national-defense food requirements are to be met. We cannot afford to drift along as we have been, with conditions growing more critical by the day.

You may count on my full support of any constructive program for the solution of this very serious problem.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE W. GILLIE.

Committee of Americans Presents Unique Radio Program — The Congressional Mail Bag

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BERTRAND W. GEARHART

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, both because of the unique character of the broadcast and the timely importance of the subject with which it deals, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the script of a radio program sponsored by the Committee of Americans and participated in by four Members of this House.

This program, called the Congressional Mail Bag, and released over the facilities of the blue network of the National Broadcasting Co. on June 20 last, is the second in a series of broadcasts which are designed to emphasize and impress the people who compose a Congressman's constituency with the importance of the legislative branch of the Government; to highlight and dramatize the relationship of the people back home to their chosen Representatives in Washington.

This unusual and highly interesting radio presentation is but one phase of the splendid educational program which the Committee of Americans has been carrying on ever since its inception in 1935. The committee, through full page advertising, posters, news stories, and booklets, valiently defends and extolls at every opportunity the American way of life and, by constructive criticism and helpful suggestions, has had much to do with shaping national thought in respect to the necessity of sanity in governmental affairs.

In the light of its various activities in the public interest, I know of no organization with the name of which we have in recent years become familiar, which is rendering a more valuable service during these days of successive national emergencies when crisis upon crisis follows so closely upon those which have gone before.

The chairman of the committee is the venerable Roscoe Pound, dean emeritus of the Harvard Law School. Its vice chairman is Prof. Edwin W. Kemmerer, of Princeton University, an internationally known authority in fiscal affairs. Its president is the able Berkley A. Thomas, of New York City, whose public service commands the respect and admiration of all of those who are familiar with his works.

During the course of the broadcast to which I am now making reference, Mr. W. Royce Powell, of Washington and New York, a publicist of wide reputation, acted as master of ceremonies.

The text of the sponsored radio program, the Congressional Mail Bag, follows:

Speakers: The Honorable Charles S. Dewey, Member of Congress, Illinois; the Honorable Thomas H. Eliot, Member of Congress, Massachusetts; the Honorable Bertrand Gearhart, Member of Congress, California; the Honorable Lansdale Sasscer, Member of Congress, Maryland, and W. Royce Powell, for Committee of Americans.

ANNOUNCER. In these times of world-wide stress and pressing domestic problems, what are Mr. and Mrs. America thinking? What better way to find out than to see what they are writing their elected Representatives in Congress. The National Broadcasting Co. brings you a second program presented by the Committee of Americans in which the legislative branch of our Government discloses what is the tenor and temper of its daily mail. Tonight a member of the Committee of Americans interviews four Members of the House of Representatives in the Nation's Capital who will speak to you from Capitol Hill. Presiding over the letter opening will be Mr. Royce Powell of the Committee of Americans.

Mr. POWELL. This is Royce Powell in Washington about to open the Congressional Mail Bag. Tonight we are extremely fortunate in having as guests on the Mail Bag program four Members of the House—a Democrat from New England, a Democrat from the South, a Republican from the Middle West, and a Republican from the west coast.

It is one of the purposes of the Committee of Americans to reemphasize the importance of the legislative branch of the Government, and with so much important legislation being initiated in the House, we feel that the speakers on this program represent about as broad a constituency as it is possible to obtain. With us tonight on Capitol Hill are Republican Congressman CHARLES S. DEWEY, of Illinois, a member of the Banking and Currency Committee; Democratic Congressman THOMAS H. ELIOT, of Massachusetts, a member of the Judiciary Committee; Republican Congressman BERTRAND GEARHART, of California, a member of the Ways and Means Committee, and Democratic Congressman LANSDALE SASSCER, of Maryland, a member of the Naval Affairs Committee. I don't know just exactly what they are going to talk about, but suppose I ask them? Mr. DEWEY, in the light of the mail which you have been receiving with what subjects will you deal tonight? Congressman DEWEY, of Illinois:

Mr. DEWEY. Mr. Powell, when I say that my mail has a tax to grind, I mean that the bulk of it shows a thoughtful interest in the public debt and how it shall be met. I, therefore, will confine myself largely to the subject of taxes.

Mr. POWELL. Thank you, Mr. Dewey. And Congressman ELIOT of Massachusetts will give us a general index of what your mail contains?

Mr. ELIOT. Well, let's look at my mail. The first letter is from a young fellow who wants another physical examination because he is sure his blood pressure is not so high as the Navy medical examiner said it was. This lady wants a job, any kind of a job. Here's a letter protesting against gasless Sundays. Here's one wishing me a happy birthday. Here's a man who wants to work in Trinidad and here's someone who wants a passport in a hurry—there is a much greater variety than you would think.

Mr. POWELL. Very good, Congressman ELIOT, and I hope you had a happy birthday. And now, Congressman GEARHART, what are your good Californians talking about aside from the weather?

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Powell, the weather is so good at home it has ceased to be a topic of conversation. What my people are deeply interested in is what they may expect in way of a tax bill from the House Ways and Means Committee. So, like my colleague [Mr. DEWEY], I will grind a few taxes, too.

Mr. POWELL. Thank you, Mr. GEARHART. And now to hear from the Free State of Maryland. Congressman SASSCER, what say your constituents about the passing scene?

Mr. SASSCER. To be sure my people are very much like Mr. ELIOT's in New England. They are also plenty tax-conscious being so close to Washington, but they are equally interested in a project which, though seemingly remote from us, will have a vital effect upon the great port of Baltimore. I mean the St. Lawrence waterway and power project. So I will take this opportunity to catch up on some of my mail by dealing with both subjects.

Mr. POWELL. Thank you, gentlemen of the House. And now to open the Congressional Mail Bag. I am first going to call on Republican Congressman CHARLES S. DEWEY, of Chicago, who represents a large and varied constituency. I call on him with particular interest, because he is an authority on that subject on which we will soon be authorities or semiauthorities—taxes. To refresh everyone's memory, Mr. DEWEY was formerly Assistant Secretary of the Treasury and was one-time financial adviser to the Polish Government. Congressman DEWEY, will you be good enough to tell us in a general way how the billions will affect the millions?

Mr. DEWEY. I'll do my best, Mr. Powell. What you ask is a bigger order than I can fulfill without becoming statistical at an hour of night when America would prefer to be soothed by a lullaby. And yet, and yet, it is perfectly clear that the citizens of this country must prepare themselves now or wait until next March to support an unprecedented tax burden. That the people are becoming aware of this fact is shown by the mail I have been receiving from home.

Mr. POWELL. You mean, Congressman DEWEY, that the rank and file are now ready to recognize that this defense program is every man's program and not something which will hit only "the other fellow"?

Mr. DEWEY. Yes, Mr. Powell; the mail from back home reflects an amazingly intelligent interest in the subject of who's doing what to whom and how much will it cost. For the last several years the Federal Government has been engaging in all kinds of extravagances. No one seemed to give much thought to how the money would be raised. But the people are beginning to appreciate now that the day of the tax collector is close at hand.

Mr. POWELL. Excuse me, Mr. DEWEY, but would you tell us just how this widespread interest manifests itself in the mail you receive?

Mr. DEWEY. The mail I receive on this subject seems to fall into two general categories. First, I have received a great many letters objecting to some specific tax that has been proposed, such as the excise tax on fuel oil, on soft drinks, on theater-admission tickets.

Mr. POWELL. What is the other category in which you state your mail can be classified?

Mr. DEWEY. Secondly, I have received a number of letters from owners of industries in our smaller communities expressing concern over the proposed estates-tax increase. These small businesses are, to my way of thinking, the backbone of American business. They employ 44 percent of all factory workers and produce almost half of our manufactured products.

Mr. POWELL. How would these little businesses be affected by the new estates tax, Mr. DEWEY?

Mr. DEWEY. These little businesses are generally owned by the persons who originated them. When such a person dies his estate will be hard pressed to pay the stiff tax. It may, in many cases, necessitate a complete liquidation of the company or its sale to some outside speculating interest. That would be disrupting to employment in the community where the factory exists.

Mr. POWELL. If the new estates tax is adopted, is there any way to avoid this adverse effect?

Mr. DEWEY. Yes; I appeared before the Ways and Means Committee with a plan for prepayment to the Treasury of the estimated tax during the life of the factory owner. By this method the factory owner could arrange to protect the future of his little company. Moreover, the Treasury would benefit by having the use of the prepaid tax funds, which would bear no interest. The plan protects not only capital but also labor's possibility of continuing employment.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. DEWEY, may I inject a question at this point?

Mr. DEWEY. Certainly, Mr. Powell.

Mr. POWELL. I'm sure both ourselves and the radio audience would like to know—aside from these special protests—what does your general mail reflect, Mr. DEWEY, with respect to public opinion on the general matter of footing the defense bill?

Mr. DEWEY. The other communications I receive from home on the subject are of a somewhat different nature. The writers do not protest against some specific tax but protest against the large expenditures for nondefense matters. In other words, my people are asking, and they have a right to ask, why must we pay these new taxes when the Government does nothing about reducing the cost of Government. The writers express a willingness to pay whatever taxes may be necessary to defray the cost of the defense program, but they contend—and I think rightly—that expenditures on items not essential to our national defense should be substantially reduced.

Mr. POWELL. In connection with these so-called nondefense items, to what do the protests from back home refer, Mr. Dewey?

Mr. DEWEY. Mr. Powell, they refer to a billion-dollar proposed expenditure for agricultural parity payments and the St. Lawrence waterway project.

Mr. POWELL. In other words, your people feel it is time to call a halt to spending of this type which is neither necessary to alleviating crop depression or national defense?

Mr. DEWEY. Exactly, Mr. Powell. And I should like to point out——

Mr. POWELL. Please go ahead, Congressman DEWEY——

Mr. DEWEY. I should like to point out, in connection with our increasing debt, that the present $19,000,000,000 expenditure called for in the current Budget does not include the $450,000,000 item for agricultural parity payments which the Senate inserted in the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill, now in conference. Nor does it include the St. Lawrence waterway project which the President recommended to Congress and has just revived. It has been estimated that the total cost of the St. Lawrence waterway project would be $1,220,588,000, of which the United States Government would pay $533,221,000.

Neither of these items, amounting to $1,000,000,000 above the Budget estimates, can be said to be essential to our national defense. The St. Lawrence waterway project cannot be completed until 1947, even if authorized. In my judgment it would be a serious mistake to make this expenditure when our absolutely essential defense requirements are so great and we are asking the people to pay taxes which, although the heaviest in our history, do not bring the revenue into balance with expenditures.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. DEWEY, what in general is your reply to these various communications you receive from home on the subject of taxes?

Mr. DEWEY. That is not an easy question to answer. No two letters may be exactly alike. Each may emphasize a different point.

Mr. POWELL. We can appreciate that. But perhaps you can give us just a general idea, the general nature of your reply.

Mr. DEWEY. For one thing I try to make it clear that there is going to be a substantial increase in taxes. It will be a heavy burden and we will be required to make an adjustment in our living. I strongly recommend that the people prepare now to meet the tax collector, who will make his appearance on March 15 next, demanding prompt payment.

Mr. POWELL. Do you mean you recommend that the people begin now to save for this tax-collecting day?

Mr. DEWEY. Precisely. I think the Government should put on a campaign along this line. And I also recommend to my correspondents that they insist that their Government eliminate and reduce all expenditures not essential at this time for defense.

Mr. POWELL. I wish to thank you, Mr. DEWEY, for this splendid contribution to the Congressional Mailbag program and especially for your constructive suggestion with respect to how America's small businesses may be protected and preserved.

Mr. POWELL. You've just heard Congressman CHARLES S. DEWEY of Illinois. The Congressional Mailbag now takes pleasure in introducing a Representative of the Free State of Maryland, Mr. LANSDALE SASSCER, a Member of the House Naval Affairs Committee. Mr.

SASSCER, is your mail also crowded with comments on taxes?

Mr. SASSCER. Yes, Mr. Powell. The subject of taxes is arousing a lively interest from all walks of life which is a healthy sign. Some of my constituents are fairly well versed on the subject but others are not. The main criticism with the present tax set-up seems to be that it is complicated, penalizes certain commodities at the expense of others, etc.

Mr. POWELL. Congressman SASSCER, would you be good enough to give us your general opinion on the whole subject?

Mr. SASSCER. I'll be glad to, and I think they represent a fair crosscut of the views of my constituents back home.

Mr. POWELL. Good. Please proceed. Mr. SASSCER.

Mr. SASSCER. It is most important that we coordinate our tax sources with a view of having each source carry a more just proportion of the expenses of our Government.

For many years our tax system has been constructed like a crazy quilt, a patch here and a patch there, without any regard for coordination. This probably is due to changing membership in State and Federal legislative bodies and on the committees which formulate the tax policy of the legislative bodies. This wrong approach is also intensified because it is easier to spank a child twice who is across your knee than it is to catch another one.

Unless the problem of taxation is approached and applied in a comprehensive program which coordinates the various tax sources with the view of having each carry only its just share of Government expense and defense requirements, and if the tendency to pyramid taxes on existing sources is continued without regard to existing inequities, our taxes could easily, in some instances, become punitive and sufficiently destructive to dry up the sources of revenue on which the pyramiding continues. This is particularly true as to cigarettes, automobiles, automobile accessories and, to some extent, as to income tax.

The important element is that taxes be sufficient in this emergency to permit us to carry on the essentials of strong government, to permit us to build the greatest navy, and to provide an over-all national defense as rapidly as possible. And I think that's what this Congress will do with respect to levying taxes.

Mr. POWELL. May I ask a question, Mr. SASSCER?

Mr. SASSCER. Certainly, Mr. Powell.

Mr. POWELL. While the people back home have not actually received the new supertax bill yet, how do you find they feel about the burden which they will ultimately bear?

Mr. SASSCER. Mr. Powell, I find that our people in Maryland at least—and I believe this attitude generally true—will pay fair and needed taxes more willingly than ever before and without a whimper. With the tremendous cost of national defense confronting us, and with this willingness and cooperation prevailing among our people, this Government should cooperate in an effort to keep nondefense items at a minimum and to discontinue, or at least defer, nonessential items.

Mr. POWELL. In that connection, Congressman SASSCER, what do you and your constituents consider under the classification of "nonessentials"?

Mr. SASSCER. Mr. Powell, I consider—and I believe I reflect the viewpoint of my State—that super, high-costing projects, such as the proposed St. Lawrence waterway and power project, which has just been revived, is nonessential. The project is not essential to defense. I have taken from my files two very typical letters. One is from D. B. Robertson, president of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen in Cleveland, Ohio, and the other is from an everyday citizen of Elkridge, Md. First, the Elkridge letter, and I quote:

"Referring to the St. Lawrence project, I hope you will use your influence against this at this time. It will be 2 or 3 years before this could be used, and, in spite of all the proponents say, it is going to use a tremendous amount of money, energy, material, and labor now at a time when they are all desperately needed for our present emergency. The project may be a good one, but I think it very poor policy to put through pet projects under the guise of national defense."

Do I have time to read you excerpts from the union letter, Mr. Powell?

Mr. POWELL. Most certainly, Congressman SASSCER. Please proceed.

Mr. SASSCER. This letter does not attack the St. Lawrence project on the grounds of nondefense but on the grounds that it will in the long run tend to create unemployment among railroad workers:

"The development and operation of the proposed St. Lawrence waterway transportation facilities will result in diversion of business from existing transportation agencies and in thousands of railroad employees losing their jobs. Mining, shipping, and all forms of transportation will be adversely affected, and employees engaged in such industries, like those on the railroads, will find themselves among the ranks of the unemployed."

Mr. POWELL. Thank you, Mr. SASSCER. Over and above these objections, I presume the people of Maryland, particularly of Baltimore, have a very definite sectional reason for opposing the St. Lawrence water proposal.

Mr. SASSCER. They do, indeed, Mr. Powell. Baltimore commercial and maritime interests are vigorously opposing the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence navigation and power agreement. It is regarded as unsound on a national basis and as menacing to the port and city of Baltimore. The project, which has lacked economic justification through the years and is now urged as a defense measure, is believed to be contrary to the immediate needs of national defense.

Baltimoreans look upon the port employment factor as of great consequence. Approximately 15,000 port workers in many classifications gain their livelihood from harbor activity and the needs of interior traffic movement and many more are indirectly dependent on the port and its steady operation. A large number of port jobs are at stake in the St. Lawrence proposal.

Mr. POWELL. Thank you, Congressman SASSCER, of Maryland. Congressman ELIOT, we all got a warm, human chuckle about your summation of the mail which you receive, for we know it is typical that the people who elect you Congressmen to office continuously look to you for everything. I'm sure we all agree that that is the way it should be, because the last remaining and truly greatest people's forum left in the world today is the Congress of the United States of America. But will you tell us what Massachusetts——

Mr. ELIOT. Yes; I will, Mr. Powell. And I think the whole eastern seaboard is as equally concerned as is my home State.

Mr. POWELL. You mean oil, Mr. ELIOT?

Mr. ELIOT. I do, indeed, or rather of the threatened lack of it. Right now, I suppose the biggest question about which people are writing me is the threatened oil shortage in New England. This talk about gasolineless Sundays certainly started something and it is right that it should. If we are going to have to have a shortage, gasless Sundays would be about the most unfair way to deal with it.

The first question is what kind of a shortage will it be, and is it necessary? We have voted to help England as part of our own defense effort and presumably we are ready to make some sacrifices as part of that effort, but the question about this oil shortage is whether it is a necessary sacrifice to strengthen the British in their fight against Hitler.

In the first place there is not an oil shortage. There is plenty of oil in America. The shortage is threatened because 50 tankers which normally transport oil to the northeastern ports of this country have been taken off the Atlantic seaboard, presumably in order to help England. It is a transportation shortage.

That is supposed to leave the eastern seaboard and particularly New England with an oil supply next year about 20 percent below present requirements.

But there are a number of very serious questions which we in New England want answered. First, what about the rumor that there is really no shortage of oil in the East at all but that millions of gallons are now stored in the East as a supposed reserve. Reserve for what? Second, is all oil now in the East being kept in the East or is some of it being shipped West or to foreign countries? We are all glad to hear that Secretary Ickes has stopped the shipment of oil from Philadelphia to Japan. Will all shipments away from the East be stopped?

Third. We want to know more about these 50 tankers which will no longer supply the eastern coast with oil. If they are carrying oil and gasoline to Great Britain, to fill the fighting requirements of Great Britain, that is one thing. Is that how they are being used? We have not got enough facts on this situation. The people of New England want to know the facts, and I think they are entitled to know them. They are entitled to know if it is true that these 50 tankers have merely released some British tankers from the Atlantic, so that the British tankers can transport oil from the East Indies to Japan. The charge has been made that after we gave these tankers to Great Britain, British tankers began carrying oil from the Dutch East Indies up to Japan, at a profit for the oil companies which were selling the oil to Japan.

People are also entitled to know whether or not it is true that British tankers which our ships have released are now carrying oil from the West Indies and South America right up to Canada. In other words, people in New England want to know whether the sacrifices they will be called upon to make are sacrifices made necessary by British resistance to Hitler or sacrifices which merely make possible bigger profits.

Those are some of the points which have been coming up in my mail these last few days. They are questions which the people are asking and they are questions which a good many Congressmen are asking, and certainly we all have a right to ask them. Personally, I am encouraged by the action which Secretary Ickes took earlier this week in connection with the oil in Philadelphia. I am encouraged, too, by the very understanding attitude toward New England's problems, which has been shown by the Oil Division of the Office of Price Administration.

If there is any shortage it is going to affect the northeastern part of the United States, and New England is the northeast corner of the northeastern United States. Some of the people who have written me have rightly urged that New England be adequately represented in whatever administrative set-up is finally created to settle this oil problem. I have been glad to make that request myself on the floor of the House and in communication with Government administrators. It is important, too, and I think the Government administration realize it, that the interests of the domestic fuel oil users be taken into account if any real shortage necessarily occurs.

I think we will all face that shortage cheerfully and will arrange for a fair division of the actual supply—without any gasless Sundays, which would so obviously bear heaviest on the workingman whose only day off is Sunday—I think we will face all this with good cheer if we are convinced that there really is a shortage and that it is a necessary shortage. But we do need facts to show us that the lack of transportation facilities is caused by the effort to defeat Hitler and not by somebody's desire to sell more oil and gasoline to Canada or, far worse, to Japan.

Mr. POWELL. Thank you Congressman ELIOT of Massachusetts for pouring some cool water on the troubled oil situation. And now let's jump from New England to the San Joaquin Valley of California and hear from Republican Congressman GEARHART, a member of the House Ways and Means Committee—the committee which through you, and you, and you, is trying to find a way to the means of raising $3,500,000,000 in new revenue.

Mr. GEARHART. It really taxes a person's mind, doesn't it?

Mr. POWELL. Yes; and that isn't all, Congressman. But bye-the-bye, Mr. GEARHART, and while we all want to hear about what the Ways and Means Committee is planning in the way of taxes, could we change the subject for a moment?

Mr. GEARHART. Certainly; what is it?

Mr. POWELL. Well, thus far no one has reported on the labor situation. I mean do you, for instance, get much mail on this subject?

Mr. GEARHART. Most certainly, Mr. Powell. Though it is quite apparent that my correspondents are warmly sympathetic with the legitimate objectives of labor unionism, it is also equally apparent that they are unanimously and emphatically opposed to strikes in our national-defense plants, whatever the cause may be. The universal condemnation of these strikes which runs through all of the letters I have received on this subject is based largely, if not entirely, upon the conviction that the loss of work-hours which has recently occurred is due to a traitorous leadership of Communists and racketeers whose objectives have nothing to do with the welfare of the workingman.

Mr. POWELL. What would you suggest, Congressman GEARHART, in order to curb or control this subversive element which threatens our industrial unity? Would it be a law making it mandatory for all unions to become incorporated and under the regulation of antitrust laws?

Mr. GEARHART. I would prefer not to express myself offhand in respect to so controversial a subject; but whether incorporation of labor unions is the way or not, it would seem to me that labor unions should be made as responsible before the law as union leaders insist that the employers be. That would promote mutual respect and confidence, contribute much to labor peace, I am quite sure.

Mr. POWELL. Thank you, Congressman GEARHART, for letting me interrupt the subject on which you are so equally well qualified to talk, namely, taxes. Would you say this subject is as uppermost in the minds of your constituents as it is in yours?

Mr. GEARHART. Yes; I would. If there is any phase of the emergency which has taken on unusual importance with my correspondents, it would be, undoubtedly, the one which has to do with taxation and kindred subjects. Because of my membership on the Ways and Means Committee, which is the committee in the counsels of which tax legislation must originate, the committee in which the anticipated war revenue bill is now being formulated, many, many letters are reaching my office every day, each one offering suggestions or voicing protests for or against some specific tax proposal discussion of which has found its way into the public prints.

Because many a helpful suggestion is called to my attention in the letters which I receive, letters are very, very welcome at my office on Capitol Hill. To my correspondents generally, I feel a very deep sense of gratitude.

The Ways and Means Committee has been engaged in the preparation of a war taxation bill ever since the 24th day of April. Public hearings, during the course of which everyone who desired to be heard was listened to, continued through all of the intervening week days until May 28. Since that time, the entire committee of 25 members have been meeting constantly in executive session and the end is not yet. Though no one can say precisely when our work will be concluded no bill can possibly be formulated and presented to the House of Representatives for its favorable consideration much before the first of July.

The job is a particularly complicated one, one with many ramifications, one presenting many varied and most difficult problems. Because of the highly technical nature of the subject and the long hours of painstaking study to which the members of the committee are devoting themselves, I have every confidence that a bill will ultimately be produced which will be as nearly satisfactory to all parties concerned as could be produced under the necessities of the moment.

The bill which will ultimately be offered to the Congress for its consideration will deal specifically with practically the entire field of taxation, except the tariff. In the rewriting of the tax laws which are now in effect, it will be necessary to completely reexamine and refix the rate schedules of normal income taxes on individuals, surtaxes, corporation income taxes, excess-profits levies, gift and estate and inheritance taxes, and, finally, excise-tax levies, all of which, when taken together, will represent a most imposing and a thoroughly comprehensive readjustment of the entire tax structure of our country.

The Secretary of the Treasury has requested the Ways and Means Committee to readjust the tax levies so as to increase the revenues of the Government over that which they were in 1940 by not less than $3,500,000,000.

I do not believe that I am violating the confidence of my colleagues when I point out that it is the hope of the committee to raise almost all of this vast and unprecedented sum from income, gift, and estate taxes as these taxes are, generally speaking, levied in harmony with the guiding principle of ability to pay. For this reason no consideration will be given to the subject of excise taxes upon commodities until it is known to the members of the committee just how much can be raised in the other brackets.

It will only be when the estimates of that which can be derived from the various income, gift, and estate taxes are before the committee, that the amount which must be raised from excise taxes will be revealed.

While it is quite impossible to say at this time just what the sum total of the taxes to be collected under the various title heads will be, there can be no doubt but that the amount which our taxpayers will be compelled to yield unto their country for its defense in these days of emergency will be very, very large.

The proper carrying into execution of our two great policies of the day, that is, the rearmament of our country in the interest of an invincible national defense and the carrying forward of the program of all-out aid to the embattled democracies is going to require billions upon billions of dollars.

Great as is the sum of $3,500,000,000 which the Secretary of the Treasury has requested us to make provision for, it will constitute, when collected, but a small part of the vast expenditures which the administration will be called upon to make these next few months. The rest must go to bonds.

That those who compose our tax-paying public are willing to make this sacrifice is manifested beyond the peradventure of doubt in nearly ever, letter that reaches my desk. From that which I read in these communications I am thoroughly convinced that the American people are prepared to sacrifice as never before in order that the ends to which we are, as a nation, devoting ourselves may be achieved, the American way of life maintained.

Mr. POWELL. Thank you, Congressman GEARHART, of California. And thank you, Congressmen DEWEY, of Illinois; SASSCER, of Maryland; and ELIOT, of Massachusetts, for making possible this second presentation of the Congressional Mail Bag. The Committee of Americans, on behalf of its chairman, Dean Emeritus Roscoe Pound, of Harvard; Prof. Edwin Kemmerer, of Princeton; and Berkley Thomas, the president of the committee, are highly indebted to you.

Mr. GEARHART. Since there is but a few seconds left, I think I can safely speak for my colleagues in saying that we have enjoyed this opportunity of speaking to our constituents back home and that we highly commend, as I am sure they do, too, the Committee of Americans for its patriotic effort in bringing the people and their Congress closer together by this unique method.

Mr. POWELL. That's very nice, Congressman. And to all of you from the House who participated in this program on this warm night, I want to say I am personally grateful for your cooperation. Royce Powell saying good night.

Professed Friends of Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the failure of the House Labor Committee to report out necessary amendments to the N. L. R. A. and suitable defense strike legislation is undoubtedly responsible for the attitude toward that committee taken by the majority party and its leadership.

It is responsible, too, for the editorial of June 17 from the Washington Daily News, which is as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of June 17, 1941]

A VERY UNHAPPY POSITION

By reason of long service in Congress, Mrs. MARY T. NORTON, of New Jersey, is chairman of the House Labor Committee. She has found it necessary, as she says, to plead with the membership of the House to deal with her committee as it does with other committees.

That many Members of the House have no confidence in the Labor Committee is certainly true. And it is unfortunate. But it is something for which the committee can blame only itself. For years its attitude has been to obstruct labor legislation, excepting only such legislation as organized labor wanted. And, with organized labor split into two factions which often have disagreed violently as to what they wanted, Mrs. NORTON'S group has found itself in what she describes as "a very unhappy position."

Three years ago demands began to rise from the country and in Congress for a sensible revision of the Wagner Act to correct the lopsided administration of that law by bigots on the National Labor Relations Board. There was a job that should have been undertaken by the Labor Committees of House and Senate. But neither committee would tackle it.

The House created a special committee to investigate enforcement of the Wagner Act. This special committee, after long study, proposed certain amendments—and the Labor Committee did its utmost to prevent them from being voted on by the House. Finally they were routed around the Labor Committee and a year ago the House passed them by a 2-to-1 vote. Then the Senate Labor Committee succeeded where Mrs. NORTON'S committee had failed, and killed the amendments via pigeonhole.

In this matter, and in others, the Labor Committees have thwarted the will of a majority in Congress. These committees, of course, reflected the policy of the administration. That policy, under which organized labor was given almost unlimited power and practically no responsibility for proper use of its power, led inevitably to abuses which culminated in the unjustified strikes that have delayed the national-defense program.

There have been insistent demands that Congress deal with the defense strike situation—and again, Mrs. NORTON'S committee has done nothing. "We could not and would not rush legislation to the floor of the House at a time when emotion might rule over common sense," she says.

And so legislation has reached the floor of the House by detouring the Labor Committee. And if some of it is too drastic, and at the same time too superficial, that is largely because the committee which should have handled it with common sense couldn't be depended upon to handle it at all.

Mrs. NORTON and many other professed friends of labor, in their eagerness to please organized labor's leaders, have done disservice to rank-and-file workers and to the country. If they had sponsored or permitted moderate remedies as abuses appeared, there would not now be danger of unwise measures. And if now they wish to play an effective part in shaping the legislation which certainly is needed, they'll have to do more than plead for confidence in their leadership. They'll have to prove that they have changed their attitude so completely that they deserve confidence.

Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the statement made on the floor by the chairman of that committee, the Member from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON] and, as a member of the committee, I, too, regret that the leadership of the House has not seen fit to refer bills to the committee; but, until the committee shows some sign of bringing in constructive legislation, the practice will undoubtedly continue.

I have introduced not a few bills, the purpose and the principles of which would in my judgment do much to lessen industrial strife, aid employees. But so far the Labor Committee has failed to act upon them.

HON. A. LEONARD ALLEN

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE SCHENECTADY (N. Y.) GAZETTE AND A RESOLUTION OF THE NATIONAL COUNCIL, JUNIOR ORDER OF UNITED AMERICAN MECHANICS

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the bill, H. R. 4861, which I recently introduced to further protect the United States from the dangers of enemies coming here, I insert in the RECORD the following approving editorial from the Schenectady (N. Y.) Gazette under date of June 20, 1941, and also the following approving resolution of the National Council, Junior Order of United American Mechanics, on June 18:

[From the Schenectady (N. Y.) Gazette of June 20, 1941]

THE ALLEN BILL

One would think that by this time Congress would have adopted the necessary drastic legislation to combat every member of all subversive groups and make clear the position of dangerous aliens, but the legislators are still dallying.

The Allen bill would go far toward achieving the right purpose. It provides for the exclusion and deportation of members of all subversive groups and enumerates the worst of them by name. It would suspend all immigration for 5 years and ultimately reduce quota immigration to one-third of the existing figures. If, in years to come, it were deemed advisable either to reduce quotas still further, or to increase them, it could be done.

The Allen bill would make possible the complete elimination of alien habitual criminals. It clarifies the policy regarding aliens who must be detained for the protection of the Nation during this emergency, and their deportation thereafter.

Other bills ostensibly designed to obtain the same results have been introduced or are in preparation. But some of them would do the opposite of what is desired by all those concerned with real defense, and some of the measures are so confusing and vague as to make them worse than no bill at all.

The situation calls for action. As Ambassador Bullitt said last year, "The agents of the dictators are already here, preparing the way for their armies. They are preparing the way in the same manner in which they prepared the way in France. * * * More than one-half the spies captured doing actual military spy work against the French Army were refugees from Germany."

NATIONAL COUNCIL, JUNIOR ORDER UNITED AMERICAN MECHANICS, Philadelphia, Pa.

(H. R. 4861, deporting subversive aliens)

Whereas there has been introduced in the Congress of the United States a bill known as H. R. 4861 by Congressman A. L. ALLEN of Louisiana, which has as its object the deportation of alien members of all subversive groups, the suspension of all immigration for 5 years, and the ultimate reduction of quota immigration to one-third of existing figures; and

Whereas the agents of the dictators are already in our midst and are working along the same insidious lines that undermined the nations of Poland, Norway, France, and others now under Nazi-Fascist occupation or domination; and

Whereas these agents, if permitted to remain here and foster well-laid plans, can, as has been proven in other countries, at a critical time stop transportation, disrupt communication, and otherwise hinder and obstruct the orderly processes of the national-defense effort; and

Whereas many so-called refugees who are in this country are actively identified with subversive groups, and these would be deported upon apprehension under the enactment of the Allen bill into law; and

Whereas representatives of the national board of officers have conferred personally with Congressman ALLEN, and are convinced that the adoption of H. R. 4861 would make possible the complete elimination of alien habitual criminals, and that the bill definitely clarifies the policy regarding aliens who must be detained for the protection of the Nation during the national emergency; and

Whereas the terms of H. R. 4861 were worked out by Congressman ALLEN, in full collaboration with Congressman DIES, of Texas, and Congressman STARNES of Alabama, with whose work the Junior order has long been acquainted and which the order approves wholeheartedly; and

Whereas it is the understanding of the board of officers that this bill will come up for an early hearing, at which time the order will be represented as a witness in favor thereof: Therefore be it

Resolved by the National Council, Junior Order United American Mechanics of the United States of North America, Inc., in session assembled in the city of Washington, D. C., this the 18th day of June 1941, That we unreservedly support H. R. 4861 as a measure that must be enacted into law as quickly as possible in order to safeguard the country during this period of national emergency and for the future; and be it further

Resolved, That the national secretary be instructed to communicate this resolution to the chairman and members of the House Immigration and Naturalization Committee, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the Vice President of the United States.

One Air Force

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK C. OSMERS, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE BERGEN EVENING RECORD, HACKENSACK, N. J.

Mr. OSMERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Bergen Evening Record, of Hackensack, N. J.:

ONE AIR FORCE

Representative OSMERS is energetically sponsoring establishment of an air force separate from the Army and Navy and addition of a Secretary for Air to the President's Cabinet. He appears to be making little progress. Neither Army nor Navy officials have committed themselves. In fact, with typical stodginess they seem unfriendly to change as a matter of principle, ignoring foreign demonstration of the value of an integrated air force. And President Roosevelt has offered no opinion on the prospect of an additional Cabinet member.

Mr. OSMERS' arguments are apparently valid. He points to the unified air forces of Germany and Britain. The Battle of Crete was conducted almost entirely by the Axis air arms. Modern warfare is prosecuted by three forces: Land, sea, and air. If we split one, why not all three? Or, more reasonably, if we integrate two, why not the third?

The teachings and preachings of the martyred Gen. Billy Mitchell are just now being heeded, long after his death. The military leaders of the United States are admitting that to be prepared means essentially to be on the same war basis as a hypothetical enemy.

It therefore is reasonable to suppose that they have seriously considered the plan which Mr. OSMERS advocates and have decided on the basis of either evidence or tradition that separate Army and Navy air forces are practical and efficient. No doubt they have so coordinated and correlated them that under combat conditions they would act as a unit. But it would be rather startling, if and when Army and Navy leaders finally reveal their fundamental air policy, to find that we must still depend on two separate air forces acting independently of each other.

Our Home Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

RADIO PROGRAM OF THE VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS, DEPARTMENT OF VIRGINIA

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, the Veterans of Foreign Wars presented a program over radio station WWDC on last Sunday night, June 22, 1941, on the subject of our home defense. Under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include the program rendered at that meeting:

Theme: The Star-Spangled Banner (transcription).

Mr. NORMAN REED. "I believe in the United States of America as a Government of the people, by the people, for the people; whose just powers are derived from the consent of the governed; a democracy in a republic; a sovereign nation of many sovereign states; a perfect union one and inseparable; established upon those principles of freedom, equality, justice, and humanity for which American patriots sacrificed their lives and fortunes. I therefore believe it is my duty to my country to love it, to support its Constitution, to obey its laws, to respect its flag, and to defend it against all enemies."

Announcer GOFF. That was the American Creed, written by William Tyler Page, which introduces another in the series of programs arranged and sponsored under the auspices of the Veterans of Foreign Wars and dedicated to national civilian defense.

It is now our privilege and pleasure to present E. R. Burton, of the publicity committee, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Department of Virginia, who will have charge of tonight's program. Mr. Burton.

Mr. BURTON. Thank you, Mr. Goff.

Good evening, ladies and gentlemen, the Cross of Malta is on the air again. I wish to open this evening's program by extending my greetings to my comrades and delegates at the nineteenth annual encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Department of Virginia, which opened this morning at 9 o'clock, in Staunton, Va.

Our first speaker this evening is a veteran from the Hoosier State, Comrade RAYMOND S. SPRINGER, Representative in Congress from the Tenth Congressional District of Indiana. Our Comrade SPRINGER was a captain of Infantry during the last World War; he is now a lieutenant colonel of Infantry in the Reserve Corps of the United States. He is a member of the V. F. W. He was the first State commander of the American Legion in the State of Indiana and he served 2 years as a member of the National Executive Committee of that great ex-service men's organization. He is the veterans' friend and he will now speak on Our Home Defense. Comrade SPRINGER.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, my comrades of the last World War, Americans all, I am tremendously honored to have the high privilege of speaking to you, tonight, on this program sponsored by my comrades, the Veterans of Foreign Wars. This great organization is engaged in a splendid peacetime service. May their splendid courage and their undimmed loyalty to our flag and to our country carry them forward to greater heights in these hours of anguish and uncertainly. Our people applaud your devotion to every patriotic duty at this hour. May I compliment you, and may I assure you of my unqualified endorsement of your sound and unalterable stand for our home defense.

Yours is a sentimental subject which has been assigned for this program—home defense. The defense of our country, our people, and our institutions—within the boundaries of our Nation—is the predominating subject today. Men and women—even little children—from the four corners of our great Nation are calling for our defense—our home defense—to be made so sound and so strong that we may repel the attack of any foe. This is not the appeal of any class or group of our people—it is the unanimous demand of all of our people. Whatever may intervene and which develops into a discord in these critical hours may be only passive—yet, there is no discord in the demand of our people that we continue our preparations for the defense of our country, our flag, and our institutions, even to the last man. That is the spirit of every American.

Our home defense is a subject which I love, because it symbolizes the perpetuation of the new life of the world. The dust of the ancient day has been removed. The treasure of the olden days, where crumbling shrines and ancient art once thrived, has become a forgotten lore and our people in this new world have developed that philosophy in life of completely discarding that which is outgrown and outworn; this is the new life of the world.

At the moment we face ominous days in our country. We pause and reflect upon the past, but the past is secure. We are inspired by it. With that inspiration every American stands as a guardian of our future. Our country, with her ideals and traditions, has traveled far. We must not stop, nor even pause, within the shadow of today. Since the days of Lord Cornwallis and Yorktown we have faced toward the front. The future is our goal. Whatever may intervene which may tend to obstruct our course—we will face it—we will meet it as Americans. We will not deviate from our unalterable course—we will march forward toward the goal of our ultimate attainment.

We are constrained to reflect upon our traditions, tonight, because we seek to perpetuate them. These must remain inviolate. Our Constitution and the Bill of Rights, which stand supreme, grant to every American the right of a free man—the right to worship God as he or she may choose—the right to work and the opportunity of progress—the liberty and freedom which we enjoy in this Nation. These are the inalienable rights of every man, woman, and child within our country. Every citizen of every foreign country who comes here, no matter where his home may be, is entitled to equal protection under our laws. This is, truly, the land of equal opportunity to all. These rights must never be surrendered. We must forever guard those fine traditions which have come down to us from our forefathers.

Our Home Defense—that is our theme tonight. We have the most profound sympathy for every democracy in the Old World and their allies that can emanate from the hearts of men. We hope that every nation now defending the liberty and freedom of a free people may completely conquer those who seek to dominate and to force upon them a new and unsolvable philosophy of government. The curse of mastery, the unalterable desire of acquisition, and the sordid purpose of satisfying a selfish desire—all of these elements, spurred on by the lash of desire for personal domination and individual dictation, cause the war lords to continue their conquest for power and dominion. Their philosophy of life and of government must not prevail here. Ours is the American way of life. Our liberty and freedom, as we have known it, must never yield to the individual domination of any dictator. Our Constitution, which is sacred to every American, and our representative form of government established thereunder, must not perish from the earth.

When we reflect upon our home defense, we think of the defense of our flag. There is no combination of the dictators of the world, who rule and dominate their subjects as serfs, who direct the way of life of their people as slaves, who would crush and destroy both religion and education, that can take our flag from the masthead of victory and trail it in the dust of disaster and defeat. Our flag symbolizes the ideals of our forefathers. They fought for those ideals. In their day, that man or woman who lived in our country, who enjoyed our liberty and freedom, who benefited from our unparalleled institutions, who earned his sustenance from our soil, who would have indulged in subversive activities or conduct to the detriment of our Nation would have been looked upon as a spy and a traitor to his country. Our forefathers believed in our American ideals. Many of them died on the battlefields that we might inherit the benediction of a free America. To those who scorn when we plead for the preservation of those ideals which are wholly sacred, we must question their Americanism, and we must question their sincerity as patriotic American citizens. I hope that day may soon come when we may truly say, "All for one, one for all—America."

Thus we face the future. The patriotism of every American is exalted commensurate with our ideals. There must be no laggard within our boundaries when our country calls. We must respond, and that response must be universal; it must be voluntary. The quickened heartbeats of an aroused people cause all Americans to stand at attention. In the dim and dark unknown, in the remote realm of an indistinct future, the glittering stars of liberty and freedom still shine; their luster has not yet been dimmed; they will continue to shine throughout the future years.

Every American reflects upon our theme tonight—home defense. When we speak of it we naturally ask the question, "What is my duty to my country?" Our duty is defined. The responsibility is ours. Yes; we will defend it; we will defend it and all that it implies, even to the last man. I am convinced that every American will do his full duty in the development of our home defense. We will not fail in this responsibility as Americans. Thus we will assure the perpetuation of our heritage, the sacred traditions bequeathed to us by the sturdy pioneers, and we will make our worthy contribution, to the end that our Nation and our flag will be secure. We will go forward as united Americans in our home defense, not marching forward to our fate but marching to a most glorious destiny.

Mr. BURTON. Thank you, Comrade Springer, for that fine address. We will now hear from another veteran of the last World War, Comrade GEORGE MCINVALE GRANT, Representative in Congress from the Second Congressional District of the State of Alabama. Comrade GRANT is a past department commander of the American Legion, of the State of Alabama. He, too, is the loyal friend of the veterans. Comrade GRANT:

Mr. GRANT. It is a pleasure and a privilege to join with the Virginia depar nent of the Veterans of Foreign Wars in this evening's program. The department is to be congratulated in presenting this timely program on the subject, Home Defense.

The district's newest station, WWDC, has shown by its sponsoring of this program each week that it is truly alive to the civic and patriotic needs of the territory which it serves. Certainly at the present time there is a need of keeping the matter of home defense before the public, and in doing so the V. F. W. continues to carry out the worthy and patriotic ideals which have down through the years made it an organization of vast good not only to its members but to the public and the Nation at large. Certainly, no radio station could carry out the objects for which it was licensed in any greater manner than is being done by this station in staging such a program.

While not eligible for active membership in the Veterans of Foreign Wars, I hope that I may, upon this occasion, by reason of a small service in the World War, greet you as buddies, in that by our service we have dedicated ourselves to a common cause.

The subject of home defense is one in which we all should be greatly interested. Why, some may ask, is the Veterans of Foreign Wars interested in this subject? It is because these men know something about war, of its horrors and suffering. They know, too, that present-day warfare is far different from what it was during the last war. Then it was that while those at home in many cases bore great suffering, it was through the loss or injury of a loved one at the front. As far as physical pain and injury was concerned, the man in the field received the suffering. Today it is a far different story. War is no respecter of persons. With the increased air warfare and blitzkrieg movements, children and old people are in constant danger from attack, although they may be hundreds and hundreds of miles away from any actual battle front. Knowing the value of home preparedness, the V. F. W., many who would now be too old for actual front-line combat, have volunteered their services as members of the home guard and home defense organizations.

What measures may we as civilians take in order that we may contribute our greatest ability toward home defense? To me the first and greatest thing that any nation may have is morale. Unless the citizens have this morale and unless it exists in the fighting forces, that nation must eventually sink. How long do you think the present war would have lasted had the English been able to pound away night after night at Berlin, like the Germans have done in London and other English towns? I do not believe history will record a people displaying a greater morale than has been shown by the English people. In speaking of morale, I do not mean that we should build up a morale against any nation that would demand our declaring war or fighting them. I mean a morale that we are prepared to resist any and all nations that might attack our security; that we will maintain our institutions of democracy at all costs and at all hazards.

I do not believe, in planning our system of home defense, that we should become hysterical; that we should believe that we are in danger of immediate attack and that bombs will be dropped upon us from the skies within the next few weeks. But on the other hand we cannot close our eyes as to what is going on around us in other parts of the world. Insofar as communications are concerned we are as near Europe as we were to many parts of the United States several years ago. Planes that formerly made 75 miles an hour and only had a short cruising area now fly over 300 miles an hour and have a much greater cruising area. Certainly no one can say what tomorrow will bring forth. We are busy preparing our Army and Navy for defense purposes. Certainly no one can say that we are doing this to get ready to attack anyone. So it is with civilian home defense. Our taking every precaution does not mean that we are getting ready to go to war or that we are in immediate danger of being attacked, but it does mean that we realize the danger now in the world and that we want to be prepared both by our armed forces and as civilians to meet any eventuality.

I would not upon this occasion and in the limited time available attempt to tell you just what each individual should do. Even if the time were available I would hesitate because of the fact that Mayor LaGuardia has set up a national organization for this specific duty. Recently here in Washington registrations were accepted from those who cared to register for civilian defense. I am informed that the number registering was very gratifying to those in charge of the work and that while registration centers in various parts of the city have been closed, that those who have not registered and desire to do so may still register at headquarters. It will necessarily take many weeks to classify all of those who registered but in time this will be completed so that each man and woman who registered may know his or her duties.

It is my information that nine regional offices will be set up corresponding to the nine Army Corps areas. These will establish direct contact between local and State governments. The public will be instructed in arrangements for receiving and giving air-raid warnings, collecting and recording information of air-raid damage, care of casualties, including first aid and ambulance service, clearance of debris, repairs of utilities, demolition of unsafe buildings, detection of chemical gas, and decontamination of gassed areas.

Civilians will be trained to serve as volunteers in vital State and municipal activities, to plan air-raid shelters, to evacuate and control traffic in event of any bombing or other method of attack, and many other jobs, including the spotting and extinguishing of incendiary bombs.

The United States conference of mayors has issued a booklet which can be obtained by any city interested in this work.

You as an individual can do your part in this work, whether you are old or young. If you are not listed as an actual worker in the home-defense organization, you can keep your eyes and ears open for subversive activities and sabotage. This is especially true in sections where defense industries are located. Regardless of how we may individually feel as to the lend-lease bill and this Nation's declared policy of aid to England, we as good Americans can all agree upon one thing, and that is preparedness at home. It makes no difference whether we be Democrats, Republicans, or Progressives. In the appropriations in Congress for our national defense all Democrats, Republicans, and Progressives joined together as good Americans. As I recall, there was only one dissenting vote in the House of Representatives to our vast defense program, and this vote was not cast by any member of any of the parties which I have just mentioned.

You may ask what change will there be in this country now that Russia and Germany are at war. Will many of those who are Communists and who are against our preparedness program still be against it? What will be the cooperation that formerly existed between the Communist agents and German agents? This I cannot answer. We are at war with neither Germany nor Russia. We do know that the program of the Communist Party is world revolution. If the war spreads with Russia, then, naturally, Russia will be an ally of England, which is a nation that we have definitely committed the resources of this Nation to aid. Our commitment of aid is that we are the arsenal of democracy, and as a democratic nation we will not see England fail. On the other hand, we have Germany saying that she is coming to the aid of Finland, and everyone knows where this Nation stood as between Russia and Finland, that brave little nation which we have classed as a democracy and one that we have aided.

Regardless of the situation in Europe, regardless of whoever may become involved, it should convince this Nation that we must speed our defense; that we must become the greatest armed nation in the world. It has been said just recently that Russia and Germany would not fight, that they both stole Poland, and that a mutual agreement existed between Hitler and Stalin as to just who should have what. Evidently their spheres of influence and operations have conflicted, as is always the case between nations who prey upon others.

America wants none of that mess. Let's resolve that we will stay out—not as appeasers, but stay out because we will become so strong that no nation or combination of nations will dare attack us. Let's not be blind to history—certainly not to recent history. England was slow in setting up a home-defense organization. Bombing was considered a joke; but when the raids began, it was realized that air-raid wardens, fire fighters, and members of the home defense were in truth as well as in fact front-line fighters.

Mr. BURTON. Thank you, Comrade Grant, for that fine address.

We will have a special program next Sunday evening. The Assistant Attorney General will be on the air from 8 until 8:30 p. m. At 8:30 p. m. the Honorable William Tyler Page, author of America's Creed, will speak on the subject Independence and the Republican Form of Government. Let us have your comments and questions on the subject of Our Home Defense. These will be answered at our next program. Thank you, and good night.

Senator Harrison

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS H. ELIOT

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

Mr. ELIOT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, 6 years ago, when the Social Security Act was being drawn, I had the duty of working for many weeks with the Senate Finance Committee. I had more especially the happy privilege of working for long days and evenings, on a personal basis, with the chairman of that committee. For a youngster, to work with Senator Pat Harrison was a wonderful education in the legislative process. For anyone, it was the greatest possible good fortune informally to study with him far-reaching legislation, to be delighted by his wit and his warm human simplicity. I rise today simply to say how sad I feel because Pat Harrison is gone.

The American Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS H. ELIOT

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

Mr. ELIOT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, our national policy, both foreign and domestic, is becoming more clearly defined each day as first, foremost, and altogether an American policy, designed to secure peace and freedom for America. That was the note sounded by the President in his radio speech of May 27. That is the note which should sound still more clearly now that Russia is in the war. That is the policy behind which our people can and will unite.

Such a policy means opposing both war and Hitlerism. There are some who say we must choose one or the other of these two evils. That is like the old argument that democracy is doomed and we must choose between communism and fascism. The supposed alternatives turn out to be very much alike, and both of them bad.

Instead of going to war, we are building a strong defense which may include the "aggressive defense" implied in the President's speech and described in Hanson Baldwin's important book, United We Stand. Instead of acquiescing in Hitlerism, we are aiding England in its stout resistance, and here at home are preserving our own fundamental liberties.

To enter the war means death, devastation, and sorrow, with the danger that at its conclusion neither the world nor America would be either peaceful or free. To let Hitler dominate the greater part of the world means a severe trial for democracy here, with the danger that America might not remain either peaceful or free.

Our course has been steered between these unhappy alternatives. The President has guided the ship of state safely through a difficult and dangerous channel. He has given the freedom-loving people of the world hope and faith. He has launched us on a tremendous productive enterprise, strengthening ourselves and helping the British resist the great aggressor. He has sought and obtained congressional approval of his course.

Our Constitution provides that Congress, elected to represent the people, should have the war-making power. I know that people say that declarations of war are out of fashion. Certainly they are out of fashion—if Hitler sets the fashion. But in September 1939 England declared war. France declared war. And the United States as a democracy should go to war only if the representatives of the people so decide.

Hitler has not amended our Constitution.

I hate Hitlerism. So do most of us. We feel that it represents the utmost degradation of the human spirit. By entering the war now, we would give more active expression to our feelings, and for many that would be a great emotional relief.

But we must be guided by calm reason, not emotion. There is always some risk of war, no matter what course we take. Uniting behind the President's warning to the Axis that we will resist acts designed to facilitate aggression against us necessarily involves some risk of war. But that is a very different thing from plunging, of our own volition, into a general foreign war that is being fought in Europe and Africa and Asia.

To enter this war now, half prepared, would not be common sense. It would even be a most dubious way of aiding Britain, for we have no two-ocean navy and we might well have to fight in the Pacific. We would be embarking on a desperate life-or-death venture while millions of loyal Americans, who believe in defending America, are convinced that this foreign struggle is not our war—convinced today more than ever, for Communist Russia would be, to say the least, an unnatural ally.

There are other millions who feel it is our war, and who demand that we choose now, either to enter the war or to draw back entirely and presumably let England fall.

The impulse to choose is a compelling one, but in resisting it lies the greatest hope for our country and the world. We might survive as a free people even if we went to war. We might survive as a free people even if Britain fell. But the best chance for the survival of democracy lies in our staying out of war and at the same time helping in the resistance to Hitler. "Aid to England short of war" makes sense. As long as such a course is humanly possible, it is the wisest course.

It is a difficult course. It does not satisfy any emotional craving. It requires great effort without stirring battle cries, great patience in the midst of tumult. But think of it as what it is—our own American policy, to keep the light of freedom shining somewhere in the world—and we can see that in our ability to steer this course lies the last, best hope of earth.

All Americans can and will unite in the determination to preserve American liberty. There must be no black-out of peace and justice and tolerance and freedom in America. There must be no faint hearts, no foolish praise of any foreign tyrant, no surrender to the forces of inhuman brutality and evil.

The ideas of human liberty, of family affection, of even-handed justice, have survived through the centuries. They will continue to survive. It is for us to make them flourish.

Proposed Trade Agreements With Argentina and Uruguay

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY B. COFFEE

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

STATEMENT OF HON. HARRY B. COFFEE, OF NEBRASKA, BEFORE THE COMMITTEE FOR RECIPROCITY INFORMATION, JUNE 23, 1941

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement made by me before the Committee for Reciprocity Information, which had under consideration the proposed trade agreements with Uruguay and Argentina vitally affecting the livestock industry:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to protest any reduction in the tariff or excise taxes on any of the competitive agricultural products listed for consideration in either the Argentine or Uruguay trade agreements. I shall confine my remarks primarily to the proposed tariff reduction on canned meats under paragraph 706.

Agriculture is the biggest business in the United States in volume and in number of people employed. The livestock industry is the most important phase of agriculture. In my own State of Nebraska 71 percent of the total cash farm income is derived from livestock or livestock products. I represent one of the most important cattle-producing districts in the United States and am also personally engaged in the cattle business. I know something about the problems the cattlemen have had to face in the past and will have to face in the future.

The present 6-cent tariff on canned beef is not too high; it is too low. This 6-cent tariff is not enough to permit the domestic growers to compete with the low-priced product from South American countries. The canned-beef market in the United States is now practically monopolized by South American countries. Our imports of canned beef during the last 5 years have averaged nearly 80,000,000 pounds a year. This is the equivalent of 200,000,000 pounds of beef, dressed-weight basis, which in turn is the equivalent of approximately 400,000 steers, weighing 1,000 pounds each.

Let us follow some of these 400,000 steers from Argentina and Uruguay to the consumers in the United States. I have been in Argentina and I know they have a fine quality of cattle comparable to our own. They sell at about half the price of similar cattle in the United States. The 1,000-pound steer that sells for 10 cents a pound in the United States can be purchased for 5 cents a pound in Argentina. The packing-house workers that process cattle in Argentina receive about 16 cents an hour as compared with the wages which range from 67 cents to $1.25 an hour paid in the packing industry in the United States.

After a 1,000-pound Argentine steer is slaughtered and dressed, the carcass will weigh approximately 500 pounds. When it is boned, cooked, and canned, the meat will weigh approximately 40 percent of the dressed weight basis, or about 200 pounds. In other words, that 1,000-pound steer has now been concentrated to a weight of 200 pounds in the can as it is shipped to New York.

The ocean freight rate before the present war from Argentina and Uruguay to New York City was only 35 cents per hundredweight. Therefore, this 1,000-pound steer was delivered in New York City for a total freight cost of only 70 cents. The freight rate on canned beef from Scottsbluff, Nebr., to Omaha, Nebr., is 41 cents per hundredweight. To move canned beef merely across the State of Nebraska costs more freight than from Uruguay or Argentina to New York City. Of course, it is recognized that Nebraska beef must not only be shipped across the State of Nebraska but across many States to reach New York City and the other consuming centers of the East.

At 6 cents a pound tariff, this 1,000-pound Argentine steer, concentrated into 200 pounds of canned beef, pays only $12 duty. This is about the equivalent of 1.2 cents a pound live weight or 2.4 cents a pound dressed-weight basis. To consider lowering this tariff to me seems preposterous.

The Federal Government needs the tariff revenue and our livestock producers need the protection. The 6 cents a pound duty brings in more than $4,500,000 a year revenue to the Federal Government. Why should the tax on foreign products be reduced at a time when taxes on all domestic producers must of necessity be greatly increased to meet our national-defense expenditures? Instead of reducing this tax on canned beef, it should be increased because as we increase our domestic taxes to meet the present emergency, the price of domestic products must increase in order to carry the additional tax burden.

Since the people of the United States are being called upon to pay increased taxes for the purpose of protecting the Western Hemisphere, isn't it logical to increase rather than decrease the tax on the products of these countries we are endeavoring to protect? Is it logical at this time to decrease the revenue to the Federal Government by reducing the tariff on these agricultural items and at the same time reduce the taxpaying ability of the American producers?

With the whole world on the verge of war and foreign markets so uncertain, now is no time to open our gates to foreign dumping. These tariffs and excise taxes on these competitive agricultural commodities should not be reduced. Quotas should be established to prevent any flood of competitive foreign products coming in and demoralizing our domestic market.

To reduce this tariff is to encourage increased imports of beef at a time when cattle numbers in this country are again approaching the peak. On the 1st of January we had 71,000,000 head of cattle in the United States. The highest number ever recorded was 74,000,000 in 1934. A 5-percent increase in cattle production will result in the greatest number of cattle ever enumerated in the United States and will place the industry in the danger zone of overproduction.

All meats are competitive. Hog production is being encouraged and greatly increased. Sheep production is being increased. Unless the American livestock producer is protected in this market against foreign imports, he will soon be forced to sell his products again below cost of production because of a price-depressing surplus.

It should be understood that the United States is an exporter of meat products and between 1925 and 1930 was exporting a billion pounds of pork and lard a year. Argentina normally exports a billion pounds of beef a year. Beef and pork are competitive. Canned beef competes with canned ham just as much as it competes with other meat products. Last year hogs were selling for half the parity price and only reached parity this year due to increased shipments to the British Isles. Cattle prices have been below parity from 1930 until 1939. The industry faced bankruptcy until 8,000,000 head of cattle were eliminated through the Government purchase program following the drought of 1934.

The livestock industry is the backbone of agriculture and unless it can be protected and encouraged to supply the American market there can be no sound expansion of that industry.

Cotton and wheat farmers, who are piling up huge surpluses because of the lack of foreign markets, are being encouraged to go into livestock production. In the Corn Belt we have millions of bushels of surplus corn that must eventually be converted into meat. The Government is spending millions of dollars in controlling the production of corn and in maintaining the price level through loans. Yet here is another agency of the Government that is proposing to encourage increased importation of these competitive agricultural commodities which must replace the product of the American producer. How can you restore the purchasing power of agriculture if you are going to force the American producer to compete with cheap peon labor? Why should American agriculture and particularly the American livestock producer be sacrificed for the benefit of foreign producers? In carrying out the good-neighbor policy, I would suggest that we first minister to the needs of our neighbors at home.

To make further concessions on agricultural commodities in the proposed Uruguay and Argentine trade agreements would further accentuate the trend of industrializing this country at the expense of agriculture. Importation of competitive agricultural commodities must be curbed, not encouraged, if we are to provide our farmers and livestock producers in this country their fair share of the national income. Eliminating recent statistics which have been distorted because of the war, I find that competitive agricultural imports have been increasing and our total agricultural exports have been decreasing.

In 1939 our imports of competitive agricultural products amounted to $526,000,000 as compared with $476,000,000 in 1938. In 1939 our total exports of agricultural products amounted to only $655,000,000 as compared with $827,000,000 in 1938, a decrease of $172,000,000. This shows that our competitive agricultural imports amounted to more than 80 percent of our total agricultural exports.

Twenty years ago agricultural exports accounted for approximately 50 percent of our total exports. That percentage has been gradually dropping until in 1939 agricultural products accounted for only 21 percent of our total exports. In 1938 our total imports from foreign countries amounted to $1,950,000,000. Agricultural commodities accounted for 46.4 percent of this total, more than half of which were competitive.

The livestock industry bore the brunt of the concessions made in the Canadian trade agreements and it is likewise asked to carry the burden of the concessions in the proposed Argentine and Uruguay agreements.

Since the first World War the livestock industry has had more years of losses than of profits. It is entitled to more consideration and protection.

The 1940 census shows the total value of all farm lands and buildings in the United States to be $1,000,000,000 less than it was in 1910. This reflects the plight of agriculture. There can be no justification for asking American agriculture to make any further sacrifices for the benefit of foreign producers. Hemispheric solidarity cannot be accomplished by engendering discord among our own producers.

St. Lawrence Waterway Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE LOUISVILLE (KY.) COURIER-JOURNAL

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, it is always interesting to note what happens when newspapermen adopt different viewpoints. Some time ago one of our eastern writers, representing a geographical section which believes that it exists entirely for itself, commented at some length about the disadvantages of the St. Lawrence seaway project. I find a very able reply in an editorial in the Louisville Courier-Journal, Louisville, Ky., for June 19, 1941. It reads as follows:

[From the Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal of June 19, 1941]

FOUR YEARS IS NOT FAR IN THE FUTURE

If our neighbor, Frank R. Kent, has briefed the case against the St. Lawrence project competently, no reason exists for longer suspension of judgment on the enterprise. The sooner work begins the sooner will the shortage of electric power in the Buffalo industrial district be relieved. And the sooner will we be prepared for whatever the future holds.

History tells us how the canal interests foug't railroad extension. We know how railroads fight truck lines and internal waterway improvement, how utility and coal interests fight waterpower development.

We might have expected a disinterested columnist to present the opposition fairly; but Mr. Kent's thesis, emphasizing the imperative importance of the time element in defense preparations, skips the most salient point, which is the possibility of producing power at the St. Lawrence Rapids by the latter part of 1943, a little more than 2 years hence. It is this which may have enlisted the support of William Knudsen and Sydney Hillman, O. P. M. heads, in charge of speeding defense production.

Mr. Kent dwells upon the fact that the seaway will not, perhaps, be completed inside 4 years. But even that span of time happens also to be the minimum period necessary to build a two-ocean navy, so why doesn't Mr. Kent argue against a two-ocean navy, too?

He does not do so because he knows that any such argument would be absurd and unpopular with a people who realize they must have the mightiest Navy on earth, but he ought to be consistent. He ought, at least, to face the fact that Great Lakes shipyards, impractical until they get an adequate outlet to deep water, would immensely increase American ocean tonnage at a moment when ocean tonnage is all-important.

There will be no slowing down of defense industries, as he infers, to furnish labor for the canal and dams. Knudsen and Hillman, the President, and Secretaries Knox and Stimson are just as feverishly eager to promote preparations as Mr. Kent professes to be. But they are responsible and must look ahead, whether their critics choose to look ahead or not. The expansion of our shipbuilding facilities, the development of 2,200,000 horsepower of electric energy in the northeastern industrial section are important for the war's aftermath as well as the immediate future.

Our competitors in the impending economic struggle are developing all their resources to cheapen production and transportation for world commerce. We need all the waterpower we can develop, and we also need to reflect upon the fact that America's wonderful midcontinent granary is incomparably rich as an agricultural area and also incomparably remote from ocean-borne transportation. We wonder if Mr. Kent has thought about this. We wonder, too, if he knows that no other nation on earth would have neglected the St. Lawrence seaway for this long, simply because of its colossal economic importance.

Aside from economic factors we don't know at what near or distant future date we shall have to take measures of total defense against the most vicious sort of aerial warfare. How could we better protect ourselves from the destruction of all our docks and shipyards than to provide reserve facilities 1,000 miles inland, where providence has made us so secure?

Mr. Kent's sole argument seems to hinge on his personal reluctance to looking ahead a brief 4 years; he seems to forget utterly that this unpredictable war may last that long, or longer. Surely, the bottlenecks we have encountered since defense preparations began and which we have not yet eliminated, have taught America the dangerous folly of shortsighted policies.

House Joint Resolution 193 Will Increase Unemployment—W. P. A. Appropriation Inadequate

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives has considered and passed House Joint Resolution 193, which is a resolution making appropriations for work relief for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1942. I pointed out that the appropriations for this purpose as set forth in this bill were entirely inadequate. The House should have adopted the Casey amendment, which had for its purpose an increase in the money appropriated for W. P. A. projects.

My attention has just been called to an item in the Duluth (Minn.) newspapers which reads as follows:

A cut in the Duluth district W. P. A. quota to 5,690 by July 6 was ordered yesterday in St. Paul following announcement in Washington the previous day of a general cut throughout the country.

The July quota for Minnesota is 25,500, compared with 37,193 on June 11. The reduction necessitates stopping of full projects in some parts of the State and entire operations in some counties, S. L. Stolte, State administrator, was quoted as saying by the Associated Press.

A. T. Gilbertson, district manager for Duluth, was in St. Paul yesterday attending a session of W. P. A. officials and is expected back today.

This is a drastic cut and means that a great many people now working on W. P. A. projects in Minnesota, and especially in the territory I represent, will be forced back on relief rolls.

Apparently the same situation prevails in the District of Columbia, because in an item in yesterday's Times-Herald, I note that the Board of Public Welfare here will be required to discharge about 4,000 W. P. A. workers on July 1. This newspaper item reads as follows:

DISTRICT SEEKS $300,000 TO AID W. P. A. JOBLESS

The District Commissioners late yesterday asked the Board of Public Welfare "what to do" about the 4,000 W. P. A. workers who, on July 1, will be dropped from the rolls.

Commissioner John Russell Young said he had asked Acting Welfare Director Conrad Van Hyning for suggestions as to how the District might aid the W. P. A. workers who will be thrown out of jobs when the Federal edict becomes effective.

"There will be several thousand jobless on our hands who face starvation," said Young, "and we must do something to see that they don't go hungry."

He estimated that between $300,000 and $400,000 would be necessary annually to take care of those dropped because of the Federal demand for a 50-percent cut in local W. P. A. personnel.

At the instigation of Senator OVERTON (Democrat), of Louisiana, chairman of the Senate subcommittee on District Appropriations, Young said he had asked all local agencies affected by the Federal W. P. A. cut to file reports as to the effect on both services and personnel.

"I have asked Acting Welfare Director Van Hyning to give us an idea as to what might be necessary to care for these persons who will lose their jobs," said Young.

Senator Overton, Commissioner Young said, has asked for a complete analysis of the local situation.

Mr. Speaker, I call this situation to the attention of the House because it is my hope that the Senate will see fit to increase the W. P. A. appropriations. The House bill was a drastic one, and I think a very serious mistake was made when the House leaders took the attitude that the relief program should not be continued. This Government is spending plenty of money in aid to countries across the water. That is proper. But we have a duty and an obligation to our own citizens, and this should not be overlooked at this time.

Abuse of Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. FITZPATRICK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE MOUNT VERNON (N. Y.) INDEPENDENT

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a copy of an editorial which appeared in the Mount Vernon Independent, Mount Vernon, N. Y., on Friday, June 20, 1941, entitled "Abuse of Democracy."

ABUSE OF DEMOCRACY

Much to our regret we learned that recently the President of our country, at the mention of his name, at a rally of the America First Committee, in White Plains, was booed.

With reports such as these being circulated throughout the county and country, we wonder just how far democracy should go in order to protect the welfare of our country. Either those who participated in booing our President were ignorant of the responsibilities and trust placed in the high office of the Presidency, or they were deliberately abusing the rights given them under our system of government. These are critical times. Our country is being attacked from without by millions of people who believe in other forms of governments than our own. The high office of the Presidency of the United States is being smeared by outside propagandists, and every time these attacks are made they are attacks upon every American citizen.

It is therefore doubly important that we prevent any further smears upon the Presidency of the United States by people from within our country. Franklin D. Roosevelt was elected President of the United States for a third term by the majority of the people. Our system of government demands that the minority abide by the will of the majority. It further demands that the President be the leader of all these citizens of the country, and that the seat of the high office of President of the United States be respected by all citizens, regardless of party affiliations. We hope that we do not see a repetition of what occurred in White Plains again, but if it does, we trust that, in the interests of our country, proper steps be taken to stop such demonstrations. Within the comprehension and extension of the word "democracy" should not be read the meaning that a citizen has a license to boo its President.

A Former Member Favors the Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BERNARD J. GEHRMANN

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

STATEMENT OF W. W. CHALMERS

Mr. GEHRMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a statement from Mr. W. W. Chalmers, of Ohio, on the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway and power project. Mr. Chalmers served in this House for many years and was a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee for 8 years and introduced the first bill on this seaway December 5, 1931.

Mr. Chalmers has been a deep student of this interior development, and his statements are very important at this time, when there is so much confusion and misrepresentation regarding it. His remarks follow:

The Great Lakes are the most efficient transportation system in the world today. I stood in the Toledo harbor recently and saw the Hocking Valley derrick load into one of the lake freighters 4 carloads of coal every 3 minutes, or every 24 hours more than 100,000 tons of coal were transferred from the rails and put into lake freighters. In 1927 when making a round-the-world trip we were held up at Singapore 5 days so that they could load 12 tons of cargo on our ship, The President Garfield. This freight was carried on board by Singapore Tamils. With all our handicaps we have been handling freight on the Great Lakes for the past 50 years, loading over 125,000,000 tons a year for a little less than 1 mill a ton mile. Imagine a pile of coal of 10 tons on the asphalt pavement between the Capitol Building and the Congressional Library. What would it cost to have that coal loaded and hauled down Pennsylvania Avenue a mile to the White House? We have been doing that job on the Great Lakes for more than a half century for a little less than 1 cent. Give us the American seaway and see what it will do for the prosperity of the country.

That great Midwestern continent lying between the Allegheny and Rocky Mountains is the most productive region of the world, a modern Garden of Eden. When the St. Lawrence River project is completed and the 34 miles of rapids in this river are canalized and a 27-foot channel is opened from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean, the American Merchant Marine will help this great continent to take its place as a world leader.

That is why I favor the bill. I favor it because I want to save it for future generations. I want to see the waters of this country developed so that one-half of the freight load of the United States will be handled by the rivers and harbors and inland and coastal waters of the country. If you save 13 mills per ton-mile on the freight load, you will save approximately six and one-half billions of dollars annually to the shippers and consumers of this country.

It has been said that the region of the valley of the Great Lakes is the cream jug and breadbasket of the world. That country is most prosperous that makes the sea the first unit of its transportation scheme. Don't blame us for a longing for an ocean port. It has been the desire of men and nations since the dawn of civilization to have an outlet to the sea.

The most extravagant thing this country can do at this time is to neglect its waterways. The successful peoples of the earth have been masters of the deep. During all time the prosperous nations of the world have been those who have made the ocean their first transportation unit. If we could only clear away the barriers made by the rapids of the St. Lawrence and let our ships into the Great Lakes and the Mississippi Valley territory they would pick up more business than they could handle.

Following the recommendation of the American and Canadian engineers, the International Joint Commission has divided the 182 miles from Montreal to Lake Ontario into 5 divisions. The first division is from Montreal to Lake St. Louis, 25 miles, 13 miles of canal and 12 miles of river, with an elevation of 45 feet. In the canal section they make use of 2 locks and a guard lock. The second division is from Lake St. Louis to Lake St. Francis, 16 miles, with an elevation of 83 feet, 13½ miles of canal and 2½ miles of river. In this section they place 2 locks and 1 guard lock. The third section is from Lake St. Francis to St. Regis Island, a distance of 28 miles, all open sailing, with a change in elevation of 3 feet. The fourth division is from St. Regis Island to Chimney Point, a distance of 48 miles, 7½ miles of canal and 40½ miles of river. The elevation is 92 feet, and they use 3 locks in the canal. The fifth section is from Chimney Point to Lake Ontario, with wide river sailing the whole distance of 65 miles, with a change of elevation of only 1 foot. The power works are recommended to be placed in the fourth section, on the international boundary line, and provide for the development of 2,200,000 horsepower of hydroelectric current.

The St. Lawrence canal will cost $275,000,000 for a 27-foot channel, with the permanent works built so that it can be later deepened to 35 feet. These costs were figured between July 1, 1920, and July 1, 1921, when materials and labor were 20 percent higher than now. The added value to the grain crop will more than equal the entire cost of construction each year after its completion. The price of a commodity is fixed where the surplus of that article comes in competition with similar commodities from other parts of the world. Hence the price of grain is made in Liverpool. Whenever you can cut the cost of sending a bushel of wheat from Kansas to Liverpool, or a bushel of corn from Illinois, you add that saving to the wealth of the farmers of those States. This does not apply to the surplus only, but the price of the whole crop is fixed by the price of the part of it that is thrown upon the market.

Canada rebuilt the Welland Canal. It is now completed. When the St. Lawrence is completed, as recommended by the International Joint Commission, the Great Lakes will be turned into a Baltic or Mediterranean Sea. With a 27-foot channel from tidewater to the Great Lakes, Buffalo, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Duluth, Superior, Milwaukee, and Chicago will have the same freight rates from Liverpool and other foreign ports as those in force from the same ports to New York City. Do you realize what that would do to business? Do the farmers and manufacturers realize what it would do to them to have the cost of the railroad haul eliminated from Chicago, Milwaukee, Duluth, Detroit, Toledo, Cleveland, and Buffalo to New York City? It costs 22⅘ cents to ship a bushel of wheat from Chicago to New York by rail. Save it and give it to the farmers. It costs $40.65 to ship an automobile weighing 3,000 pounds from Toledo or Detroit to New York. Save it and divide it among those who make the automobiles. It affects equally all the territory between the Alleghenies and the Rockies. When this seaway is completed, the freight rates will be revised radically downward.

You ask me what proof I can submit to substantiate the above surprising statement? It is 160 miles farther from Liverpool to Cleveland by the St. Lawrence River than it is from Liverpool to New York. It is 275 miles farther to Toledo, 325 miles farther to Detroit, 860 miles farther to Chicago, and 950 miles farther to Superior and Duluth. What difference does even 1,000 miles make on a seaway? All the Atlantic seaports now, although some of them are 1,000 miles apart, have the same Liverpool rate. Let me quote from the report of the International Joint Commission:

"The Commission is inclined to agree with the statement that where there is a productive interior, ships will proceed as far inland as physically practicable, and that the farther inland they can penetrate the greater will be the resulting economy and the more extensive the area benefited." Notable examples of rivers on which considerable traffic has been developed by oceangoing ships are the Amazon, the Yangtze Kiang, the Rhine, the Danube, the Columbia, the Willamette, the Delaware, the lower Mississippi, and the St. Lawrence itself. It appears in evidence that the same rate of freight was paid from New York to Bombay as from New York to Calcutta, although the latter port was 2,000 miles farther and involved 90 miles of a tortuous river channel much more difficult than the St. Lawrence. It may be noted that ocean shipping has to an increasing extent made Montreal its destination, although railroads extend down both banks from Montreal to Quebec.

Two thousand miles farther and a tortuous channel of 90 miles make no difference in the rates. The total restricted channel of our seaway, including both the St. Lawrence and the Welland Canal, is only 59 miles. The equal rates from the lake ports are not visionary but are a corollary of the present practice.

Forty-seven percent of all the tonnage shipped over sea originates in the territory west of Pittsburgh, east of Denver, and north of the Arkansas and Tennessee Rivers. Ninety percent of all produce shipped abroad is grown in this territory. The value added to the grain of this region each year would more than pay for the cost of this project.

Now I come to the part of this project that the East is vitally interested in. I refer to the hydroelectric possibilities. The value of the hydroelectric energy derived from the power works will add to the business of the East more than 10 times the possible loss from navigation. You are interested in this project by the possibilities from its hydroelectric development. The St. Lawrence drains one-fourth of the American Continent north of the Mexican border, and in its course falls 224 feet and is capable of delivering more than 5,500,000 continuous horsepower. This is equal to the energy created by the burning of 60,000,000 tons of coal in the most modern steam plant. I call your attention to Professional Paper No. 123, issued by the Interior Department, W. S. Murray, chief engineer, recommending a superpower circuit, including Boston, New York, Baltimore, Washington, and adjacent territory.

Senator Leonard W. H. Gibbs, who was chairman of the New York State Commission, opposed to the St. Lawrence ship canal, said 5,400,000 potential horsepower of electric energy available on the St. Lawrence at $25 a horsepower, and you may be sure it will never be sold so low, amounts to an annual income of $135,000,000.

I recommend that when this project is built that the sills of the seven locks be put down to a depth of 35 feet so that when the time comes, as it will, for a deeper channel, it will not be necessary to tear apart the permanent works and rebuild the locks, but simply do a little dredging at small cost. When my bill was up for consideration the office of the Chief of Engineers figured this for me, and the cost would be only $4,000,000, and is covered by the $275,000,000 at that time.

I secured the adoption of my bill the fourth reach from Lake Ontario to Ogdensburg. (See Public, No. 520, 71st Cong., H. R. 11781, p. 15.)

It is an international crime that this energy has not been used for the service of man in the past. It has been going to waste since the early morning of creation, and will not stop until darkness closes the last day of eternity.

The St. Lawrence waterway will make millions each year from coastwise navigation. It will make tens of millions from its hydroelectric works. It will light homes, stores, streets, factories, and cities. It will do the work, run the streetcars and railroads at less than half the cost of today. We are just in the morning of the electric day. The greatest progress of science and inventions in this age will be made in the electric field.

The United States is not as it was 150 years ago—a narrow strip of coast lying between the Allegheny Mountains and the Atlantic Ocean. Beyond those mountains today is a vast domain whose people are interested in this seaway. Its success goes much beyond merely passing interest. It means their life or death commercially.

This project is more than a mere business proposition. Its potential possibilities are limitless. It contains romance, comedy, tragedy, life, and death, not only to this generation but to countless generations yet unborn. Let us be pioneers and promoters of this, the greatest and most beneficent enterprise of the age.

Over beyond the Berkshire Hills and the Adirondacks, between Buffalo and the Rockies, there are forty-two and one-half millions of people who are being commercially smothered by a lack of transportation facilities. They are gasping for breath under the weight of high freight rates. The grain is rotting in the fields. Their automobiles are reaching the world markets a year out of date. They will be bled white by high freight rates unless relief comes—and the only relief is in the development of the national seaway—obstructed by only 34 miles of rapids—provided by God at the creation. Those rapids are watched over and guarded by New York as Leonidas guarded the Pass of Thermopylae. You would imagine by this opposition that if this seaway goes through grass would grow in Broadway and cows would be herded in Fifth Avenue and the sheep and the lambs would go unmolested, even in Wall Street.

I am appealing to the Members of Congress, where right and justice have always been given first consideration. No; the West will find its way to the sea. The 34 miles shall not stop them, even though guarded by selfishness and avarice and those who would exact a toll as our commerce passes through.

It is right, and, if so, you cannot kill it off by fighting it. You will remember that a certain doctor of the law gave the Sadducees some pretty sound advice many years ago in the following words:

"And now I say unto you, refrain from these men and let them alone, for if this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to naught; but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it, lest haply ye be found to fight against God."

Mazzini Society Opposed to Fascism and Nazi-ism

STATEMENT BY THE MAZZINI SOCIETY OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Speaker, it affords me great pleasure to use the following statement, reaffirming the intense devotion of Italian citizens to our democratic system and giving voice to their hatred for facsim and all that it implies.

A copy of this splendid declaration was supplied me by Mr. Amerigo Bozzani, whose high patriotism and deep love of his adopted country has been an inspiration to his fellow countrymen in this trying period in our national history.

The Southern California Branch of the Mazzini Society, at a meeting held June 9, 1941, placed itself on record once more as denouncing Fascist Italy's entrance into the war on the side of Germany and against Britain a year ago today, and sent a telegram to the President, F. D. Roosevelt, reaffirming that conviction and faith in the ultimate triumph of democracy.

The Mazzini Society, which is composed of American citizens of Italian origin and of Italians residing in this country, condemned such war against Britain, who during the fight for Italian national independence has been sympathetic to our struggle and highly honored Garibaldi and Mazzini, who found in England free hospitality. The events of the past year, the society declared, have brought added humiliation to the Italian people; the fascistic dictatorship imposed by force 20 years ago has utterly destroyed the current of sympathies for Italy in all foreign lands where free democratic institutions prosper, and after continued military reverses Mussolini has turned Italy over to its traditional enemy and reduced the nation to a German colony, completely subjected to Hitler.

DICTATORS DENOUNCED

Thus the Italian Dictator has destroyed the noble work of Mazzini, Garibaldi, and Cavour and nullified the ideals of our Italian generations who through unending sacrifices devoted themselves to the liberation of Italy from the German yoke.

The society repeated its firm conviction, based on first-hand knowledge, that fascism does not represent the spirit of the Italian people; it reaffirmed its unalterable opposition to fascism and nazi-ism; it denounced the Italian press and radio in this country as agents of totalitarian propaganda, and it renewed its allegiance to the principle of democracy and to the Constitution of the United States.

Ouster of the German Consuls

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER A. LYNCH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE HOME NEWS, BRONX COUNTY, NEW YORK CITY

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, under the unanimous consent granted me to revise and extend my remarks, I am including an editorial which appeared June 17, in the Home News, a newspaper published in Bronx County, New York City.

To my mind the importance of this editorial is not the fact that it expresses the policy of this newspaper, but, rather, because it is in reality a reflection of the opinion of the community which it serves and which I have the honor to represent.

The editorial follows:

[From the Home News, Bronx County, New York City, of June 17, 1941]

OUSTER OF THE GERMAN CONSULS

Since it is implicit in the Nazi dogma that every agent abroad must lend himself unquestioningly to Hitlerian schemes and ambitions, regardless of what international amenities are violated thereby, the United States will have less reason to worry about propaganda and espionage and worse now that the whole German consular corps and associated servants of the Reich are under orders to depart.

President Roosevelt's decision to expel the consuls and their German employees and to close up their 24 offices, as well as the German Library of Information in New York and similar agencies, brings the United States almost to a complete rupture of diplomatic relations with Berlin. The break is not entire, however, for the German embassy itself, at Washington, is not affected. Though minus an Ambassador, just as the American Embassy in Berlin long has been conducted not by an Ambassador but by an envoy of lower rank, the Reich Embassy remains the last direct link in our territory between our Government and the Wilhelmstrasse.

There is no use shuddering about the implications of this latest stroke, which came close in the wake of the freezing of German and Italian credits, and which is due to be followed by a strong protest over the U-boat sinking of the Robin Moor—a protest that undoubtedly will be emphatic, despite yesterday's good news of the rescue of the missing 35 passengers and crew.

America's course of all-out aid to Britain and all-out defense being what it is, and Nazi intrigue being what it is, there is instead plenty of reason for satisfaction in the expulsion of these untrustworthy guests. By July 10 they must be gone—and with them they will carry the knowledge that the United States is determined to take every measure to insure freedom from such subversion and disunity as was fanned in pre-war France by Hitler emissaries; and exemption from such a profound study and disruption of Norwegian and Yugoslavian and Dutch and Belgian defense arrangements as was carried on by Hitler tools in those lands.

The State Department charges the Nazi representatives with improprieties "inimical to the welfare of this country." Americans who have watched the careers in our midst of Consul-General Fritz Weidemann in San Francisco and Baron Edgar Von Spiegel, to mention only two conspicuous examples, will have little doubt of the validity of the accusation that the consuls and the "librarians" and attachés of the German Railway and Tourist Agency and the Trans-Ocean News Service "have engaged in activities wholly outside the scope of their legitimate duties." A consul is supposed only to look out for commercial interests and for the persons and property of fellow countrymen abroad; newsmen and other disseminators of information are supposed to stay strictly within their fields.

The charges do not give specifications. Under Secretary of State Sumner Welles referred to the Justice Department inquiries about the investigations that preceded the ouster and about the possibility that any of the German officials had been directly linked with sabotage. Details may be forthcoming, but even without them enough has transpired in the recent past to indicate that where these individuals belong is back in the homeland.

Germany now is sure to expel our consuls, just as we ourselves earlier this year requested Italy to close its establishments in Newark and Detroit, in retaliation for the closing of two American consulates in that country, and just as Premier Mussolini has sequestered our assets in Italy, in reprisal for the corresponding American action.

All that cannot be helped. We cannot permit bundsmen funds to attack us here at home, and we cannot allow official German agents to tamper with our security. Whatever the consequences are, they must be faced, if the United States is to remain safe and make itself strong.

Additional Judge for Eastern District of Missouri

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I again desire to refer to the bill which has passed the House providing for an additional United States judge for the eastern district of Missouri. It will be recalled, when this bill was under consideration charges were made that it was the purpose of the legislation to take care of some political friend and there was opposition to the bill, especially from the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENNETT], who read a telegram from the senior district judge of the eastern district of Missouri, in which he indicated that an additional judge was not needed. I yielded during my speech for information as to who the "political friend" was, but no one could advise me.

After the bill passed the House a further investigation was made by the Chief Justice of the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals, Hon. Kimbrough Stone, and he filed an additional statement with the Senate committee to justify the recommendation that the conference of circuit judges had made, not once but on numerous occasions, for an additional judge for this district.

As I stated last week, the Bar Association of St. Louis appointed a special committee, composed of Republicans and Democrats, to make an investigation and they unanimously reported, after a thorough study, that there was need of an additional judge in this district.

I have inserted in the RECORD editorials from outstanding newspapers in the district and now, Mr. Speaker, under the permission granted me, I insert an editorial taken from the St. Louis Star-Times of Saturday, June 21, which is self-explanatory. The editorial follows:

[From the St. Louis Star-Times of June 21, 1941]

ANOTHER FEDERAL JUDGE

A report by a special committee of the St. Louis Bar Association clarifies the question of whether eastern Missouri needs a new Federal district judge. The committee, in a statement endorsed by the bar association's executive body, points out that the docket will be seriously crowded by pending and expected condemnation cases, and urges that the new judgeship is necessary if ordinary civil cases are not to fall "about 3 years behind."

Add this report to the fact that the Federal Judicial Conference, composed of Chief Justice Hughes and senior circuit judges, repeatedly has recommended an additional district judge in eastern Missouri, and the issue seems settled. The courts, as Judge Charles B. Davis recently pointed out, are handling their current cases promptly, but it would be a serious mistake to ignore the imminent danger of future crowding and delays. In Missouri, as elsewhere, "justice delayed" can all too easily become "justice denied."

A bill creating an additional judgeship has passed the House of Representatives and is pending in the Senate Judiciary Committee. Its enactment is proper and thoroughly desirable.

Mr. Speaker, every metropolitan newspaper in this district, regardless of their political views, have now urged the appointment of this additional district judge, and I hope that this will be sufficient to convince the House that no mistake was made in passing this bill.

Trade Agreement With Argentina and Uruguay

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. REES
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

STATEMENT OF HON. EDWARD H. REES, OF KANSAS, TO THE COMMITTEE ON RECIPROCITY AND INFORMATION

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement submitted by me to the Committee on Reciprocity and Information on the proposed trade agreement with Argentina and Uruguay:

Members of the committee, I want to join with others who have appeared before your committee, in support especially of the stockmen and farmers and the farm organizations, to oppose reduction in duties on meat products, cheese, wool, hides, flaxseed, and other commodities that are brought into direct competition with the American producers. It appears the only important proposal in the agreement is to permit the increase of farm products into the United States.

In this brief statement, my discussion shall particularly deal with the livestock industry. I should like to call your attention here to the fact that the livestock business is a $4,000,000,000 industry and directly affects one-third of our population. I believe the American farmer has a right to be protected so long as he can supply the American market with the things he produces. The producers of livestock are in position to amply supply the needs of this Nation with meat and meat products. The livestock population in the United States today closely approaches the high peak of 1934.

It is my contention that any agreement entered into at this time that will provide for further importation of farm products will certainly not be in the interests of American agriculture. Heretofore, as I understand it, trade agreements have been entered into for the mutual benefits of the contracting parties. We are now told that these particular agreements are required at this time as a part of the good-neighbor policy and to provide for hemispheric solidarity. It just seems to me that there are many other methods that should be more satisfactory, and far more durable at this moment, in order to have hemispheric solidarity.

I just don't believe, either, that we can get very far in providing hemispheric solidarity by a piecemeal method. It also seems to me, if the question of hemispheric defense is important—and I grant that it is most important at this time—that we will get further by instilling in the hearts and minds of these peoples the fact that it is just as important to them as it is to us that we join in a program of defense and protection against the aggressor nations. It seems to me that the South American countries should realize that the threat of aggression in the world today is just as vital to them as to the United States. We can't secure hemispheric solidarity by attempting to buy it in this fashion. I don't believe it is necessary for us to import more beef and beef products, flaxseed or dog food, in order to impress these countries with our friendship.

Can it be said, in order to provide economic solidarity that the economic sufficiency of certain nations in South America should be secured at the expense of our western United States? If that is the point in question, it would be just as well for us to buy their surplus meat products and give it to the undernourished and underfed people in their own countries.

Our Government is expending billions of dollars in an effort to support the price of farm products. We have provided billions of dollars in loans and subsidies. We have created acreage restrictions, and we have export subsidies, in an attempt to provide the producers with incomes with which to purchase the things they need to buy. In view of this situation, it seems incredible that your committee at this time would consider further complicating the situation. We have always protected industry by tariffs. Now, when the farmers and stockmen are having the struggle of their lives, you propose by this method to make that problem even greater.

Since it is the policy of the Government to raise production costs on articles of manufacture of every kind—how are you going to reconcile such policy with one of this kind?

A number of witnesses who appeared before your committee have given you facts and figures with reference to the value of exports and imports as they deal with this country. I shall not add to such figures except to point out that 83 percent of our exports to Argentina are industrial, and 90 percent of our imports from that country are agricultural.

It is my opinion that we have gone far enough in permitting meat and meat products to enter this country in competition with our own. This is no time to go further. Suppose, for example, we should turn this problem around. Do you think there would be a demand for this program if these countries had a surplus of industrial products and wanted to dispose of them in the United States? Do you believe, in order to be friendly with these particular countries, that we would be very keen in our desire to make such a deal for those particular products?

The President has said that he did not consider tariff duties on farm products as being high, and that to lower them would be inconsistent with his farm program. This proposal does not seem to agree with that view.

There is another thing which seems important to me, and I firmly believe that in view of conditions as they are in the world today—it is not the proper time to enter into agreements of this kind. Furthermore, it is not the time to stir the producers of our country by causing them to become fearful of injury they might sustain on account of these proposals. The very least you can do is to postpone this matter until world conditions become more settled and stable.

Respectfully submitted.

EDWARD H. REES,
Member of Congress.

Our Foreign Policy

OF
HON. ROBERT B. CHIPERFIELD
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, as one of those who has consistently opposed our entry into the war, I have become convinced that we should not merely in a negative way be against participation in the war but should advocate an affirmative and constructive course for our country to follow.

Even though we have step by step come to the brink of war we can still avoid participation in it if we are united in a constructive policy that has for its goal the welfare of the United States. Keeping in mind solely the best interests of our own country could we not agree on the following course for us to follow:

First. Let us all unite behind the program to make this country impregnable from attack. It is not sufficient that we have appropriated billions for this purpose. Our first duty is to ourselves, and we must see that our own defense requirements are filled before we attempt to help others. We should not ask our young men to sacrifice a year in the Army without giving them the necessary equipment for training purposes.

It is a known fact that this country has practically stripped her defenses of much-needed equipment. We should fill our own needs first. Only then should we give all possible aid to England short of war. This is not selfish. It is only common sense. With the fortunes of war rapidly shifting, no one knows how soon we will need everything possible for our own defense.

Second. We must keep this country on a sound financial basis. One of the first lines of defense is our financial stability. If this country becomes bankrupt or inflation comes, not only our whole defense program but our entire economic system would collapse. With the necessity of spending billions for defense, our national indebtedness will probably go from $65,000,000,000 to $90,000,000,000. This dangerous situation must be squarely faced. We must have increased revenue for these ever-increasing costs. That means more and more taxes so we can, as far as possible, pay as we go. We must cut down to the bone all expenditures other than for defense purposes. We should retain only those services of the Government which are absolutely necessary during this emergency.

Third. We must protect this country not only from dangers from without but from within. We should pass any additional legislation necessary to protect our country from "fifth columnists" and all subversive activities. We must have cooperation between labor and industry, so we can have an all-out effort for national defense. We should most carefully preserve our representative form of government as guaranteed under the Constitution, with its three coequal branches of the Government. Let us not wake up some day and find we have a dictatorship at home just as bad as those we abhor abroad.

Fourth. We should be definitely against any plan for Union Now with Great Britain. Are we suddenly to transfer our patriotism for our own country to the British Empire? That such a suggestion is not mere idle words but is being seriously considered I quote from the Washington Times-Herald of June 19, 1941, as follows:

LONDON, June 19.—Prime Minister Churchill, who recently promised the House of Commons he would make no transfer of Empire territory without giving the members a full opportunity to discuss the advisability beforehand yesterday assured the House that the government would not formulate a plan for Federal union between this country and the United States without a mandate from the British Parliament. So great a change, Churchill said, could not be brought about without the fullest public and parliamentary discussion beforehand.

I suppose we should consider it fortunate that Churchill has decided to have a full discussion in Parliament before taking us into the Empire. I wonder what our early patriots and those who fought to make this country great would think of such a course of action?

Fifth. We should engage in a peace offensive before we try a war offensive. Everyone in their right senses desires peace but with all Europe and part of Asia aflame and the biggest offensive the world has even known, reaching from the Baltic to the Black Sea, about to be launched, who can bring about that peace so universally desired? Certainly not the belligerents themselves. It would be a sign of weakness on their part. No matter which side wins, they will attempt to dictate a peace that will revenge the wrongs inflicted upon them which would result in another Versailles.

Then is it absurd to talk about a just peace? I do not think so. Perhaps momentarily but not as a definite policy of this Government. We, the greatest Nation on earth, are not at war and can use our tremendous influence for peace. Perhaps not at the moment, and I am perfectly willing to leave the proper time to the discretion of Secretary of State Hull, but I am convinced when he deems the time is right that he should vigorously urge and insist that a just peace be arrived at between tne belligerent nations. He has already hinted his willingness to fulfill this great humanitarian roll in his speech of May 18, 1941, when he set forth five principles for permanent peace that could be adopted by any reasonable nation.

Sixth. We must vigorously and aggressively defend not only the United States but all her vital rights and interests in the Western Hemisphere.

Germany is now attacking Russia and I believe it is the consensus of expert military leaders that Germany will be victorious. If she is able to conquer Russia she will have control of all the vast resources of that country and will virtually nullify the English blockade.

We might as well squarely face the fact that it would be a very grave undertaking, under those circumstances, to attempt to send an expeditionary force into continental Europe. All military experts are agreed that it takes four times as powerful a force to invade a country as to defend it. Why should we take on those overwhelming odds? Why should we not force Germany to assume such odds if she tries to invade this hemisphere? I do not mean for one moment we should fight purely a defensive war if we should get into it. We should be as aggressive as necessary in defending our rights if attacked.

Seventh. If Germany defeats Russia we should help feed the starving peoples in the conquered countries, under certain guaranties, as such a victory for Germany would nullify the blockade and would remove the chief objection to furnishing food to the starving civilians in these countries. Starvation is driving them into the arms of the Axis. Take France for example. If food was furnished these countries it would strengthen their determination to remain at least in passive resistance against these aggressors. Of course, proper safeguards should be established that these supplies in no way be permitted to reach the military forces of the Axis Powers.

I have tried to outline several principles which should make our Nation strong. An impregnable defense; a sound financial and economic policy; a country united under the principles enunciated by our Constitution and dedicated to carrying on our own destiny—that destiny to defend America and to preserve inviolate her institutions; we should be definitely against any plan for Union Now; we should attempt to bring about a just peace before entering the war; if it is necessary to go to war we should take all necessary steps to defend our rights in the Western Hemisphere, but we should not attempt an expeditionary force to Europe; we should try to help the starving people of Europe wherever possible. The thought I have in mind in all of these suggestions has been simply that we should think of America first and what is best for her before we engage in the age-old European quarrels.

Shall the United States Sever Diplomatic Relations With the Axis Powers?

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. HAMILTON FISH OVER THE AMERICAN FORUM OF THE AIR, MUTUAL BROADCASTING SYSTEM, SUNDAY EVENING, JUNE 22, 1941

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio speech delivered by me over the American Radio Forum, broadcast over the Mutual Broadcasting System's network, Sunday evening, June 22, 1941:

The recalling of our chargé d'affaires and the embassy staff from Berlin and severing all diplomatic relations with Germany is only important as a final step to war. Being opposed to war, except in defense of America, I am naturally against any such action.

The closing down of German and Italian consulates should not be confused with breaking off all diplomatic relations. The administration, if it had proof of German and Italian propaganda against us or of inciting strikes, industrial unrest, or sabotage, or of military or naval spying, was right in ordering the consulates closed. Moreover, there is very little trade between the United States and Germany or Italy and, therefore, there is not much need for these consulates.

I believe, however, to sever all diplomatic relations with Germany and Italy would be a serious blunder and against our own interests. If we recall our diplomatic representatives from Berlin and Rome, and they do likewise, we will have no channel left to exercise any influence throughout continental Europe now or at the end of the war or to promote peace whenever that time comes.

The war between Hitler and Stalin does not change the situation in America, except more than ever we should determine to stay out. I do not believe the American mothers want to send their sons to Soviet Russia to fight and die for communism or any foreign dictatorship.

I am sure the noninterventionists in America will shed no tears in having the Communists in this country lined up with the war makers.

It would be the height of hypocrisy for free Americans to think of defending Communism and the "red" flag in Soviet Russia or at home. Far better to provide free transportation to all American Communists who want to fight for Joseph Stalin and world revolution and send them back to Soviet Russia with no return ticket. I would do the same for the Nazis and the Fascists. There is no room in free America for any of these foreign forms of dictatorships and despotisms. Let's send them all back to their native land.

I take this opportunity to state that the preliminary result of a poll of 106,000 registered or enrolled voters in my district on the clear-cut issue, "Shall the United States enter the war or stay out?" shows that the sentiment against our involvement is overwhelming—approximately 86 percent, according to the first returns.

The poll had nothing to do with hatred of warfare, but simply whether we should participate or stay out. To my surprise, as I expected the vote would be 2 or 3 to 1 against our going into the war, it is running 7 to 1. Everyone in America knows that we are on the verge of war and the object of the poll was to ascertain public sentiment now, not 6 months from now under unpredictable conditions and circumstances.

The poll shows that over 85 percent of the people of my district have not been deceived by the eastern interventionist press, radio propagandists, and war-making columnists.

It is evident that only a small minority of the American people are for war now, but apparently they are vociferous, aggressive, wealthy, and with powerful connections in the press and over the radio.

However, as long as 85 percent of the people insist on their right to be heard against involvement in European, communistic, and Asiatic wars, the Congress will never vote for war except in case of attack.

Before it is too late the American people must consider the price of entering European and Asiatic wars in lives, money, and as it affects the destiny of America. There is only one yardstick to reach a right decision, and that is what is best for America.

H. R. 3318—Hospital Care for World War Veterans of United States Merchant Marine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE J. CONNERY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, the Congress now has before it H. R. 3318, introduced by the Honorable ARTHUR D. HEALEY, of Massachusetts. When enacted, this bill will authorize the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to furnish domiciliary and hospital care and medical treatment to World War veterans of the United States merchant marine.

Let me bring you back to 1917, when the Sixty-fifth Congress authorized the recruiting and training of men for the United States merchant marine and appropriated $6,250,000 for such expenses. These boys were trained and then served in the all-important and vital service of the United States merchant marine, which was a medium of contact for the fighting forces of the A. E. F., which was at least 3,000 miles from their base. The cry in 1917 was to build a bridge of ships to France, so that the much-needed troops and tonnage and other supplies across the mine-filled and U-boat infested Atlantic Ocean would reach the shores of France and other Allied countries. In manning these ships many of these boys were sent to Davey Jones' locker. Some of the ships did not even have a gun for protection.

It was President Woodrow Wilson who issued the call to the young men of 1917–18 to enlist in the United States merchant marine. He said:

It is the patriotic duty of young men to join this important service.

The enlisted men of the United States merchant marine in carrying out their precarious duties on the high seas were at all times subjected to the same hardships, suffering and dangers as those enlisted men of the United States Coast Guard and the United States Navy. But, while the latter great services of the United States have been fully recognized since the World War, the men of the United States merchant marine have suffered through the failure of Congress to take proper action in their behalf. That the Congress should have done so is shown by the significant fact that it was a prerequisite to enlistment in the United States merchant marine that as protection against sabotage the applicant be a full American citizen. This regulation, as is well known, was not in force in either the Army, Navy, or Coast Guard. Thousands of aliens were permitted to enlist in these branches of the service and are today receiving benefits which are denied American citizens who served in the United States merchant marine. They were picked men. All had to be bona fide American citizens between the ages of 21 and 35.

The record, showing 156 American merchant vessels sunk by the enemy, as against 19 naval vessels, testifies as to the hazards they suffered. No harder or more hazardous work was performed by any of the men engaged in the regular military and naval services.

I have here statements by President Woodrow Wilson; Secretary of War Newton D. Baker; Edward N. Hurley, Chairman of the United States Shipping Board during 1917–18; Admiral Sir John Jellicoe, of the British Navy; Rear Admiral William S. Sims, of the United States Navy, and many other outstanding personalities who guided our destinies during the World War. These statements are proof of the great value of the United States merchant marine to the well-being of our country during the last war.

The men of the United States merchant marine of the World War of 1917–18 are appreciative of these commendatory statements; but words, no matter how kind or praising, are of but little value to the maimed and the sick who have received their disabilities in the service of their country.

Now, after 25 years of neglect, these middle-aged and elderly veterans of the United States merchant marine of 1917–18 are merely asking for hospital and medical care already accorded the military veterans. Also, they ask for the burial of their dead and the use of United States flags to drape their caskets.

Surely, in view of the all-important service they have rendered their country at the risk of life and health, these requests are not excessive.

It is plain that a grave injustice has been done these veterans who served so splendidly during the World War of 1917–18. The Congress has failed during all these years to properly and adequately recognize them.

The Healey bill, let me emphasize, does not in any way seek pensions, bonus, or compensation benefits of any kind. It simply calls for a just recognition of the valiant service of the men of the United States merchant marine of the World War of 1917–18 by granting domiciliary and hospital care. Let us recitify the injustice done to the veterans of the United States merchant marine by enacting H. R. 3318 into law.

MERCHANT SHIP CREWS AMAZE NAVY—MESSAGES SENT BY GERMAN SUBS KNOWN, SIMS SAYS

Praise for the officers and crews of American merchant ships who transported supplies across the Atlantic during the war was given by Rear Admiral William S. Sims in his Lowell Institute lecture series last night. The skill and seamanship of these sailors was something that amazed naval officers, the admiral said, and they proved themselves to be seamen "in a sense that naval officers never have the opportunity to become."

GOT EVERY SUB MESSAGE

Courage, initiative, and a sense of responsibility, skill in handling ships of all types, and noteworthy seamanship characterized the merchantmen, he asserted. "I'd like to see a bunch of 30 naval officers trying to handle 30 heterogeneous ships as the merchantmen did," he said. "I don't think they would like it. Without the merchantman's skill, courage, and loyalty, the war could not have been won."

[From the Boston Post of March 6, 1941]

MERCHANT-MARINE HEROES

Senator WALSH in the Senate and Congressman HEALEY in the House have introduced bills seeking to give belated recognition for the services of our merchant-ship crews of the first World War.

When we entered that war in 1917 and faced the tremendous task of transporting millions of men and billions in supplies and equipment over 3,000 miles of ocean, our merchant marine for foreign service was almost extinct.

President Wilson and Secretary of War Baker issued calls for volunteers, and immediately thousands of adventurous young men, largely from New England and New York, responded. No harder or more hazardous work was performed by any of the men engaged in the regular military and naval services.

Sailing in poorly armed, slow, and clumsy vessels through the mine fields and submarine zones, these men were more exposed to danger than those on the warships. The German submarines, equipped with heavier caliber guns, could and did stand off and batter them to pieces without risk.

The record, showing 156 merchant vessels sunk by the enemy, as against 19 naval vessels, tells what hazards they suffered.

For this they received plenty of tribute, but little else. Rear Admiral Sims said: "Without the merchantman's skill, courage, and loyalty the war could not have been won." The British Admiral Jellico said: "The officers and men of the American merchant marine have founded, during the war, a new and glorious tradition in the teeth of undreamed of peril."

Now, after 25 years of neglect, these middle-aged and elderly veterans of the merchant marine are merely asking for the hospital and medical care accorded the military veterans, half of whom—through no fault of theirs—never had to leave the United States. Also, they ask for the burial of their dead and the use of United States flags to drape their caskets.

Surely, in view of the all-important service they rendered their country at the risk of life and health, these requests are not excessive.

RESOLUTION BY CITIZENS OF KEWAUNEE COUNTY, WIS.

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following petition in the form of a resolution requesting the President of the United States and each Wisconsin Member of the Congress of the United States to do all things in their power consistent with the actual defense of the United States and the protection of the lives and property of its people in America to prevent sending American boys abroad to take part in a foreign war on land or sea or in the air:

Whereas the slaughter of tens of thousands of young Americans on European battlefields during the last World War and the economic and social disorder which followed indelibly impressed in the hearts and minds of all clear-thinking Americans a determination that never again by inducement of foreign propaganda or otherwise shall the youth of this country be taken abroad for wholesale killing and maiming; and

Whereas now again the United States is being drawn nearer and nearer to participation in the present European conflict, but the American people have not wavered in their determination that American youths shall not be sent abroad to fight in a foreign war: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by citizens of the United States and residents of Kewaunee County, Wis., That the President of the United States and each Wisconsin Member of the Congress of the United States be and they are hereby requested to do all in their power, consistent with the actual defense of the United States and the protection of the lives and property of its people in America, to prevent sending American boys abroad to take part in a foreign war on land or sea or in the air; and be it further

Opposition to Socialism and Communism

MIGHTY OPPOSITION — CHURCH AND LABOR DOOM EFFORTS OF SOCIALISTS AND COMMUNISTS

READER EDITORIAL OF THE DAY

Norman Thomas, Socialist Party candidate for President in 1940, and two or three times before, is out with an article in the Call, official organ of the Socialist Party, in which he mentions the fact that a recent poll of union members in this Nation shows only 11 percent in favor of any radical third party, and especially the Socialist or Communist brand.

For 30 years the late Samuel Gompers fought socialism. In one of his speeches he said:

"There's no such thing as an American Socialist Party; it's just an annex of the German Social Democratic Party."

President William Green, of the A. F. of L., who has been at the head since Mr. Gompers died, has exactly the same opposition that Mr. Gompers had. Mr. Gompers once said to me:

"I stand exactly where you do. Government can't run any business. It has all and more than it can do effectively to run itself."

The executive board of the A. F. of L. is divided between the two old parties, but not one of them has been, or will be, for socialism.

The most powerful opponent of socialism is undoubtedly the powerful Catholic Church, with its more than 21,000,000 followers in the Nation. Some Catholics may, and often do, vote for a slice of state or municipal socialism, but this doesn't mean that any considerable number of them will ever vote for real socialism.

The recent address of Pope Pius XII denounced the "too extensive interference of the state." And he once again commended the encyclical of Pope Leo XIII, the Rerum Novarum, as the "Magna Carta" of Christian social "endeavor." He highly endorsed Pope Leo and what he said on labor and private ownership. While the Pope didn't mention socialism or communism, he did endorse private ownership and the "right to riches," meaning the right to accummulate wealth and to "use it justly."

Socialists almost everywhere bitterly denounced the encyclical of Pope Leo, and the present Pope will probably receive the same bitter opposition. That the Catholic Church as a whole is 100 percent against socialism cannot be disputed.

All this being true, when do the Socialist leaders think they'll be able to perform the "revolution?"

Socialists and Communists alike are fighting a "lost cause," though they are not wise enough to know it.

Another New Deal Paradox

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM G. STRATTON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

ARTICLE FROM SOCIAL JUSTICE

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article which appeared in the publication, Social Justice, of June 23, 1941, showing that although millions of unfortunate American citizens who, after 8½ years of this so-called "more abundant life," are still unable to afford pork, the New Deal administration is not only giving hogs to Great Britain but is purchasing these same hogs from a British dominion for cash:

[From Social Justice of June 23, 1941]

HOGS FOR BRITAIN

These millions of slum-dwelling Americans who live on a few cents a day, and seldom if ever can indulge in a hearty breakfast of ham and eggs or a Sunday pork roast, might find it difficult to see the logic of some of the Government's aid-to-Britain measures.

Particularly those millions of indigents, characterized by President Roosevelt as the ill-fed, ill-clothed, and ill-housed one-third of the Nation, might shake their heads in puzzlement over America's shipment of pork to England.

According to Columnist Paul Mallon, the Agriculture Department is buying hogs from Canada at relatively high prices and "lending or leasing"—which means giving—them to Great Britain. Canada meanwhile is selling for cash her hogs to England at prices lower than the United States is paying.

Mallon asserts that in the first 4 months of 1941 the United States bought 10,450 hogs from Canada, compared with 18 in the corresponding period of 1940.

The same day Mallon reported this in his syndicated column a Cleveland Plain Dealer market story revealed that "hogs yesterday lost 15 cents of their recent advance."

So goes aid to Britain.

A Communistic International Cabal—Members: President Roosevelt, Justice Frankfurter, Ambassador Winant, Harold Laski, Ernest Bevin, Harry L. Hopkins, and Benjamin Cohen

OF

HON. GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

ARTICLE BY AMOS PINCHOT

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Amos Pinchot:

DOES DANGEROUS INTERNATIONAL TIE-UP MENACE AMERICA?—ARE THE PRESIDENT AND HIS MORE INTIMATE ADVISERS BENT ON SETTING UP A SOCIALIST-LABOR GOVERNMENT IN THE UNITED STATES?

(By Amos Pinchot)

Are President Roosevelt and his more intimate advisers, in cooperation with the British Labor Party, bent on delivering the United States to socialism? Are they trying to turn our Government into a labor government, paralleling the effort of Bevin, Laski, and the English radicals, and our economic system into a collectivist system controlled, as in the European dictatorships, by one strong leader and his aides?

Have they seized upon the present defense crisis as an opportunity to discredit, then liquidate private enterprise? Is the administration taming a half puppet Congress with patronage and breaking its prestige, in order to forestall opposition to a socialist organization of society? Is it subordinating defense to politics, and politics, in the ordinary sense, to class war?

Has the President been taking a weak stand against strikes and violence in defense industries, for fear of losing the voting strength of organized labor? Is the New Deal, as Arthur Krock charges in the New York Times, preparing to stay in power "permanently"? And, if so, what are the influences surrounding Mr. Roosevelt and guiding him on this unconstitutional and un-American path?

These and similar questions are being asked by literally millions of intelligent, patriotic men and women—many of them new dealers or former new dealers—who have kept their faith in American institutions, and believe that a shift into collectivism and dictatorship would prove as disastrous here as it has abroad.

SEIZE-SEND BILL WAS THE TIP-OFF

The introduction of the so-called seizure bill S. 1579, authorizing the President to take over private property of "any kind or character," and keep it permanently, war or no war, emergency or no emergency, is an event of national and, I believe, international importance. It marks the latest advance in the administration's quickening drive toward socialism and dictatorship. And though, under pressure, Mr. Roosevelt has consented to modification of its terms, this does not change its original intention and significance.

Two circumstances make this bill especially important. One is that, though it has been in gestation for some time, it came to light soon after Prof. Harold Laski, intellectual center of the British Labor Party's executive committee, and confidential adviser of Mr. Roosevelt, Ambassador Winant, and Justice Frankfurter, announced that the purpose of British labor is to build "the first democratic socialist state in the modern world."

AMBASSADOR WINANT AND COHEN RETURN

The other is that when Ambassador Winant, whom Arthur Krock, in the New York Times, describes as "something of a dreamer on a brave new world," returned to this country on May 30, he brought with him Mr. Benjamin Cohen, who had accompanied the Ambassador to London in the capacity of "mentor." And Mr. Cohen is credited with being the author and draftsman of many of Mr. Roosevelt's radical bills.

The World-Telegram editorial of June 5, queries whether Mr. Cohen is the author of this bill, and says:

"There would be less apprehension if this sort of thing didn't fit so perfectly into a background established in peacetimes. We as a nation are willing to stand for almost anything in a war situation like the one we now face. But we cannot help viewing this seize-send bill, as a press-gallery wag dubbed it, as part of a pattern-for-power.

"Long before Hitler moved on Poland there was alarm in this country about concentration of authority in the Executive. Many were more inclined to blame a group around the President for needling him into this trend than they were to blame the President himself; the group of appointees who never had run for office but who 'had a program'."

From time to time not merely Mr. Clapper and Mr. Krock, but various well-informed Washington correspondents, have referred to a remarkable international tie-up, which is playing a delicate but increasingly revealed hand in Anglo-American politics.

IDENTITY OF "KEY" MEN IN TIE-UP REVEALED

This tie-up, described as being based on the friendship and identity of "ideological aims," existing between certain key men in the United States and Britain, is said to include the President, Justice Frankfurter, Mr. Ernest Bevin, British Minister of Labor, who led the general strike in 1926, and, it is predicted, will lead the drive to carry England into socialism at the war's end, and Prof. Harold Laski of the University of London.

Also there are Harry L. Hopkins—lately returned from a London mission, and now living in the White House as administrator of the lend-lease bill—Ambassador John G. Winant, former head of the International Labor Office at Geneva, who, according to Clapper, "is not so much an Ambassador to the Court of St. James's as an Ambassador to the Court of Mr. Bevin," and Mr. Benjamin Cohen, general utility man and bill drafter extraordinary to the White House.

What is the meaning of this small, close corporation of internationally minded and exceedingly powerful men, friends of each other and, with the exception of Bevin, of President Roosevelt? And, in particular, who is Harold Laski, their intellectual switchboard, regarded by many people familiar with Washington affairs as having, directly or indirectly, more influence on the President than any one individual, with the exception of Justice Frankfurter?

Professor Laski is a small, ageless, rather inconspicuous man, who rarely raises his voice. While in this country he is often a guest and sometimes a house guest at the White House, but he has not been in America since 1939. The President, says the New York Times, has known him since the old days when Laski was at Harvard, more than 20 years ago. He is possessed of a bitter hatred of private enterprise and the profit motive and a bear-trap memory which, together with his wide reading and talent for apt, if overprofuse quotation, gives the impression of profound culture, an impression that is probably deserved.

LASKI MADE EMPHATIC DEMANDS

Undoubtedly Laski's place in British affairs is a considerable one. At the recent annual conference of the British Labor Party it was he who announced that if the Government did not accord his party more representation in certain matters it would cease to cooperate, war or no war. A dispatch in the New York Herald Tribune on June 3 reads, in part:

"Harold Laski, a member of the Labor Party executive committee, declared that unless Labor is given representation in the Ministry of Information's direction and in the B. B. C., 'the possibility of our continuing to cooperate will no longer exist as far as this party is concerned.'"

This, however, is not the first time Professor Laski has taken a stand of this kind. For in April 1939, he appeared at a peace convocation at the University of Wisconsin, and addressed the student body as follows:

"Should war be forced upon us and we see the old, ugly, imperialistic aims dominating the rules of the democracies, we of the Labor Party and the working class everywhere see it as our duty to turn those wars into civil wars and remake those governments which disregard the working classes which are their foundations."

In other words, with the fanaticism so common to left-wing philosophers and reformers, Laski is not averse to dragging his own and other countries through the hell of civil war in order to reach his socialist Utopia. It might be asked which war he is most concerned about—the war with Germany or the class struggle? And a similar inquiry might be addressed to President Roosevelt. Has he been more interested in not offending the leaders of organized labor, who have been his political allies, than in building our defenses and helping Britain?

ACTIVE AS LECTURER IN THE UNITED STATES

Professor Laski is almost as well known in this country as in England, having served as guest lecturer in many American universities, including Yale, Harvard, Columbia, Amherst, Williams, University of Washington, George Washington University, University of North Carolina, University of Pennsylvania, et cetera. Recently he was retained as lecturer by the Cutting and the Carnegie foundations, the latter being especially interested in promoting Union Now, that is to say an immediate British-American offensive and defensive alliance.

He is an indefatigable writer of books and magazine articles. In the June 3 issue of the New Masses, Mr. A. B. Magil says that Laski, a contributor to that paper in 1939, is the author of 20-odd books. Magil regards Laski "in recent years known as a Left Socialist, an advocate of the United Front with the Communists," as a backslider fallen from grace, presumably because he did not support the Russian experiment after the Russo-German pact. Nevertheless, he has probably done more than any other man to teach our younger generation disbelief in our economic and political systems and distrust of the Constitution and the way of life it sustains.

Like Mr. Roosevelt, Professor Laski has regarded the Supreme Court as "a problem." According to an Associated Press dispatch of January 5, 1939, he "let out a shout of joy today when he learned Felix Frankfurter had been named to the Supreme Court," and said he had previously discussed the matter with Mr. Roosevelt.

FOLLOWS LINE OF PROFESSOR RUGG

As to the Constitution, Professor Laski follows the line of our own Professor Harold Rugg. In his 1940 book, The American Presidency, he sees its makers as selfish, greedy men, whose interest in freedom was illusory.

"They feared the masses. They were adamant about the 'rights' of property. Liberty to them predominantly meant protection of vested interests from the invasions of the multitude."

For a long time adviser of the President, lately Professor Laski has performed important services for him. For example, last summer, in the strategic month of August, when the third-term campaign was getting under way, he brought out The American Presidency, an eloquent, ably argued defense of the third-term proposition and a plea for clothing the Chief Executive with enormous powers at the expense of Congress and the several States. In passing, it may be said it also was a gushing eulogy of President Roosevelt.

"As things are, leadership can come from the President alone; for reasons that I shall discuss later, there is no other source of direction which can secure the attention of the whole nation."

"But when all possible deductions have been made, there is no problem of which it cannot be said that it may be material upon which the President, and no one but the President, must make up his mind."

And again:

"A President limited by the will of Congress is always like a sailor on an uncharted sea; he cannot proceed with certainty upon his course."

Almost simultaneously, another book appeared, Democracy and the Third Term, by Prof. Fred Rodell, of Yale, a pupil and disciple of Laski's at the University of London. This volume, like The American Presidency, is a defense of the third term.

ROOSEVELT PROGRAM INSPIRED BY LASKI

Many young Socialists declare that what is generally called the Roosevelt program is, in reality, the Laski program, imposed on New Deal thinkers, and finally on the President, by the London professor of economics and his friends. The idol of our squab intellectuals, and some of the older ones, Laski has for years not merely denounced capitalism, and especially free enterprise and the profit motive, for which he finds no place in civilized society, but advocated public ownership, not merely of essential industries but of all the land. This proposition is embodied in the seizure bill.

Laski has preached the doctrine sustained by Lenin and all good Communists—which was incorporated in the President's message of January 6—that the great, messianic reform that is to free the people of the world must take place simultaneously everywhere in the world. In all probability, when Mr. Roosevelt wrote this concept into his January message, he was unaware of its Marxian genealogy.

WRITES WEEKLY LETTER TO FRANKFURTER

According to a reliable informant, Professor Laski carries on a correspondence with the President, and writes a weekly letter to Justice Frankfurter, who transmits it to the White House for discussion. Whether the letter is weekly or not, it is certain that he keeps in close touch with the inner circle of the New Deal.

Obviously, there is no reason why the President should not have as many left-wing friends and correspondents as he pleases. But, as Chief Executive of a nation whose Constitution guarantees security for private property, private enterprise, and the profit motive, it does not behoove him to surround himself with men like Laski, Hopkins, Frankfurter, Cohen, and Winant, all sales agents of the brave new world in which the American tradition, that has served this country so well, and made it the promised land for so many people, would be discarded and forgotten.

DOESN'T RECOIL AT REVOLUTION

That Mr. Laski's mind does not recoil at the thought of violent revolution is evidenced in his article in Harper's Magazine of April 1941, apparently written as a favor to the Roosevelt administration, in order to blast Ambassador Kennedy, who refused to go along with the President's foreign policy, and was superseded by Laski's friend, John Winant. Here he says that he doubts that the necessary job of socialist reform "can be accomplished by consent." Elsewhere he points out that there are two things either of which will bring about revolutionary reform. One is bankruptcy, the other war. Seemingly our idealistic "dreamers on a brave new world" are not unwilling to try both at once, with class struggle thrown in for good measure.

One of my few contacts with Professor Laski was at Yale University, at a time when he was sojourning as resident professor. After a dinner given by a mutual friend, I spent the evening with him at his rooms, where he expressed the opinion that communism was the only real answer to the world's difficulties. I do not hesitate to quote this since he has expressed the same view publicly in his writings.

Some of Professor Laski's books have received favorable attention from Mrs. Roosevelt. His most recent book, Where Do We Go From Here, Viking Press, 1940, was recommended by her, and also by Ralph Bates. British propagandist for communism until the Hitler-Stalin pact, who described it as "The best statement on the issues of the war yet to come out of Britain."

Laski's main thesis in "Where Do We Go From Here?" seems to be that what the world needs most is wiping out the individual sovereignties of nations and building, in their stead, an "international organization" under a Socialist-Labor government. Only thus, he says, can we achieve the "more abundant life" which capitalism makes impossible.

Endowed with a subtler and, I think, more powerful mind than his friend, Justice Frankfurter, whom he introduced in England as a college lecturer, Professor Laski, when at his best, argues his case with a more thorough build-up, superimposed on a broader, better-documented foundation. Nevertheless, Frankfurter has lately shown a remarkable degree of dialectic subtlety in his opinion in the Phelps-Dodge case.

In this remarkable document, by an imaginative extension of the Wagner Act, which prescribes a penalty for employers who refuse to reinstate employees discharged because of union affiliations, he puts into the law a doctrine which Congress obviously did not intend, to wit, that an employer must not only hire, but give back pay to applicants for jobs who were refused employment because of union affiliations.

As Mr. Raymond Moley points out in Newsweek, this decision puts the employer in a strange position, where he invites penalties every time he declines to employ a man belonging to a union. And it also establishes a new and unconstitutional process of lawmaking, by which the Supreme Court can read into a statute almost anything it may deem socially desirable.

Professor Laski is not by any means all out in his advocacy of communism. He does not hesitate to criticize some of Marx' theories. And he deprecates the mistakes of the Russians, but does not deprecate them very hard. So far as I know, throughout his writings, he does not object, except in vague, indirect terms, to the blood-soaked regimes of Lenin, Stalin, or of Leon Trotsky, who, though considered less addicted to frightfulness than Stalin, nevertheless will go down to history as having invented the plan of making hostages of the families of political officeholders, in order to insure their loyalty to the party.

COMMUNISM A "NOBLE EXPERIMENT"

Laski pictures communism as a great and noble experiment that has brought "exaltation to the common man." Lenin is his "ideal leader." And he compares communism to early Christianity, whose doctrines, he says, seemed as foolish to the adherents of the Roman system as communism to the believers in capitalism.

One of Professor Laski's friends is Mr. Maynard Keynes, of the British treasury. Mr. Keynes lately arrived in America, thus joining the band of distinguished Britishers whose function is to shape the President's policies and instruct him and Congress in running the affairs of our country. Mr. Keynes, it will be remembered, was the economist who won the President to the disastrous pump-priming and big-spending program, which had been rejected by Mr. Keynes' own government.

At present, Mr. Keynes is advocating, for the United States, a capital levy of such huge proportions that it would necessitate an immense quick sale of privately held securities. As it is inconceivable that anyone could buy these securities en masse, except some Government agency like the R. F. C., this step would constitute a long and effective stride into government ownership of industry. Mr. Laski is an admirer of Mr. Keynes, and Mr. Keynes, like Mr. Laski, an admirer of collectivism. In his book, Communism, Laski quotes Keynes as praising communism on the ground that it reduces the importance of the profit motive.

Among Professor Laski's outstanding traits are the consistency with which he expresses distaste for capitalism and the profit motive, and the earnestness with which he longs for a revolution, bloody or otherwise, that will bring about what he calls a democratic socialist order. He is willing to have the British Labor Party break with the Government, if that will result in socialism. And he is willing to recommend civil war, as he did in Wisconsin, if the socialist order cannot be had in any other way.

Like President Roosevelt, he is hostile to the Churchill-Beaverbrook group in the British Government, whom he regards as dangerous Tories, to be tolerated only for purposes of waging war. And no doubt, like the President, he was chagrined at the appointment of Lord Halifax as Ambassador to the United States, and would have vastly preferred a laborite. He sees in Churchill a great fighting spirit, but outside of that a thoroughly undesirable influence on England.

LASKI TOOK CHURCHILL TO TASK

On April 12 the Washington Post published an article by Laski scolding Churchill, and stating that, after the victory, he would not remain in office long unless he approached "the peace in the spirit of President Roosevelt's address to Congress last January." That was the message in which Mr. Roosevelt dedicated America to bringing democracy and the four freedoms to every people "everywhere in the world" and performing this modest task within our generation. One sometimes wonders whether Mr. Laski was not coauthor of that stupendous utterance.

As one reads the Laski books and articles one finds little recognition of America's accomplishments in attaining the highest standard of living, and the widest spread of material welfare that have been known at any time in history. This fact does not seem to impress him. It does not impress him because as a follower of the Communist theory, it would never do to admit that a nation that pursues another theory has performed a service to itself or mankind.

For the same reason, if one called his attention to the fact that the United States has become the country to which people from all over the world have flocked, this would fail to modify his low opinion of our system. As is the rule with so many radicals, if a fact is inconsistent with a theory, it is the theory, not the fact, that has the right-of-way.

In a very able and too little-read book, The Revolt of the Masses, Ortega y Gasset states that, from the time European history began in the sixth century up to 1800, "Europe did not succeed in reaching a total population greater than 180,000,000 inhabitants." But from 1800 to 1914, the era in which capitalism and its fecund economic system was developing, the rise in living standards brought an increase in the European population of from 180 to 460 millions. And the same capitalism has resulted in a similar but faster upsurge in this country.

But nothing must be allowed to refute the glorious creed of communism which, according to Laski, "builds its temple upon spiritual heights." And to give substance and authority to this creed, which is being discredited all over the world for the simple reason that it builds its temple, not on spiritual heights, but on spiritual coercion and degradation, Laski, with the packrat mind so typical of radicalism, borrows here, there, and everywhere, fragmentary bits of evidence to sustain an argument that finally shows up, even under casual analysis, as a patchwork of unrelated parts.

Coupled with this, and perhaps related to it, is another tendency, the tendency to obscurantism, that is to say, to surround one's statements with a haze of mystery as well as authority, in order to make the reader believe that the writer is a deep and learned individual, accustomed to dealing with matters beyond the common range of understanding. Scattered through Professor Laski's works one encounters passages like the following, from "Communism":

"With Bossuet, and, in a sense, with Vico, that lesson is the dominion of Providence over the effort of mankind; with Fichte, it is the victory of reason, of free inquiry, over the blind demands of faith; with Bonald and de Maistre it is the necessity of religion as the one power able to compel that subordination without which men are the necessary victims of anarchic disorder.

No wonder American intellectuals, whose chronic failing is that the one thing they cannot do is think, are wont to throw up their hands and cry "Kamerad" before the professor's blitzkrieg of literary allusion and ornamental, if confusing, words.

SHOWS HATRED OF CAPITALISM

In the same book, Communism, we find the author back on his favorite theme, to wit, that greedy capitalism is responsible for most of the world's ills. He has just quoted his friend Keynes to the effect that capitalism, in order to survive, must be successful. Certainly this is not a very complicated or abstruse idea. Nevertheless, he embellishes it with the following cryptic sentence calculated to reduce even the most skeptical to surrender:

"It is no longer either optimistic or self-confident as it was in the days of Nassau Senior and McCulloch."

He does not pause to explain who Nassau Senior and McCulloch may be. That is unnecessary. For on the previous page he has already weakened his readers for the coup de grace by hurling Savonarola, St. Francis of Assisi, and George Fox into the fray.

Coming back to his The American Presidency, we find Laski giving reasons for his admiration for President Roosevelt, whom he considers, in some respects, the superior of both Lincoln and Wilson. He says that, while Lincoln was rarely able to select the right human instruments for his purposes, Roosevelt proved his ability by putting Harold Ickes in his Cabinet.

"Franklin Roosevelt has possessed it [the ability], as he showed when he chose, in remarkable circumstances, Mr. Ickes to be his Secretary of the Interior."

Why single out Harold Ickes, of all people? For Ickes' chief claims to fame seem to be the attacks he has made on the press, his talent for unbridled and often silly invective, and the fact that one of his official functions is to say the things which the dignity of the Presidency forbids Mr. Roosevelt to say for himself. To this may be added the fact that, over a national network, Mr. Ickes advised the American public to read Lords of the Press, an untruthful and violent assault on American newspapers and capitalism, written by a feature writer for the Daily Worker.

I have written at length and somewhat critically about Professor Laski—not doubting, however, that he sincerely believes in the doctrines he has been preaching for so many years—because he is an important factor, and perhaps the integrator, of an international group consisting, as I have said, of Felix Frankfurter, Harry Hopkins, Benjamin Cohen, John Winant, the President, and probably Ernest Bevin and others.

For the evidence shows that these men, guiding our national policy, are working to deliver the United States to socialism, including a labor or class government. And I am deeply convinced that socialism, with its intensive political control of the activities of the people, cannot be put over without resort to class hatred and violence, or practised without coercion and cruelty. And I also believe the American people will have the common sense to reject it, especially as a reaction against radicalism is already in evidence.

DICTATORIAL CONTROL OF OUR LIVES

What, after all, is this thing, variously called Hitlerism, communism, fascism, which is running its course through Europe? It is simply dictatorial government control of the economic, political, and personal lives of the people, enforced by militarism, and inspired by a vision of far-flung foreign domination.

In the last 4½ years we have seen our country, led by the President and his advisers, proceeding, all too rapidly, along this dark road. The judiciary bill to pack and control the Federal courts; the executive reorganization bill to move the powers of Congress into the President's hands; the Black-Connery so-called wage and hour, which, in its original version, was a bill to create a price-fixing and wage-fixing dictatorship over capital and labor; the May bill of 1938, aimed at arming the President with full censorship of the means of communication, and also, like the seizure bill, enabling him to rewrite, at his discretion, every contract entered into in the United States, whether between private persons and corporations, or between them and the Government; the bills providing for agricultural regimentation and price fixing; the President's efforts to place under political control medicine, insurance, railroads, and other enterprises and professions that should be private, competitive, and free.

And now comes the seizure bill to give the President authority to take over all private property, newspapers, and the radio included, forever. This is only the natural outcome of the New Deal's course.

WE TOLERATE HATEFUL FOREIGN PHILOSOPHY

America is a great country, even though it has drifted somewhat from its moorings in the last few years. But, with its clear and strong tradition of political life, brightened by the names of Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln, its decent, generous personal life, its fruitful industry, fertile land and the spirit of peace and progress that has made us really strong and great—why should we permit a foreign philosophy, hateful and unsuited to our people, to gain foothold in our midst? Why should we let little men, crusaders for a new toryism that calls itself liberalism, undermine our country and poison our national character?

Surely it is time for the believers in the real America to assert themselves.

Pertinent Questions and Answers Concerning the St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Project

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Washington, D. C., June 19, 1941.

Hon. JESSE JONES,
Secretary, Department of Commerce,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Certain questions regarding the St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Project have arisen in my mind, and I believe are likewise present in the minds of many others in and out of Congress.

Feeling that great good may be served by seeking out the facts that may furnish the answers to these questions, I am submitting them to you with a request that you answer them seriatim based upon the official information of the Department of Commerce.

Your assistance will be appreciated.

Very sincerely yours,

THE SECRETARY OF COMMERCE,
Washington, June 20, 1941.

Hon. LOUIS C. RABAUT,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Your letter of June 13, requesting information and reply to certain questions relating to the St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Project, has been received.

By direction of the President, this Department has been for more than a year engaged in an exhaustive study of the St. Lawrence Seaway Project. I am asking the director of the survey to supply you with the answers to the questions which you have presented.

With best wishes,

Sincerely yours,

JESSE H. JONES,
Secretary of Commerce.

Question. What is the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway and power project?

Answer. The project is a joint effort by the United States and Canada to develop the boundless natural resources of the Great Lakes Basin, to provide the Middle West with a deep-water outlet to the Atlantic Ocean, and to harness the torrential flow of the St. Lawrence River to produce waterpower.

To build the seaway it is necessary only to build a new lock at Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., to deepen the channels and canals linking Lakes Huron, Erie, and Ontario, and to improve the St. Lawrence River between Ogdensburg, N. Y., and Montreal, Quebec. Engineering plans call for reconstruction of the canals and locks already built by Canada to the St. Lawrence River and for construction of a main navigation and power dam across the river at Barnhart Island, between Massena, N. Y., and Cornwall, Ontario, and a small control dam farther up the river. With these improvements, a deep waterway extending 2,400 miles from Duluth, Minn., to the Atlantic would be provided.

The electricity developed at the International Rapids section would be shared equally by the United States and Canada. It is proposed also to redevelop existing hydroelectric power facilities on the Niagara River in order to expand power production in that area.

The entire cost of the project to the United States would be about $285,000,000—less than the cost of three battleships. Of the total cost, some $93,000,000 would be paid by New York State, and New York would be given control of the generation and distribution of electric power. The Federal Government's share will therefore be, roughly, $195,000,000.

Question. Would the seaway-power project impede or aid our defense program?

Answer. 1. By increasing the country's supply of transportation and electric power, the project would greatly strengthen our productive machine and thus strengthen our whole defense effort. As the situation now stands, we face shortages both in transportation and in power production. The St. Lawrence project offers the cheapest and most efficient means of averting shortages of this type in the tributary area of the Great Lakes.

2. Construction of the seaway would make possible full use of Great Lakes shipyards to expand and speed up our national shipbuilding program. Great Lakes yards are now operating far below capacity. The improved canals in the St. Lawrence River would be large enough to accommodate all types of naval vessels except battleships and aircraft carriers and all except the largest ocean freighters. If we began building cruisers on the Great Lakes now, the seaway would be ready for use by the time the cruisers were completed. Shifting cruiser construction from salt-water to fresh-water yards would speed up the Navy Department's building schedule by many months and would permit seacoast yards to devote a larger proportion of their facilities to the construction of urgently needed cargo ships. Nine to twelve freighters can be built in the time it takes to build one cruiser.

As President Roosevelt has said:

"Shipyards on the Great Lakes, with access to the ocean, yet close to the sources of supply of labor, raw and finished materials, further removed from possible attack, may be a vital factor in successful defense of this continent. They will help to build the ships which will bring back commerce to the harbors of the Atlantic coast ports."

3. The St. Lawrence project would strengthen our defenses in the Northeastern corner of the North American continent by giving us a protected inland-water route to our new military base at Newfoundland. At present, because there are no rail connections east of Quebec, all supplies and equipment for our Newfoundland base must be sent through the Atlantic sea lanes. In time of war this route might be hazardous, but with completion of the seaway defense materials could be sent down the St. Lawrence River to Newfoundland without fear of interference from enemy naval units.

Opponents assert that the St. Lawrence project would impede our defense effort (1) because 4 years would be required for its completion, and (2) because the project would divert men and materials needed for building planes, guns, and tanks.[1] How do these assertions square with the facts?

1. President Roosevelt has answered this criticism in the following terms:

"Opponents of the project have pointed out that it takes 4 years to build this seaway. They know, but fail to mention, that it takes at least that long to build a battleship. * * *

"We hope that the world situation may soon improve. But we are bound to be prepared for a long period of possible danger. * * * Only one who can say that we do not need the battleships that we are now building will dare to say that we do not need the essential Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway."

2. The St. Lawrence project would provide one of the largest single blocs of electric power on this continent. At a time when serious thought is being given to curtailment of civilian consumption of electricity to conserve power, it is the worst kind of folly to say that the St. Lawrence project would cause the diversion of men and materials from more useful purposes. The planes, guns, and tanks we need cannot be built without tremendous expansion of our facilities for producing electric power. As we need the power and must obtain it from some source, from any source, the St. Lawrence power project is an economy measure of the first magnitude. It is the cheapest source of power in America, and it will absorb less skilled labor than an equivalent steam plant.

Question. How would construction of the seaway affect the cost of shipping American wheat abroad?

Answer. Wheat is a bulk commodity carrying traditionally low shipping charges by water. With construction of the seaway, the savings in shipping charges from Duluth to Liverpool, as compared with the best possible alternative route, would amount to 5.2 cents a bushel, or $1.74 a ton.[2]

Question. Would savings in the cost of shipping wheat abroad mean savings to American wheat farmers?

Answer. Yes.

It has been asserted that reductions in the cost of exporting wheat over the seaway would merely reduce the price of wheat in the world market, and that potential savings to American farmers would thus be canceled out.[3] This assertion is false. The price of wheat reflects all the influences at work in all the wheat-producing areas of the world. Basically, the price is determined by supply and demand, not by cost of production. Lowering the production costs of wheat farmers in the Great Lakes tributary area by lowering their transportation costs would by no means lower the world wheat price by an equivalent amount. The reduction in transportation costs would amount to a bonus for American farmers.

Question. Would construction of the seaway result in the dumping of foreign wheat in our domestic markets, as is claimed by opponents of the St. Lawrence project?[4]

Answer. No.

Great Lakes ports have now, and after the construction of the seaway would continue to have, the same protection against dumping of cheap foreign products that Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific ports enjoy. The present import tariff rate on wheat is 42 cents a bushel. This tariff would be imposed at the ports of Buffalo, Chicago, or Duluth, on the Lakes, just as it is imposed now at the ports of New York, New Orleans, or Los Angeles. And the same factors which prevent the dumping of foreign wheat into our markets would prevent the dumping of other foreign goods and commodities.

Question. Are opponents of the seaway correct in asserting that navigation conditions on the St. Lawrence River would be so hazardous that shipping lines would not take the risk of sending their vessels over this route?

Answer. No.

Construction of the seaway would vastly improve present navigation conditions in the 183-mile section of the St. Lawrence River between the lower end of Lake Ontario and Montreal. Existing channels and canals would be enlarged and deepened, and the 22 small locks now in operation would be replaced by 8 larger ones. These and other improvements would greatly reduce hazards to shipping.

But even now, with the projected improvements still in the blueprint stage, navigation conditions on the St. Lawrence are good.[5] The heavy volume of traffic which already passes through the shallow canals in the International Section is the best proof of that. More than 8,000,000 tons of freight moved through these canals in 1938. Some 5,900 vessel trips were needed to carry this freight. About 115,000 tons of freight moved

[1] Both of these assertions are made, for example, by the National St. Lawrence Project Conference, in its pamphlet For National Defense? The conference states that: "The United States is engaged in the tremendous task of rearming—now—for eventualities which, if they are ever to happen, will happen soon. * * * To divert from that pressing task the men, machines, materials, and money which so stupendous a project as the St. Lawrence scheme would require would be a handicap, not a help, to national defense."

[2] The rate for wheat shipments from Duluth or Chicago to Liverpool via the seaway is conservatively estimated at 9.6 cents a bushel. During the 15-year period 1924–38 the lowest average rate for wheat exported from Duluth to Liverpool over any of the various existing routes was 14.8 cents a bushel. This was the average rate over the all-water route through the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River via Buffalo and Montreal.

[3] For example, it has been stated that: "In normal times the price of grain was invariably determined at Liverpool, so that reduction in transportation costs inured not to the benefit of the American producer but to the benefit of grain factors in foreign ports."—Expense Without Recompense (National St. Lawrence Project Conference, 1941), page 6.

[4] In its pamphlet Two Ways for Farmers to Lose Money, the National St. Lawrence Project Conference asks: "Why should the American taxpayers be called upon to spend hundreds of millions of dollars * * * to make it easier for foreign grain to be brought into the markets of the United States?"

directly between Great Lakes and European ports in shallow draft ocean freighters.

As to the assertion that ocean shipping lines would be unwilling to risk sending their vessels through the proposed seaway, the testimony of the late Robert Dollar, founder of the Dollar Steamship Lines, should be revealing. In a letter read to a subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee during the 1933 hearings on the St. Lawrence Treaty, Mr. Dollar said:

"Ships will certainly go to the Lakes for cargo; in fact, ships will go anywhere and everywhere to get cargoes. We have big ocean-going steamers running 1,000 miles to the Yangtze River, where the current is very swift and navigation quite difficult, far more difficult than it would be going to Lake Superior from Montreal.

"When the canal is finished there is no more reason for doubting that ships will go from the ocean to the Great Lakes than there is that ships will go to any port on the Atlantic seaboard."

Question. What proportion of United States and world shipping could make use of the proposed seaway?

Answer. The world's freighter fleet, excluding combination passenger-cargo ships, consisted of 6,400 vessels on December 31, 1939. Of this number, 4,540—7 out of every 10 freighters—would find safe and convenient navigation in the 27-foot canals on the St. Lawrence River. The United States freighter fleet consisted of 800 ships, of which more than 500—5 out of every 8—could easily navigate the seaway. A still higher proportion of United States and world shipping could make use of the seaway under certain conditions—if larger vessels carried less than full load, or if their cargoes consisted of commodities having light density, such as cotton, jute, or burlap.[6]

Although the seaway would safely accommodate a large proportion of the ships now in service, it should be borne in mind that shipping lines make a practice of designing their new vessels to fit the type of service for which these vessels are to be used. With completion of the seaway, therefore, many new ships specially adapted to conditions on the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence route would be built.

Question. What effect would the seaway have on ocean ports like New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore?

Answer. 1. As the eastern export center of the United States, New York stands to lose a small proportion of the foreign trade which now passes through its harbor. Some of the goods and commodities which now move through New York would undoubtedly be shipped by direct water route between Great Lakes ports and foreign countries. But the St. Lawrence survey estimates that total diversion of foreign traffic from the port of New York would amount at most to 1,800,000 tons a year. This would represent only 1.6 percent of the 109,000,000 tons of water-borne commerce which moves through New York Harbor in an average year.

Coastal and intercoastal shipping traffic in New York Harbor would actually be increased by completion of the proposed seaway. The St. Lawrence survey estimates that about 1,000,000 tons of existing traffic of this type—3 percent of average annual coastal and intercoastal traffic in New York—would be diverted to Great Lakes ports but that this loss would be more than made up by new water-borne traffic between New York and the Middle West. With completion of the seaway, grain, cereal products, meats, dairy products, and automobiles would be shipped from the Middle West into New York Harbor, while iron and steel products, refined copper and zinc, brass, sugar, and other commodities would move from New York Harbor through the seaway into the Great Lakes region.

2. Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and other ocean ports can expect substantial gains in shipping traffic if the St. Lawrence project is constructed. Boston Harbor, in fact, would be one of the chief beneficiaries of the seaway. With little danger of existing traffic being diverted, Boston stands to gain a large volume of new commerce. New England imports large amounts of raw materials and foodstuffs from the Middle West, and with completion of the seaway project these would be shipped by water from the Great Lakes into Boston Harbor. At the same time, New England shoes, machinery, fish, and other products would move from Boston Harbor to Buffalo, Cleveland, Chicago, and other ports on the lakes. A similar increase in water-borne commerce with the Middle West could be anticipated by other port cities along our seaboard.

Question. How would the seaway affect the economic life of Buffalo?

Answer. The St. Lawrence Survey has made an exhaustive study of the effect of the project on Buffalo's economic life. Its conclusions may be summarized as follows:

1. Buffalo will lose some of its grain transshipment traffic, but this loss will not amount to more than 700,000 tons a season—about one-fifth of the city's average annual lakewise grain receipts. Loss of grain traffic would involve the loss of the jobs of 200 workers in grain elevators and other waterfront occupations, or about one-twentieth of 1 percent of the total number of employed persons in the Buffalo area. At the same time, the loss in revenue to grain elevators is estimated at not more than $220,000 a year.

2. The possibility that Buffalo might lose its preeminent position in flour milling is remote. Flour mills will not lose their business when Buffalo becomes a deep-water port. Buffalo is an important milling center largely because it is accessible to the sources of grain supplies and because it is close to the markets for flour along the eastern seaboard. Its advantages in these respects will be enhanced by construction of the seaway. Moreover, flour exports from Buffalo, estimated at an average of 180,000 tons during the open season, would save as much as $525,000 a year in freight charges.

3. The iron and steel, machinery, and other major manufacturing industries of Buffalo would find increased foreign and intercoastal markets for their products. Iron and steel manufactures constitute by far the largest item in shipments from the Atlantic to the Pacific coasts. Yet Buffalo accounts for only a very small proportion of this commerce. In 1937, the intercoastal trade westward in iron and steel manufactures amounted to 1,370,000 tons, of which over 1,000,000 tons originated in Middle Atlantic ports. Buffalo, however, sent only 25,000 tons to the Pacific coast. It cannot compete in west-coast markets because it suffers from a transportation disadvantage relative to steel mills located along the Atlantic coast. The situation in regard to overseas exports of iron and steel products is similar.

In the light of these facts, it is obvious that construction of a deep-water outlet to the Atlantic will have an important bearing on Buffalo's steel industry, as well as on such other industries as machinery, chemicals, abrasives, aluminum, and metal alloys. Existing transportation disadvantages in reaching overseas and west-coast markets will be eliminated, and an expansion of sales in these markets can be expected. Since these industries are among the largest employers in the Buffalo area, even a small increase in sales would involve a large number of jobs. Moreover, increased shipments of iron and steel products, machinery, and other articles would stimulate increased receipts of ore, coal, limestone, and other raw materials, thus further increasing harbor traffic.

Question. What would be the effect of the seaway on Great Lakes carriers? Lake shipping companies fear that if the seaway is constructed they would lose their business to foreign vessels, built and manned by cheap labor, with the result that the wages of Lake seamen—now the highest in the world—would have to be reduced. What are the facts?

Answer. Foreign vessels would not be able to carry freight between American ports on the Great Lakes because of Federal laws prohibiting freight movements of this type except in ships of American construction and registry.[7]

In 1937 more than 87 percent of the United States water-borne commerce on the Great Lakes consisted of traffic in coal, iron ore, limestone, and unmanufactured steel—practically all destined for consumption within the tributary area. Traffic in these commodities would be largely unaffected by construction of the seaway. About 10 percent of total water-borne commerce consisted of miscellaneous products, most of which would likewise be unaffected by construction of the seaway. Less than 3 percent of the total consisted of grain and grain products, and a good part of this traffic represented domestic shipments.[8]

In view of the nature of traffic on the Great Lakes, it is doubtful that shipping companies would have to meet foreign competition on as much as 3 or 4 percent of their present business.

Question. What would be the effect of the seaway upon the railroads?

Answer. The seaway would increase the freight transport capacity of the United States by not more than 10,000,000 tons annually. In a good year, the railroads carry 1,000,000,000 tons of freight. If every ton of freight carried over the seaway consisted of products that otherwise would have been carried by the railroads, the diversion would amount to 1 percent of total rail freight traffic.

Actually the diversion of traffic from the railroads to the seaway shipping services would never amount to as much as 1 percent of the total rail traffic. There are two reasons for this.

1. The establishment of cheap water transportation would stimulate the shipment of some products which, because of high rail rates, are not now shipped at all, and which therefore would represent a net addition to existing traffic. That is what happened after the Panama Canal was built, and that is what would happen after construction of the seaway.

2. The growth of the population of the United States and the increases in its productivity require constant expansion of

This is a statistical trick. The obvious purpose is to convey the impression that only 5 percent of American shipping could use the seaway. The number of United States vessels of all types, as of the end of 1939, amounted to only 14 percent of the world fleet. Therefore, even if every United States vessel were able to navigate the proposed seaway, it would still be possible to say that "American-owned vessels of sufficiently shallow draft to ply the proposed waterway comprise only 14 percent of the world's merchant ship tonnage."

transportation facilities to handle the increasing volume of traffic. Hence, a large proportion of the water-borne commerce moving through the seaway would represent not freight diverted from the railroads but new traffic arising out of the needs of a growing population with rising standards of living. In building the seaway we would not be harming the railroads; we would be making it possible to handle freight traffic for which carrying capacity now in existence will not be adequate.

Competition of water carriers using the seaway might force the railroads to reduce their freight rates. In this case, freight traffic carried by the railroads would increase and it would be beneficial to the American people.

Certainly there is nothing in this situation that would hurt railroad labor.

Question. It is asserted that the proposed seaway would be "uneconomic" because it would be closed to shipping for nearly 5 months every winter due to ice in the Great Lakes. What are the facts?

Answer. The seven months during which the seaway would be open—from the first of May to the first of December—are the months when farmers ship their crops to market and when demands for rail and other transport facilities are greatest. Thus the seaway would dovetail into our national transportation pattern, relieving the strain on the railroads during the peak period.

The St. Mary's Canal at Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., is also ice-bound for 5 months every winter. It can hardly be said, however, that this canal is "uneconomic." The tonnage moving through it during the 7-month season exceeds the combined tonnage of the Panama and Suez Canals during a 12-month season.[9]

Question. How much power would the St. Lawrence power project produce?

Answer. The St. Lawrence development would be the second largest single-dam power source in the world—both in terms of installed capacity and in terms of average annual production of electric energy—being exceeded in size only by Grand Coulee.

The comparative size of the St. Lawrence power project is indicated by the following table:

	Grand Coulee	St. Lawrence	Boulder
Ultimate installed capacity (kilowatts)	1,944,000	1,650,000	687,500
Annual average production (1,000 kilowatt-hours)	14,225,000	11,563,200 [1]	4,380,000

[1] Assuming full development at 80 percent load factor.

The St. Lawrence would have a generating capacity of 2,200,000 horsepower, half of which would be made available to the United States and half to Canada. At some future date existing hydroelectric power facilities at Niagara Falls would be redeveloped to provide an additional 787,500 horsepower of capacity.

Question. Where would the power generated on the St. Lawrence River be distributed?

Answer. The power actually generated on the St. Lawrence would be distributed throughout an area within a 300-mile radius of Massena, N. Y., thus making it possible to supply New York City, the Buffalo industrial area, and a part of New England.[10]

[9] An average of 63,069,722 tons of freight passed through the locks at Sault Ste. Marie every year during the period 1935–39. During the same period the annual average freight tonnage through the Panama Canal was 30,687,985, while the comparable figure for the Suez Canal was 29,899,000.

[10] The Niagara Frontier Planning Board (in the St. Lawrence Seaway Project, 1940) asserts that: "Neither New York City nor western New York is a practical market for St. Lawrence power: Under existing delivery conditions, power from nearer sources is more practical and economical for these areas."

This assertion is contradicted by the engineering studies of the New York State Power Authority. The more economical generation of hydroelectric power more than compensates for transmission charges within a 300-mile radius of the dam site. The cost of St. Lawrence power delivered to downstate domestic consumers, according to the Power Authority's estimates, would be 1.8 cents per kilowatt-hour in New York City. Power generated by steam at present costs domestic consumers in New York City 6.03 cents per kilowatt-hour.

However, by shifting loads over existing and contemplated transmission lines, St. Lawrence power could be made available, in an emergency, throughout an area bounded by Chicago on the west, Washington, D. C., on the south, and Boston on the north.

Question. Would steam power be cheaper than St. Lawrence hydro power? Opponents of the seaway-power project contend that it would be more economical to produce the electric energy we need by building steam-power plants than by harnessing the flow of the St. Lawrence River.[11] Is this true?

Answer. In spite of the very great reduction in operating costs of coal-burning power plants in recent years, waterpower developed by publicly owned, multiple-use hydroelectric projects—such as the Tennessee Valley Authority, Bonneville, and Boulder Dam—is still the cheapest power in the United States.

According to the New York State Power Authority, the cost of power generated at the proposed dam on the St. Lawrence River will be less than 2 mills per kilowatt-hour, including all fixed charges and operating costs. The delivered cost, including all transmission expenses, will be approximately 2.55 mills. Equivalent power from steam-electric plants in New York State would cost 5.11 mills, not including any transmission expenses.[12] Thus St. Lawrence waterpower would cost only a little more than half as much as steam-generated power.

Question. How would the development of St. Lawrence power affect the electric-light bills of homes, farms, and factories?

Answer. The project would substantially reduce the rates of electricity to all classes of users in the area to be served. The St. Lawrence survey estimates that the average cost of power to farm and residential consumers would be reduced 64 percent below 1937 rates and the cost to commercial and industrial consumers 25 percent.[13] According to the figures of the New York State Power Authority, St. Lawrence power would mean savings amounting to $26,000,000 a year to all types of consumers.[14]

Question. How would the seaway-power project affect coal producers? The National Coal Association, representing bituminous-coal producers, fears that the seaway would (1) permit British and Nova Scotian producers to invade the present Canadian market for United States coal and (2) reduce railway coal consumption in the United States. At the same time, the association fears that (3) if power is developed in upper New York State by harnessing the flow of the St. Lawrence and Niagara Rivers, instead of by building steam-generating plants, a potential market for coal will be lost. How do these fears square with the facts?

Answer. 1. The United States produces about 450,000,000 tons of coal a year. It exports an average of 11,000,000 tons of anthracite and bituminous coal to Ontario and Quebec annually (not 19,000,000 tons, as claimed by the coal association). The bulk of our exports to Canada—an average of 8,700,000 tons—consists of bituminous coal shipped to the Province of Ontario. That British producers would not be able to invade this market after construction of the seaway is shown by the fact that we already sell nearly four times as much bituminous coal to the Province of Quebec, east of the International Rapids, as Britain does—during 1935–39 an average of 753,000 tons, as against 193,000 tons—and Quebec is a seaport province. If Britain cannot outsell us in Quebec now, she certainly cannot outsell us in Ontario after the seaway is built.

The only other possible source of competition for the Ontario bituminous market would be Nova Scotia. United States coal has nothing to fear from the small Nova Scotian mines, however, because the present output of these mines could not be increased more than 2,300,000 tons a year—and this probably at an increased cost.

Construction of the seaway would increase the freight capacity of the St. Lawrence canal system by 16,000,000 tons a year. About 10,000,000 tons of this capacity would be available for United States traffic so that only 6,000,000 tons would be left for Canadian traffic. Obviously, therefore, it would be a physical impossibility for British and Nova Scotian producers to ship 19,000,000 tons of coal a year through the seaway into Ontario markets, as the coal association asserts they would do if the seaway were completed. There is no such market to invade, and American coal is cheaper in Ontario than either British or Nova Scotian coal.

2. Construction of the seaway would not reduce the amount of coal now consumed by the railroads. If the seaway is built, however, a smaller amount of new railroad facilities will be needed to provide for future transport needs. Hence, the amount of additional coal which the railroads would otherwise use might be slightly reduced. It is a reduction from an increase.

If, 25 years ago, producers of oats had opposed the manufacture of automobiles on the theory that the new gasoline buggies would displace horses and thereby reduce the market for oats, their position would have been no more absurd than the present position of the coal producers on the St. Lawrence issue. Deep-water transportation is relatively less expensive than rail transportation. Yet the Coal Association opposes the seaway and advocates the expansion of high-cost rail facilities on the ground that this would increase the market for coal. Most people will be inclined to reject this kind of reasoning. They realize that economic betterment comes from lowering prices, not from raising them.

[11] In a press statement issued January 7, 1941, John D. Battle, secretary of the National Coal Association, said: "The St. Lawrence hydroelectric power facilities upon which the President is so insistent, will cost twice as much * * * as coal-burning electric generating plants of equivalent capacity." This statement may or may not be true, but in any event it refers only to the capital cost of generating equipment, not to the cost of the power actually produced.

After steam generating equipment was installed in New York State, coal would have to be brought in from other States to provide fuel. The fuel for the proposed power dam, on the other hand, would be the flow of the St. Lawrence River. That is why it would be cheaper, in the long run, to produce hydro power than it would be to produce steam power—even though the cost of installing steam-generating equipment might be somewhat less than the cost of installing hydro equipment.

3. The Coal Association contends that the hydroelectric power development contemplated on the St. Lawrence and Niagara Rivers would reduce the future coal market by "between 30,000,000 and 35,000,000 tons of coal annually." The association's arithmetic is bad. According to the best engineering estimates, 5,550,000 tons of coal would be required annually to generate steam power in an amount equal to proposed hydropower production on the St. Lawrence and Niagara Rivers. [15]

It by no means follows, however, that the St. Lawrence-Niagara hydro development would destroy a potential market for some 5,000,000 additional tons of coal at some future time. Experience in the southeastern States since the creation of the Tennessee Valley Authority strongly supports the conclusion that the development of cheap waterpower under public auspices has the effect of increasing the total demand for electrical energy, thus increasing the market for privately developed steam power.

Between 1934, when T. V. A. began operations, and 1940, the amount of coal used in the generation of electric energy in the southeastern States increased about 250 percent, whereas the increase in the United States as a whole was only 59 percent. The Coal Association charged in 1934 that T. V. A. was a "menace to the coal industry," but whereas only 540,000 tons of coal was used in the generation of electricity in the T. V. A. area in 1934, 1,891,000 tons was so used in 1940. There is no reason to doubt that the coal industry would be similarly affected by the St. Lawrence-Niagara development.

Far from reducing coal consumption, the St. Lawrence project would increase it. The cheap transportation and the cheap power made available in the Great Lakes Basin would stimulate industrial expansion. Growing industrial activity would mean growing markets for coal. For these reasons, it is clear that in opposing the seaway-power project the National Coal Association is opposing its own best interests.

Question. Would it be possible to meet the expanding power needs of defense industries more quickly by building steam plants than by going ahead with the St. Lawrence hydroelectric power development? [16]

Answer. Only a few areas in the country have abundant water resources that can be utilized for the development of cheap hydroelectric power. In most regions, power shortages resulting from expanding defense production can be averted only by building steam power plants. Manufacturers of steam turbines are now working overtime to produce generating equipment for steam-power stations, as well as propulsion units for hundreds of naval and merchant ships.

Although a lifelong opponent of public-power development, Gano Dunn, president of the J. G. White Engineering Corporation, last year urged Congress to authorize construction of a dam to produce additional hydroelectic power in the Tennessee Valley, in preference to steam plants, because of the necessity for speed in making power available to defense industries. Testifying before a Senate committee on July 10, 1940, Dunn explained his stand by pointing out that factories building steam turbines were "clogged up" with defense orders, whereas manufacturers of water wheels for hydroelectric power plants "are not busy, because everybody is building steam plants nowadays." Since this testimony, the situation has been further aggravated. Our two-ocean navy program alone will require over 10,000,000 kilowatts of turbine capacity.

Under present circumstances, therefore, it would take as long, or longer, to build steam-generating equipment capable of producing the huge amount of power to be made available under the St. Lawrence project than it would be to build the proposed dam at Massena, N. Y.

However, the whole question of whether steam or hydroelectric power can be made available more rapidly has become meaningless within the last few months. The reason: Power needs of expanding defense industries have increased so enormously that it is now clear that we must build all the generating equipment—both steam and hydro we are capable of producing—and even then we may not be able to meet future demands for electric energy.

[15] In arriving at an estimate of 30,000,000 to 35,000,000 tons as the annual loss to the coal market resulting from the St. Lawrence-Niagara hydro development, the coal association made three basic errors: (1) It assumed that the capacity of the project would be "6,000,000 to 7,000,000 horsepower of hydroelectricity," whereas the correct capacity figure is 2,987,000 horsepower, and of this only 1,887,000 horsepower would be available to the United States. (2) It assumed that all the turbines installed would be kept in operation 24 hours a day, 365 days a year, whereas the proposed installation could operate at capacity only 87.5 percent of the time. (3) It assumed that 1.41 pounds of coal would be required to produce 1 kilowatt-hour of electric energy, whereas all recent installations of large steam electric plants have an efficiency of 1 pound or less of coal per kilowatt-hour, the best plants having an efficiency of 0.9 pound.

Engineering estimates forecast an average annual production on the United States side of 11,100,000,000 kilowatt-hours for the combined St. Lawrence-Niagara project. On this basis, using an efficiency rate of 1 pound of coal per kilowatt-hour, the total amount of coal necessary to replace 1 year's production of hydro power on the St. Lawrence and Niagara Rivers would be 5,550,000 tons. Since all of this power would be sold to new customers, or to consumers who use more electricity because of lower rates, there would be no reduction or displacement of an existing market for coal.

[16] John D. Battle, secretary of the National Coal Association, asserted in a press statement of January 7, 1941, that: "The St. Lawrence hydroelectric power facilities * * * will * * * take three times as long to get ready as coal-burning electric generating plants of equivalent capacity."

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. SUTPHIN

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIAM DEVEREUX BYRON, late a Representative from the State of Maryland

Mr. SUTPHIN. Mr. Speaker, in the sudden and untimely passing of BILL BYRON of Maryland I have lost a friend. I rise to pay my respects to a genial and happy personality, whose warm friendship meant a great deal to me. A good father, loving husband, and able public servant has crashed to his death at the prime of his life. The manner of his passing, through some human fault, makes his death the harder to bear.

At the threshold of a great career in Congress, and with an outstanding record of public service to his city and State behind him, BILL BYRON, during his brief stay in this House endeared himself to all of us, and was an able Representative. His friendliness was a great contribution. His human qualities enriched this membership.

I admired also his fondness for his family and his devotion to his home. Yes, he was a good public servant, but the responsibilities of office, great as they were, never dimmed the human qualities that we loved.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. ERNEST LUNDEEN, late a Senator from the State of Minnesota

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, we are met today to pay tribute to our colleagues who have passed to the Great Beyond since our memorial exercises of last year.

All of our colleagues who have now passed away were men with whom it was our pleasure and privilege to serve in the Congress of the United States. This is a day for pleasant memories. We think of them as we knew them and admire their fine services in the House and Senate of the United States.

To live in hearts,
We leave behind
Is not to die.

Among those we honor and respect on this occasion is Senator ERNEST LUNDEEN, of Minnesota. I served with him in the House of Representatives and as our acquaintance ripened into friendship, I began to appreciate and value his fine record of public service and devotion to his country.

He was a militant man and had the courage of his convictions. He fought to make the world a better place in which the ordinary man and woman might live and enjoy the blessings of constitutional government.

His life was an inspiration and an example for those who hold high ideals on the political stage.

May I say of him as he said of a former colleague some years ago in memorial proceedings conducted in this House:

In the Valley of Decision,
Down the Road of Things-that-are,
You gave to us a vision,
You appointed us a star,

And through cities of Derision
We followed you from far.
On the Hills beyond Tomorrow,
On the Road of Things-to-do,
With what strength of hand we borrow,
As we borrow soul from you,
We know not sloth nor sorrow,
And we build your vision true.

Senator LUNDEEN was an able antagonist. He fought for every cause which he thought was right. Nothing could deter him from his course of conduct, and the following verse is most appropriate:

Out of the night that covers me,
Black as the pit from pole to pole,
I thank whatever gods may be
For my unconquerable soul.
In the fell clutch of circumstance,
I have not winced nor cried aloud;
Beneath the bludgeoning of chance,
My head is bloody but unbowed.
It matters not how strait the gate,
How charged with punishments the scroll,
I am the master of my fate;
I am the captain of my soul.

Our friend and colleague is no more. He has gone to that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns. But our Christian faith teaches us that there is a life beyond the grave, and that the soul of man never dies. In a beautiful land of somewhere, beyond the Great Divide, he lives to take up the higher and eternal tasks prepared for those who have left us.

And so we pay tribute to his memory and I close with the following fine sentiment:

IF LIFE WERE ALL

If life were all,
Where were the recompense
For all our tears?
The troubled toil
Of all the long-drawn years,
The struggle to survive
The passing show,
Were scarce worth while
If life were all.

If life were all,
What were it worth to live?
To build in pain,
So soon to learn
Our building were but vain,
And then to pass to some vain nothingness,
Were scarce worth while,
If life were all.

If life were all,
How might we bear
Our poor heart's grief,
Our partings frequent,
And our pleasures brief?
The cup pressed to the lips,
Then snatched away,
Were scarce worth looking on,
If life were all.

Life is not all,
We build eternally,
And what is ours today
To make existence such
Is ours always,
We stand on solid ground,
That lasts from aye to aye,
And makes earth's sojourn worth the while,
Life is not all, I say.

Life is not all,
I do not understand the plans;
I only know that God is good,
And that his strength sustains,
I only know that God is just;
So in the starless, songless night,
I lift my heart to Him and trust,
And God my spirit witness gives,
Life is not all.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. WILL ROGERS
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. SAMUEL CHAPMAN MASSINGALE, late a Representative from the State of Oklahoma

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, once each year we meet in memory of our departed comrades. It is fitting that we thus honor them. During the last 12 months four Members of the Senate and nine Members of the House of Representatives have started on that long journey from which no traveler returns. They are gone, but fond memories of them remain.

One of these Members, the Honorable SAM MASSINGALE, represented my native State of Oklahoma. I probably knew him longer than any other man who has ever been a Member of Congress. He came to Oklahoma as a young man. I met him nearly 40 years ago. We lived in the same county. As a barefoot boy, I walked the streets of Cordell, Okla., where SAM MASSINGALE, even as a young man, was becoming one of the outstanding lawyers in western Oklahoma. His reputation for industry, honesty, and fair dealing spread to the surrounding counties and enabled him in 1934 to be elected to represent the Seventh Congressional District of Oklahoma. He was an able Representative. His constituents had confidence in him and would undoubtedly have continued to send him to Congress for many years had death not taken him from us. No man in Congress had more friends than did SAM MASSINGALE. His colleagues loved him. Will Rogers once said, "I never met a man I did not like." I know that SAM MASSINGALE could have made that same statement, and I am confident that no one ever learned to know SAM MASSINGALE that did not like him. We miss him, but we are consoled by the knowledge that he lived a useful life. Even though SAM MASSINGALE has gone, he will live long in the hearts and minds of men.

M. Michael Edelstein

OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. M. MICHAEL EDELSTEIN, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following eulogy delivered by Rabbi Bernard Bergman, spiritual leader of the Home of the Sons and Daughters of Israel, 232 East Twelfth Street, New York, N. Y., at the funeral services of Congressman M. MICHAEL EDELSTEIN on June 6, 1941, at the Gramercy Park Memorial Chapel in New York City, N. Y.:

This afternoon is a sad and mournful one for us. It is overflowing with grief, for we are gathered here to pay our last respects to our dearly beloved leader of this community and great humanitarian, Congressman M. MICHAEL EDELSTEIN, who was near and dear to us.

In the literal sense there exists no need for me to extoll his manifold virtues, for they are common knowledge. He holds a warm spot in every one of our hearts, and he has earned that fondness and admiration through long years of unstinted readiness to help anyone who came to him. No special appointment was necessary to see our Congressman. There were no formalities needed to speak to our Congressman. His door, as well as his heart, was always open to all. He was an altruist, a philanthropist, a lover of mankind, always fair and just in his activities.

Congressman EDELSTEIN truly exemplifies the passage in the Talmud, "The loss of a righteous person is equal to the loss of a sanctuary." In the death of Congressman EDELSTEIN not only the Jews but all Americans mourn the loss of a true sanctuary, a human sanctuary, in which dwelt the spirit of God.

I care not how intelligent or accomplished one may be, I care not how successful or well-to-do one may be, if he does not lead a religious life, his life is without content. Congressman EDELSTEIN was a religious Jew, and thereby a religious American.

In addition thereto, he was a kind, generous and understanding soul, ever sympathetic, tolerant, and veritably the embodiment of the finest of man's virtues. In thinking of him I am reminded of a quotation of Shakespeare, "Even nature might stand up and say to the world, 'That was a true man!' "

Congressman EDELSTEIN did not use his office as a stepping stone to personal gain, nor as a means of self-praise and self-glorification, but rather as an instrument to help others, and serve humanity. He actually lived the words spoken by God in connection with the high official of ancient days, "And it shall be upon Aaron, the priest, to minister, to serve." It was not for mastery nor for fame, that the office of the priesthood was to be used. Congressman EDELSTEIN was a servant of the people, catering to their interests, ministering to their social and political needs.

It is most unfortunate that he was taken from us in the prime of his life, when his great usefulness to the Nation was becoming more and more apparent, especially during these critical hours, when our dear country is being assailed from within and without by enemies of our American way of living.

Congressman EDELSTEIN was truly a model American. His deep-rooted patriotism was well expressed in his last words in Congress, "We are living in a democracy. All men are created equal, regardless of race, creed, or color; and whether a man be a Jew or a gentile, he may think as he deems fit."

For these ideals Congressman EDELSTEIN was ready to sacrifice his life. He really overworked himself that democracy might live, and it may truly be said he was a martyr to democracy.

Only a few days ago, when he attended the holiday services at the synogogue I officiate, did I learn how deeply he was concerned over the wave of antidemocracy and un-American-ism. He was a true interpreter of the ideals of democracy—a true interpreter of the soul of America. All he aimed and battled for in Congress was to bring all the blessings of American liberty to all the people in America. Yes; he lived for his people—and died for his people. May his soul enjoy eternal life. Amen.

OF

HON. J. PARNELL THOMAS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. GEORGE NICHOLAS SEGER, late a Representative from the State of New Jersey

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, mine was a long and pleasant acquaintance with the Honorable GEORGE NICHOLAS SEGER. His district and mine adjoined. Mr. SEGER possessed a warm, congenial personality. His kindliness endeared him to his acquaintances, and this was evidenced by the spirit of respect and friendship which the people showed him. These qualities, together with his high character and his devotion to his duty, made him an impressive figure in his home city of Passaic and in his district.

I was one of the committee of Members who attended his funeral, and I have seldom witnessed a similar occasion where I saw stronger evidences of love and respect for the dead than was shown by the great concourse of his fellow citizens who gathered to pay a last tribute to their friend. In this tribute paid him by the people who knew him best, it was plain that they felt they had lost even more than a friend.

As a public official Mr. SEGER was unselfish and public spirited to a high degree; as a citizen and businessman, he was progressive, energetic, broad-minded; as a friend to thousands, regardless of race, religion, or politics, he was loyal, sympathetic, thoughtful, always possessing a rare capacity for consideration for the man or woman who needed his assistance.

Those who were privileged to know him intimately—and that number was legion—knew Mr. SEGER to be a Christian gentleman, a faithful and honorable public servant, and a man who valued his personal friendships as his greatest asset in life. And no better eulogy can be paid to any man than that.

To the friends and relatives of Mr. SEGER comfort and solace may be had in this sad hour by reflection upon the life he lived and the friends he made. In their hearts he still lives in loving memory.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. RUDOLPH G. TENEROWICZ

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. PIUS LOUIS SCHWERT, late a Representative from the State of New York

In the long vista of years to roll
With me his memory nor his honor fade;
And though other land retain his soul,
He lives also here
In the results of his deeds and friendships made.

Mr. TENEROWICZ. Mr. Speaker, I have heard and read many of the glowing tributes which have been paid to the memory of the late Representative PIUS LOUIS SCHWERT, from New York, and I feel with them that any attempt to express our deep feelings over his untimely passing seems inadequate.

I feel a deep sense of personal loss at the passing of my friend. He was affable, lovable, a student of human nature endowed with a God-given understanding of the problems of the underprivileged. He was an able and astute student of political economy, and he represented his people well. His ambition at all times was to better living conditions for his people.

PIUS SCHWERT was elected as United States Representative to the Seventy-sixth Congress and reelected to the Seventy-seventh Congress. I learned to admire his fine qualities from an intimate and practically daily contact with him and knew him to be an outspoken and courageous representative of his people.

Mr. SCHWERT was a partisan because the history of his country convinced him both theories were American, but he chose the Democratic theory. He served his country during the World War as an officer of the United States Navy. One of his chief interests was for the veterans of the World War, and because of his keen sense of understanding, justice, and genuine ability he was appointed by President Roosevelt to serve on the President's Special Review Board for Veterans' Compensation Cases.

He had a deep affection for youth and worked unceasingly to develop their athletic leanings. Early in youth and later he played professional baseball. During the years of 1914, 1915, 1916, and again in 1921 he played with Jersey City, Newark, Buffalo, and with the New York Yankees.

PIUS SCHWERT had the happy faculty of making enduring friendships wherever he went. The Nation has lost a great servant and statesman and the Congress has lost a diligent student of political economy, so sorely needed at the present critical moment in our history. His constituents have lost a truly worthy Representative and his family have lost their inspiration. In his passing I have lost a friend.

OF

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. GEORGE NICHOLAS SEGER, late a Representative from the State of New Jersey

Mr. SUTPHIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay my respects to my colleague, the gentleman from New Jersey, GEORGE N. SEGER, who, after nine terms of consecutive service in this body has passed to his greater reward. Respected, and much loved by his colleagues and by the people he served, he has earned an honored place among those who served State and Nation.

GEORGE SEGER is remembered for his kindliness, for his conscientious service in this House, and for the personal and understanding manner in which he helped the people of his constituency. His service was beyond partisanship, beyond what many would consider the responsibility of a Member.

This venerable gentleman from across the aisle was my friend, and was a friend to every Member in the House. He radiated geniality, and in his full life of three score and fifteen years was never known to bear enmity toward anyone.

Revered, loved, and respected, GEORGE SEGER carved a niche for himself in the hearts of all who knew him.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. ALBERT THOMAS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD, late a Senator from the State of Texas

Mr. THOMAS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, in the passing of Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD, Texas lost her most distinguished son, the Nation an outstanding leader, and thousands of individuals like me, a very dear friend.

The Senator was a most unusual man. I say unusual, because I realize that this great Nation has legions of capable and patriotic men; but those characteristics alone do not reflect the true greatness of MORRIS SHEPPARD. His gentleness, his deep-seated love for even-handed justice and fair play, his unyielding devotion to duty; and his eagerness to be of service to all, indelibly stamped him as a leader that the Nation could ill afford to lose even in normal times, much less during this world-wide upheaval.

As chairman of the important Military Affairs Committee of the Senate, his intimate and thorough understanding of the human problems of war, of our Army with its hundreds of thousands of men, of the dislocations attendant with the rearming of the Nation—gave the United States, before his untimely passing, a program that will protect and save our Nation and its institutions; and will enshrine his name in the hearts of the living and of men yet to be born.

His lovely family has suffered an irreparable loss, and so has the Nation. His admirable examples in the art of living and in being a real man will keep him with us.

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. SUTPHIN

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. M. MICHAEL EDELSTEIN, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. SUTPHIN. Mr. Speaker, the sudden passing of the gentleman from New York, Mr. M. MICHAEL EDELSTEIN, in the place to which he was elected by the the people of the Fourteenth Congressional District of New York, lost to the Nation a Representative known for his humanity, for his earnest endeavor on behalf of everyday people who turned to him in the extremity of their need.

MICHAEL EDELSTEIN understood people. He knew that every man needs a friend, and he was a friend to anyone in need.

His last appeal on the floor of the House of Representatives was in behalf of tolerance, a plea for justice to all men in the spirit of our great democracy. He could not tolerate discrimination, for he was the champion of men who suffered, in one way or another, from the discriminations of those who have against those less fortunate people who have not.

An able lawyer, a conscientious Representative, a loyal friend who never spared himsef in the service of others, MICHAEL EDELSTEIN has earned a place of honor and respect in the hearts of democratic people. We mourn his passing; we must strive to emulate his example.

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. SUTPHIN

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. PIUS LOUIS SCHWERT, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. SUTPHIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay my respects to my late colleague, the gentleman from New York, PIUS L. SCHWERT. There is no one who knew him who will not feel a deep sense of personal loss in his passing. His philosophy of life was service to others. In everything that he did he was actuated by a spirit to serve his country and his constituency.

One of the most earnest Members of this body, Mr. SCHWERT was one who gave leadership to this Nation in these difficult times. He held before the young people of America the highest ideals of manhood and of clean sportsmanship.

We all can testify to his genial disposition, his fine character, his willingness to serve, and his worth to the Nation at large. As one who came up through the ranks, PI SCHWERT retained his sympathetic understanding of his fellow man. He was particularly interested in the disabled veterans of our wars, in the problems of the youth who need a hand up to get started on the ladder of life, and generally in the underprivileged.

Such men are few enough and never can be spared. Let the life of willing service that was PI SCHWERT be ours to emulate. His passing places on each of us an added duty to the underprivileged in all walks of life.

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. SUTPHIN

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIAM BROCKMAN BANKHEAD, late a Representative from the State of Alabama

Mr. SUTPHIN. Mr. Speaker, I humbly rise to pay my last respects to the late Speaker WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, whose service to his country was indeed so great that I feel ill-qualified to speak of him, lest my words fall short as descriptive of his great qualities.

Speaker BANKHEAD, accorded great honors in this House by its membership, won the love and deep respect of all of us. His fairness, his great discretion, his wisdom, his leadership, were unsurpassed by any Speaker in my time. I valued greatly his friendship and his help.

We recall his humor, his oratory, his kindliness, his fair and impartial rulings, his wise counsel. As majority leader and then as Speaker he led the House, giving untiringly of his time and ability in the service of his country.

Truly may it be said that today we mourn his passing because he gave all that he had to give. After an arduous session of Congress, when the Speaker needed rest, he instead led the Democratic convention to which was entrusted the great obligation of selecting a President and Vice President to lead the Nation in a period of great stress. He completed this service ably in the dignified and distinguished manner we would expect of one so well qualified.

Any man has only so much heart to give, even in the service of others, and so it was that BILL BANKHEAD left us. We love and honor his memory. The Nation is better for his having lived.

Service Program of the Disabled American Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

ARTICLE BY COMMANDER VINCENT E. SCHOECK, OF THE DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS OF THE WORLD WAR

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, recently I received from Vincent E. Schoeck, national commander, Disabled American Veterans of the World War, the announcement of the appointment of Millard W. Rice as national service director.

In this announcement Commander Schoeck gives a detailed account of Mr. Rice's background as a legislative representative, together with interesting facts pertaining to the Disabled American Veterans.

Commander Schoeck's article is as follows:

Most Members of Congress know that Mr. Rice was the able national legislative representative of the Veterans of Foreign Wars during the 5 years preceding his appointment as national service director for the Disabled American Veterans. Mr. Rice resigned his position as national legislative representative with the Veterans of Foreign Wars with the assurance that he would do his utmost in his new capacity to try to continue to develop a closer cooperation among the several veteran organizations, particularly as to objectives and services which may beneficially affect veterans suffering with service-connected and service-connectible disabilities and their dependents.

Mr. Rice brings with him to his new position a broad background of experience in veterans' affairs. He has been a member of the Disabled American Veterans, as well as of the Veterans of Foreign Wars and the American Legion, continuously since shortly after his return from World War service. Wounded in action in Belleau Wood while serving with the United States Marine Corps, after his return to the United States Mr. Rice moved with his family from South Dakota to Minneapolis, Minn., where he was granted vocational training by the old Federal Board of Vocational Education, and secured his bachelor of arts degree from the University of Minnesota in 1920 and his doctor of laws degree in 1921, after which he started the practice of law.

Step by step Mr. Rice was drafted away from his law practice by an increasing volume of activities in behalf of disabled veterans, becoming commander of the Minneapolis chapter of the Disabled American Veterans, during which time it became and has since been the largest single unit of disabled veterans in the United States, conducting its first forget-me-not drive, organizing the Minnesota Department of the Disabled American Veterans, and being its department adjutant for several years, as well as the national Disabled American Veterans liaison service officer for Minnesota and the tenth district. In 1928 he was elected national commander of the Disabled American Veterans. From 1930 to 1935 he was its assistant national adjutant, helping to coordinate its many administrative, membership, forget-me-not, educational, publicity, and service activities. He resigned from this position in 1935 in order to take a similar position with the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, shortly after which he became its national legislative representative.

During his 5 years as national legislative representative for the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Mr. Rice established a reputation for being conscientious, versatile, and effective in his activities and contacts. Recently he resigned from that position, again to be employed by the Disabled American Veterans, with which he had received his first experience in rendering service to disabled veterans. I have confidence that, in charge of its legislative, rehabilitation service, and employment activities, Mr. Rice will help to develop the Disabled American Veterans into an ever bigger and better service-giving organization.

DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS MEMBERSHIP ELIGIBILITY

I think it would be appropriate to take advantage of this occasion to tell Members of Congress something about the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, commonly referred to as the D. A. V.

Formed in 1920 and chartered by Congress in 1932, to render service to, for, and by disabled veterans, the Disabled American Veterans has, since its inception, been one of the spokesmen for disabled World War veterans in Congress and before its various committees, as well as before the Veterans' Administration and its regional offices and facilities.

As implied by its name, the Disabled American Veterans of the World War is composed exclusively of honorably discharged World War veterans who were wounded, gassed, injured, or disabled in or by reason of their World War service. Its membership is, therefore, composed of a very exclusive class.

Active membership in the D. A. V. can only be secured by those whose bodies bear the scars of wounds or injuries, or the blight of disease or disability, incurred by reason of their World War service. Less than 10 percent of those World War veterans who are now living are therefore eligible for membership in this rather selective organization.

Wearing the emblem of the Disabled American Veterans which, by the way, is a replica of the Accolade of Chivalry, portrayed on the wound certificates issued by President Woodrow Wilson, is therefore to wear a badge of honor, indicating that the wearer has sacrificed part of his blood, part of his body, or a part of his health in the Nation's most hazardous employment, serving in its armed forces during time of war.

The wearer of a Disabled American Veterans' emblem button can be proud of such proof of his patriotism—a real badge of honor.

No one, certainly, can justly question the true Americanism and patriotism of those who have paid such a high price as proof of their patriotism.

Disabled American Veterans membership is restricted to those American citizens who have earned it by sacrificing their youth and a part of their bodies, or a part of the health of their minds or bodies, in service for our beloved country. There are no other limitations as to membership eligibility. Its membership, therefore, includes men who are Protestants, Jews, and Catholics, of many different racial origins, engaged in various types of employment, if any, receiving incomes from the lowest up to the higher brackets, including both the humble and the prominent; the poor and the rich; the former buck privates, corporals, sergeants, lieutenants, captains, majors, colonels, and generals; the unemployables and the unemployed employables; the uninformed and the well informed; the helpless and the helpful—a typical cross section of American citizenry.

During its existence the Disabled American Veterans has elected former privates, corporals, sergeants, lieutenants, captains, and a general to the office of national commander. Its leaders have had service in Uncle Sam's Infantry, Artillery, Air Corps, Marine Corps, and Navy. It has been led by Jew, Catholic, and Protestant. All of these men, with divergent backgrounds, have found a common ground in the Disabled American Veterans—the union of America's disabled defenders—to help to render service to those who need service.

DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS

I think it will be interesting to Members of Congress to be reminded of the fact that the Disabled American Veterans has had its national headquarters almost since its inception, at 2840 Melrose Avenue, Cincinnati, Ohio. National Adjutant Vivian D. Corbly has been secretary-manager of the organization and editor of its newspaper since 1925. Capt. Cicero F. Hogan is his assistant.

An excellent newspaper is published by the national headquarters, the Disabled American Veterans Semimonthly, containing accurate, up-to-date information as to the developments concerning all legislation—proposed and already a part of our Federal statutes, Presidential Executive orders, court decisions, Attorney General's opinions, Comptroller General's opinions, and Veterans' Administration regulations, service letters, and much other material of value and of interest to disabled veterans or their dependents. No disabled veteran is doing right by himself, and those dear to him, if he deprives himself of the valuable news and information in the Disabled American Veterans Semimonthly.

DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS LEGISLATIVE ACCOMPLISHMENTS

During the 21 years of its history, the Disabled American Veterans has initiated much liberalizing legislation on behalf of various groups of disabled veterans and their dependents, and has also been largely responsible for the issuance of many liberalizing regulations by the Veterans' Administration from time to time—too numerous and too technical for me to set forth to you in detail at this time.

Many World War veterans, and their wives, widows, and children are not informed as to the various types of benefits, rights, and privileges which are available to them, from various governmental agencies, under certain circumstances, as secured by the legislative and rehabilitation efforts of the Disabled American Veterans in cooperation with other veteran organizations. Following is a thumbnail résumé of benefits available, under certain conditions, to World War veterans and their dependents, in case of need for more specific information as to how to proceed to secure certain desired benefits, contact should be made with a service officer of the Disabled American Veterans, or of some other veteran organization, the American Red Cross, or the Veterans' Administration.

Compensation for World War veterans with service-connected disabilities, ranging from $8 to $285 per month, depending upon nature and degree of disability, including statutory awards, ranging from $25 to $250 per month for certain disabilities.

Disability retirement benefits for certain emergency, provisional, probationary, and temporary World War officers as to permanent disabilities of 30 percent or more in degree, acquired in service in line of duty.

Pension of $30 per month (only $6 for single men without dependents while maintained in a governmental institution) for those war veterans who had 90 days or more of honorable service, or, if less than 90 days, were discharged for disability incurred in line of duty, and who are permanently and totally disabled, not legally proven to be service-connected.

All Medal of Honor men, age 65 or more, eligible for $10 per month statutory award.

All payments of benefits received from Veterans' Administration exempted from taxation, attachment, or claims of creditors.

Adjusted compensation provided as to active World War service, exceeding 60 days, computed at rate of $1 per day of domestic service and $1.25 per day of overseas service, with certain limitations.

Government insurance policies in multiples of $500, up to $10,000, for insurable World War veterans.

Hospitalization to any World War veteran for treatment of a service-connected disability, and to any needy World War veteran, honorably discharged, for needed treatment of a non-service-connected disability, with certain prosthetic appliances, clothing, and tobacco allowances, when beds are available in Government facilities.

Domiciliary care in a Veterans' Administration home facility, with certain needed clothing and tobacco allowances, for any needy veteran unable to follow any gainful occupation.

Transportation to, and back from, Veterans' Administration facilities, when authorized in advance, for examination, medical treatment, hospitalization, or domiciliary care, of any veteran.

Guardians are required as to incompetent veterans and minor children, who are beneficiaries of the Veterans' Administration; their accountings are regularly inspected by regional attorneys.

Certain preferences as to Federal civil-service examinations, ratings, appointments, reinstatements and retention of Federal employment.

Certain preferences for W. P. A. employment for those in need.

Extensive United States Employment Service and Veterans' Placement Service in every State.

Credit for all active military or naval service for civil-service retirement or railroad-retirement purposes, with certain exceptions.

Burial allowance in the amount of $100 for any honorably discharged war veteran.

United States flag to drape casket of deceased war veteran, honorably discharged, subsequently turned over to next of kin.

Headstones or markers—stone, marble, or bronze—for graves of deceased war veterans.

Pensions for certain widows and orphans (and helpless children) and dependent parents of those deceased World War veterans who have died by reason of their service-connected disabilities, and at lesser rates for the dependent widows and orphans of those who, at time of death, had some service-connected disability.

State laws provide various benefits, rights, and privileges to certain veterans, their dependents, and their organizations, under certain conditions, as per résumé published in the Disabled American Veterans semimonthly.

In spite of the enactment of many Federal and State laws, there are still many inadequacies, inequities, and inequalities of the privileges, preferences, and benefits as to and among various classifications of service-connected and service-connectible disabled veterans, and their dependents, which the Disabled American Veterans is striving to have corrected by proposed legislation, which as legislative director, Millard W. Rice, will vigorously push forward in hearings before the House Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, as well as before other committees of the United States House of Representatives and of the United States Senate.

The Disabled American Veterans—the recognized voice of the Nation's World War disabled—concentrates its collective strength to protect and to advance the best interests of its members and eligibles, and of their dependents, thus helping them, their respective local communities, and our country. Its constitution forbids it to take part, officially, in any partisan, political, industrial, or religious disputes. Its national policies, as well as its national officers, are decided upon at national conventions, to which delegates are sent directly by local chapters—thus democratically providing for finding out and abiding by the expressed wishes of the majority.

NATIONAL SERVICE SET-UP

The Disabled American Veterans has had the offices of its national service bureau, also almost from its inception, in the Munsey Building in Washington, D. C., where it now has nine service experts to advise and to assist deserving veterans in the technical and legal prosecution of their equitable claims for compensation, pension, medical treatment, hospitalization, insurance benefits, and in securing suitable gainful employment—private or public.

The national service director has supervision of the office of the national service bureau in Washington, D. C., and also exercises supervision over the services of the organization's 38 nationally paid national service officers—who, incidentally, receive very inadequate salaries, ranging from only $20 to $200 per month, depending upon the number of Disabled American Veterans members in their respective States—as well as over its 56 unpaid national service officers and its 807 voluntary chapter service officers.

All of these unselfish, self-sacrificing service officers are themselves disabled veterans. All of them have had the experience of prosecuting their own claims for service connection and compensation. All of them know, by reason of personal experience of the difficulties and handicaps with which disabled veterans are confronted in their efforts to obtain and retain suitable gainful employment. These Disabled American Veterans service officers know, by reason of personal experience, the complications and technicalities that disabled veterans must overcome legally to prove the service connections of their disabilities to the satisfaction of the claims and rating agencies of the Veterans' Administration. They understand, of course, that officials of the Veterans' Administration must adhere to the laws as enacted by Congress, with their limitations and restrictions as legalistically interpreted and as administratively applied.

Disabled American Veterans service officers well know that being equitably entitled to service connection and compensation for a disability, by reason of the handicap of such disability, is not the same as being legally entitled thereto.

Because of their understanding of these various problems with which disabled veterans are baffled, these service officers of the Disabled American Veterans are naturally sympathetic to disabled claimants in their efforts to overcome such difficulties. I think it is safe to say that a person who himself has experienced some of the complexities incident to proving himself entitled to certain benefits because of a disability which he is convinced was caused by his World War service, and who himself has had the experience of trying to overcome the handicap caused by such disability is in a better position to advise and to assist other disabled veterans in the solution of their various problems understandingly, sympathetically, and effectively.

DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS SERVICE ACTIVITIES

The services and accomplishments of these national Disabled American Veterans' service officers during the past 12 years is indicated by the following brief résumé:

Claims handled	672,695
Hospitalizations and medical examinations obtained	73,004
Appearances before rating agencies	164,608
Favorable decisions	90,787
Total monetary benefits	$51,433,774.58

It is, of course, impossible for a brief statistical résumé to indicate the many different types of services extended by service officers. Moreover, it must be recalled that many liberalizing precedents have been established on the basis of cases handled by Disabled American Veterans' service officers, which subsequently have proven of value to hundreds or thousands of disabled veterans having similar claims, the results of which cannot appear in the reports of the national service officers who have helped to establish such favorable decisions.

The original and increased compensation payments for more than 90,787 disabled veterans and their dependents have converted such individual disabled veterans from local liabilities into local community assets, bringing increased compensation payments into every community and thus increasing the distribution of purchasing power by that much in such communities, with consequent individual benefits to each community and its citizens, as well as to each State.

The service activities of this comparatively small organization of Disabled American Veterans have rendered needed advice and assistance to thousands of disabled veterans each year, helping to secure compensation for their disabilities, finally rated as service connected, medical treatment, and hospitalization where needed, pensions for dependents, insurance benefits, etc.

In passing, it is interesting to note that a considerable number of those disabled veterans who gained experience originally as chapter and as national service officers for the Disabled American Veterans thereafter have become national service officers, national service directors, national legislative representatives, national adjutants, and other types of service-giving officers of other national veteran organizations. The school of experience which they attended in various capacities in the Disabled American Veterans has graduated a considerable number of these former Disabled American Veterans' service officers into other capacities with other organizations, where they can hope to extend the benefit of their knowledge and experience to wider fields in various types of humanitarian service for fellow veterans for their respective communities and for our country.

FINANCING THE DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS

The principal source of income for the Disabled American Veterans, by which it has been enabled to maintain this extensive service program, has been through the support of individual disabled veterans themselves, by their payment of membership dues in the Disabled American Veterans, through its 37 departments and 807 chapters throughout the country.

A national per capita tax of $3 per member per year is paid by each local chapter to national headquarters.

Those disabled veterans who have supported the Disabled American Veterans, representing the united collective voice of, by, and for disabled veterans—have so earnestly believed in its past accomplishments, in its current service program, and in its objectives for the future, as to be willing to make the necessary sacrifices for payments of annual membership dues which, by the way, average about $4 in most of the local chapters.

During the last 3 years, the Disabled American Veterans has extended to its membership the opportunity to acquire life membership, upon payment of $50, generally by a cash payment of $4 or more, plus $1 or more per month until paid. An increasingly larger number of eligible disabled veterans—now more than 43 percent of all Disabled American Veterans members have been becoming life members of the Disabled American Veterans.

Disabled veterans who are members of the Disabled American Veterans realize that it does not have any mysterious source of income. They realize that its strength, prestige, and ability to accomplish constructive services on behalf of individual disabled veterans, and their dependents, rests entirely upon the collective force of all of those who are prompted to become and to remain paid-up members of their own outfit.

Local chapters of the Disabled American Veterans finance their own social-service and relief activities out of the portion of annual membership dues which they retain after having sent the national per-capita tax of $3 to national headquarters, by annual forget-me-not drives, and by such small finance-raising projects as dances, etc.

DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS SERVICE FOUNDATION

Some donations, but not nearly enough, are made each year to the Disabled American Veterans Service Foundation, incorporated under the laws of the State of Ohio, and regarded as the Disabled American Veterans' incorporated trusteeship. Five trustees, all of them now past national commanders, are elected by each national convention for a 5-year term, the term of one of them expiring each year, whereas two additional trustees (generally the current national commander and the current national judge advocate) are elected each year for 1-year terms. This method of electing the trustees was designed to give assurance of real continuity as to the policies of the Disabled American Veterans Service Foundation, as to the conservation and administration of its funds, and as to the appropriations therefrom once each year to the National Disabled American Veterans itself, exclusively for the maintenance of its national service bureau and of the national Disabled American Veterans service officers in the various States.

Some of the disabled veterans who have received benefits by reason of the assistance of the national service bureau, or of some National Disabled American Veterans' service officer, and other disabled veterans who know of its deserving purposes make donations to the Disabled American Veterans' Service Foundation each year in sums which have ranged from $1 to $200—generally totaling only about $1,000 each year.

The Disabled American Veterans' Service Foundation has also been the beneficiary of bequests made in the wills of several disabled veterans who have died, and will probably be remembered in the bequests of other disabled veterans whose deaths will occur in the future. Some contributions, moreover, have also been received from time to time from other social-service-minded citizens.

NEED FOR DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS

Disabled American Veterans' members are aware of the fact that the Disabled American Veterans has, in whole or in part, been responsible for much legislation which has directly benefited thousands of disabled veterans who have never become associated as members of the Disabled American Veterans—some because they know nothing about the organization, others because they are indifferent to the need for collective action, still others because they are too unthinking or too selfish, and many who have persuaded themselves that they cannot financially afford it.

It is a strange commentary upon human nature that this comparatively small organization of disabled veterans has continued to render very valuable service to thousands of individual disabled veterans in helping them to prove up service connections, secure increased compensation, hospitalization, insurance benefits, or the continuance of insurance benefits, etc., apparently without their feeling any gratitude for such valuable service, apparently without the realization that they have been freewheeling, and that the service which they have secured has been paid for by other disabled veterans no better off financially, if as well, to contribute to the helping-hand effort, through membership in the Disabled American Veterans, to provide for its Nation-wide service set-up.

Every social-minded disabled veteran who is anxious to protect the benefits which may have been awarded to him, and at the same time to help to secure needed benefits for other veterans who are even less fortunate, ought to be a paid-up member, if not also an active member, of the Disabled American Veterans—generally recognized as the official spokesman for America's World War disabled.

Helping disabled veterans to help themselves and getting the help of the Nation for those who need help, which we earnestly believe to be a big dividend-paying investment, is the self-appointed task of the Disabled American Veterans.

Fellow citizens frequently need to be reminded by an organization such as the Disabled American Veterans, composed exclusively of, by, and for disabled veterans, that an important factor in providing security for America is for America to provide security for its own citizens, and particularly for its disabled defenders of the past, as well as of the future. America can always feel assured that it will be enthusiastically protected and defended so long as America remembers to protect and defend its protectors and defenders.

Shipment of High-Grade Gasoline and Scrap Iron to Japan

HON. WALTER M. PIERCE

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 25, 1941

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, many of us living on the west coast wonder why it is necessary to continue to ship quantities of high-grade gasoline, scrap iron, and lubricating oil to Japan. This has been going on for months. It was announced a few months ago that there would be no more high-grade gasoline sent to Japan, but the fact is that this gasoline is still going there, to be used for the purpose of raining bombs on our friends in China and possibly to be shipped on to Europe to be used against our own Allies or those that are friendly to us.

We wonder why. The feeling of the people of the Pacific Northwest in regard to this serious matter is accurately expressed in a recent leading editorial in the Oregonian, a newspaper published in Portland, Oreg. I ask unanimous consent to include that editorial as part of these remarks.

The editorial follows:

GAS FOR JAPAN'S WAR PLANES

During the first 3 months of 1940 there were no restrictions on export of gasoline to Japan and other countries outside the Western Hemisphere. The embargo on export of aviation gasoline, the commodity presumed to be essential to effective operation of war planes, was ordered on July 31. Yet a dispatch from Washington tells us that in the first 3 months of this year Japan imported from this country five times as much gasoline as it imported in the corresponding 3 months of a year ago, when there were no restrictions.

The gasoline thus going in much greater quantity to Japan may be assumed not to be aviation gasoline. It includes, however, much high-grade gasoline, which, by the addition of antiknock ingredients, can be converted into aviation gasoline. And the concurrent export from this country of $110,000 worth of antiknock preparations to Japan reveals that conversion of the fuel into aviation fuel is its true destination.

Our sympathies are strongly with China in the war now going on in the Orient. Our material interests also lie in the success of Chinese resistance to the Japanese "new order." We give practical aid to China in the form of loans, and sell Japan the fuel necessary to bomb the Chinese armies from the air. Moreover, our own relations with Japan are precarious, and the thought that persists among us on the Pacific coast is that these delicate relations may be broken and that the airplane fuel that we sold to Japan may propel planes which will bomb our cities.

The same dispatch tells us that the administration is fully cognizant of the situation and is permitting export to Japan of strategic materials for the time being for very good reasons. Two reasons are cited. They are not very good reasons. One is appeasement. The other, that it is America's policy to lull Japan into a sense of false security, and corresponding neglect of reserve stock building, so that when and if we do stop shipments the embargo will be an effective one. The spokesman for these two doctrines was no doubt dissembling. And it may well be that officially to set forth the true reasons would be ill-advised.

It is a fair supposition that the watchful-waiting strategists are for the time being in the ascendancy in Washington with respect to policies in the Orient. Word has hitherto come forth that there are two schools of opinion on this branch of foreign policy. One is that Japan understands only direct action or force, is in no position to make reprisal, and if it took the headlong chance would be made short work of. The other argument, the one that seemingly predominates, is that Japan is poised in the south China Sea for attempted seizure of Malaya and the East Indies, and if we embargo essential war materials would strike recklessly and effectively enough to cut off for a long time our access to strategic materials obtainable only in the Far East in quantities sufficient for our own defense program.

The United States is dependent in whole or major part on the Asiatic southeast for 5 of the 14 commodities listed by the Army and Navy as strategic materials. The 5 are rubber, tin, tungsten, Manila fiber, and quinine. We have been depending on that region for 98 percent of our rubber and 80 percent of our tin. Moves have been taken to build up stocks in these materials and develop new sources of supplies and substitutes.

The situation resolves itself into a question of whether our own vulnerability with respect to strategic materials has been overcome, and whether Japan's vulnerability as a naval power is correctly estimated. That a showdown approaches is implied by Japan's new pressure on the Netherland East Indies for release to Japan of quantities of petroleum, rubber, and tin. Japan fears a drying up of the imports from America. The three commodities are essentials to successful warfare or defense, but so are automobiles and automobile parts, and machinery, and scrap metals, these last not to be obtained by Japan anywhere in the world at present unless it be from the United States.

The squeeze of a complete embargo on export of war materials to Japan would seemingly strangle Japan in short order notwithstanding statistical comparisons of Japan's naval strength with that part of ours which could be spared for operations in the Pacific. The Government may know what it is doing when gasoline is permitted to go to Japan in growing volume, but the people do not think so. Last fall a Gallup poll showed 90 percent of those participating to be in favor of a complete embargo.

Pacific Coast Pulp Industry Goes 7 Years Without Time Lost in Labor Disputes

HON. MARTIN F. SMITH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 25, 1941

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the recent signing of another

amicable contract between the operators and the workers in the pulp industry on the Pacific coast draws attention to the fact that for 7 years not a day has been lost in this industry because of labor disputes; 7 years of unbroken contracts between operators and labor, as this new agreement is virtually a continuation of the original one made in 1934 between companies and unions.

The agreement provides for a wage increase of 10 cents an hour and brings the basic wage per hour up to 75 cents for men and 62½ cents for women. It affects 15,000 workers, members of the International Brotherhood of Paper Makers and the International Brotherhood of Pulp, Sulphite and Paper Mill Workers. One clause of the new contract provides that all employees of 2 years' standing are to receive a week's vacation with pay.

The agreement affects workers in pulp and paper at Longview, Camas, Vancouver, Shelton, and Grays Harbor, all in my congressional district in the State of Washington; and from Port Angeles on the Straits of Juan de Fuca through Anacortes and Bellingham; through Portland and Coos Bay, Oreg., and down as far as Los Angeles, Calif.

According to a public statement by Mr. John Sherman, fifth vice president of the Pulp and Sulphite Workers, and Mr. E. B. Lambton, vice president of the Paper Makers, the Pulp and Sulphite Union workers favored the new contract by a vote of 5,482 to 385, while the Paper Makers Union workers voiced their approval 2,197 to 181.

The method of arriving at agreement is by way of the conference table, known among industrialists as the goldfish method in which profits of the owners and needs of the workers are weighed and become the basis of agreement. Announcement by Mr. J. H. Smith, president of the Pacific Coast Pulp and Paper Manufacturers Association, said the pay increase will total more than $3,000,000 annually, of which $2,000,000 will go to workers in 20 mills in the State of Washington, $500,000 to workers in 8 California mills, and $650,000 to workers in 5 Oregon mills. Union officials have said the pay scale is the highest in the United States for similar work. The agreement brings the annual pay roll in the 33 Pacific coast mills to $33,000,000.

The pulp industry has been one of the industries of the Nation favorably affected by the war in Europe. Before the war much of the American pulp supply was imported from Scandinavian countries where cheaper labor and lower shipping costs made it possible for them to sell their product cheaper than the west coast. Today pulp mills of the coast provide not only a major part of the North American pulp supply but are exporting heavily to South America.

What Necessitates Use of Old World War Submarines?

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 25, 1941

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, newspapers of Monday, June 23, reported that Mrs. Minnie Schneider, of 408 East Seventy-first Street, New York, mother of Frederick Schneider, one of the seamen lost in the submarine O–9, remarked, upon being advised of the tragedy:

With all the millions that they are spending, I cannot understand why the Government should have sent my boy into a trash basket like that.

The boy's father, Peter Schneider, is reported to have said:

They had trouble with that old sub. * * * Is it not the Government's duty, with all the money it is taking from the people, with all the money it has to spend—is it not the Government's duty to provide my boy with at least a good ship, a safe ship, a sound ship?

Sol Gerson, 906 Union Avenue, the Bronx, a brother of Nathan Gerson, another seaman lost with the O–9, had this to say to reporters, according to the newspapers:

My brother was home a week ago. He told me that on June 9 they went out from New London in the O–9 for a trial run; that the O–9, he said, developed three leaks. He told me they put back to the submarine base and the leaks were repaired and they went out again, and on the second trial the sub's condition, so my brother said, was good. "The way it is," he commented, "no one knows what happened. * * * Let the Navy Department do its own telling."

Now, Mr. Speaker, the parents and relatives of the seamen who were lost with the O–9 are not the only ones in America who are asking for details regarding this tragedy. I agree with Sol Gerson that the Secretary of the Navy should furnish these details to the Nation, in spite of the rigid censorship he has imposed in his Department. I am, therefore, today introducing the following privileged resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to inform the House of Representatives at the earliest practicable date—

1. The original date of the commissioning of submarine O–9 and the cost thereof.
2. The date of the reconditioning of the said submarine O–9 and the cost thereof.
3. What service was performed by the said submarine O–9 during World War I, and subsequently.
4. Such information as may be on file in the Navy Department showing condition of said submarine O–9 as to require its repair and reconditioning for efficient service as an undersea vessel.

In preparing this resolution, I have sought to conform to the rules of the House of Representatives which prevent demands for other information which I believe should be furnished the public, including whether inferior materials were used in the reconditioning of the O–9, and whether its reconditioning was necessitated by the aid in American vessels the United States is giving to Great Britain under the lend-lease program.

I trust the Secretary of the Navy will furnish this information to the Congress.

We have been told repeatedly that we have a navy second to none. The Secretary of the Navy, in my opinion, should inform the Congress if the O–9 is a correct example of our sea-fighting equipment. The Navy Department has succeeded quite well in its efforts to hush up the O–9 incident for which someone was responsible. That responsibility should be fixed and the Nation should know whether recurring tragedies can be expected. It should be told whether our Navy is second to none or really next to nothing.

As Sol Gerson so aptly said:

Let the Navy Department do its own telling.

ADDRESS OF HON. ARCHIBALD McLEISH

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, on June 11, in the Philadelphia Municipal Auditorium, the Honorable Archibald McLeish, Librarian of the Library of Congress, delivered an address to the graduating class of the University of Pennsylvania.

This address is a complete departure from the usual graduating speech. It is an address that will be a classic in the years to come. It can be read and reread by all Americans everywhere with the assurance that it will make of them better. Americans. I feel privileged to make it a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The address follows:

It is the custom of this country to offer up a certain quantity of words on the graduation from college of each annual generation of young men and young women. It was the custom of other countries to offer up on such occasions a certain quantity of sheep's blood. In both cases, it was the sacrificial act and not the thing sacrificed which counted. With the ancients the blood itself was not valued. The earth took it. The practice is the same with us. We prefer, perhaps unwisely, the gullets of men to the gullets of cattle and—unwisely perhaps again—we do not cut them. But with us, as with those others, it is the full luxurious flow which is counted as auspicious. No one intends to gather up the words and preserve them for the future guidance of his life.

I mention this not to complain of it but to indicate that I understand my role and accept it. I accept, that is to say, the unexpressed stipulation that I am not to communicate a message of meaning and significance, or deliver to you in useful and memorable form the truths my generation knows which your generation does not know. It is not difficult to accept. What a man knows at 50 that he did not know at 20 is, for the most part, incommunicable, which is, perhaps, why no adequate system of education has ever yet been devised. The "laws," the aphorisms, the generalizations, the universal truths, the parables and the old saws—all the observations about life which can be communicated readily in handy verbal packages—are as well known to a man at 20 as at 50; he has been told them all, he has read them all, and he has probably repeated them all before he graduates from college.

What he knows at 50 that he did not know at 20 is little more than this: That the things he was told were true at 20 and the things he said were true at 20 are, for the most part, really true—but true with a brutal and inescapable truthfulness and consequence and meaning which would have shocked him had he guessed at it 30 years before. This knowledge is of all forms of knowledge the least communicable because it is a knowledge not of formulas or forms of words, but of people, places, actions—a knowledge never gained by words but by touch, sight, delays, victories, sleeplessness, shame, love—briefly, by experience of this earth and of one's self and other men.

How difficult it is to communicate you may see for yourselves by observing carefully the efforts of the greatest poets to communicate it, for this labor is the last and most difficult of all the labors of poetry. Between a poem of Yeats which says, in the twentieth year of his life, that women are beautiful, and a poem of Yeats which speaks 30 years afterward of the beauty of women, there is a difference which, to a young man and to any woman, is no difference at all, but to a man in middle life immeasurable.

So that it is not a hindrance, but, on the contrary, a considerable help to accept the custom of these ceremonies. I willingly agree to burden you with no secrets and to charge you with no knowledge private to your elders. But though I am not myself to communicate messages from beyond your fortieth year or to bring you words in a sealed bottle from voyages which preceded your voyage—stuffed birds from remote islands or photographs of the customs of the inhabitants—there is, nevertheless, one thing I am at liberty to do; one thing which, perhaps, I have an obligation to do. I am at liberty to warn you against certain members of my generation who do not accept for themselves the restrictions you impose upon me here, but openly undertake, not only in rooms privately but in public addresses and even in books, to communicate what cannot be communicated and to convey what has no conveyance.

That there are such members of my generation is not unknown to you. The social historians whose duty it is to record interesting phenomena have thus far failed to record the fact that my generation has produced prophets, but you have not failed to notice it. Too many of the prophesies have been aimed at you. You have had occasion to observe that there are members of my generation who are familiar with the shape of the future and who are willing to share their familiarity with others.

You have heard voices which declare that the violence and brutality and obscurantism which you see sweeping over the world are the present shape of the future and should be accepted for that reason. You have heard still other voices divulging the news that there is nothing to do with this violence and this obscurantism but let it sweep over you; that if you attempt to defend your kind of world against it you will inevitably lose your kind of world. You have had other advisers also—those who speak in the role of the old soldiers, plucking your sleeves and telling you they were tricked into the last war by talk of democracy, telling you the talk of democracy is always talk to trick a man; telling you, you also, if you listen, if you weigh the democratic risk, will be tricked and made fools of. You have heard the professors prophesying that the violence of this time will take its course as the violence of the French Revolution took its course, and that nothing you can do or fail to do will change the outcome; the military strategists prophesying that those who oppose this violence will inevitably fail regardless of any aid of ours and that we ourselves will inevitably suffer humiliation and defeat if we attempt to lift a hand to help them.

But though you are aware of the presence and of the prophecies of these people, you have not, I believe, considered with attention what they are or why they speak as they do, and it is for this reason that I feel compelled to warn you.

Briefly, there are three observations to be made about these prophecies. Each relates to the others, and all three to the credibility of the prophetic words. They are not observations which are frequently brought to mind, at least in public discussions of these matters.

The first is this; that these prophecies are prophecies. Prophets have been infrequent in recent centuries, and the sudden appearance of numbers of them in the time in which we live, foretelling the future to the young and informing them of the disasters which will inevitably follow certain actions, is a curious phenomenon.

The second observation is the observation that all these prophecies are prophecies of defeat, prophecies of negation, prophecies not of the things which men can do but of the things which men cannot do. This, too, is unusual. Prophets have prophesied disaster before this but rarely as consistently or in such numbers, and rarely in terms of impotence and failure so complete.

The third observation is less dramatic but no less interesting for that. It is the observation that these prophetic voices are not, as was the case in antiquity, the voices of old men, but of men and women in middle life—men and women of the generation which knew in its childhood or its youth the other war and which came to consciousness of the world and of itself in the years between. It was not common among any ancient people that men and women in the full strength of their middle years prophesied publicly and always of disaster and defeat.

These three observations have significance because they bear upon the question any curious listener will wish to ask himself: Why do these men and women prophesy, and why, if they must foretell the future to us, do they tell it in these terms? Is it because they possess a knowledge of the future not possessed by other men? Or is there a different reason? And if there is a different reason, is it a reason which has to do with the curious fact that the speakers are men all of one generation—the generation of men now in middle life—the generation, specifically, to which I belong?

The answer, I think, is not too difficult. Prophets appear only among those who know or who think they know that the pattern of life is determined beforehand, and who know or who think they know that they are privy to its determination. The generation to which I belong believes, as you who have read its books are aware, in a predetermined pattern of life. It is our conviction, explicitly stated in our histories, our political commentaries, and our studies in economics, implicitly stated in our novels and our poetry, that the pattern of life is determined by economic law or historical necessity or psychological compulsion, and that we are, or by taking thought can make ourselves, privy to these laws and these necessities. My generation not only believes in a predetermined pattern of life, which is to say, in fate: we believe in it to a degree unknown in Western civilization for centuries. It is probable, therefore, that it is not because they have been touched by a god's breath or because they have beheld visions at night, but for a simpler reason that these prophets prophesy: they prophesy because they belong to a generation which, whether it so admits or not, believes, and has believed for years, in fate, and because, therefore, prophecy is natural to them.

Why these prophets prophesy in the language of impotence and defeat is, however, a more complicated question, and one which requires for its understanding a more extended discussion of the relation between my generation and the notion of fate. The fact that men of a given time believe in a predetermined pattern of life does not necessarily mean that they are fatalists or that their prophecies must take fatalistic form. The Greeks, for example, were believers in fate and producers of prophecies, but not of prophecies like these. For the Greeks conceived of fate, not as a predetermined pattern controlling the whole of life, and controlling therefore the will and acts of men, but as a divine intervention capable of cutting across the acts of men at unexpected moments.

Fate to the Greeks was a force to be reckoned with, a force to be respected, even a force to be feared. But fate was never an inevitable pattern to which history and all men's hopes must be resigned. Odysseus, most Greek of all Greek heroes, outwitted the implacable will where he could, and it is the chorus of Sophocles in the Antigone which says, "Many wonders there are but nothing more wonderful than man." A man among the Greeks was not relieved of the necessity of choice or of the responsibility for choosing, because an unalterable will had already chosen in his stead. Nor was it either honorable or admirable for a man among the Greeks to accept and to admit that he accepted the domination of his world by forces beyond his power to control, fitting his life to their patterns and living at their will.

The fates were not an inevitable force but a three-named god, and with a god, with God's help, a man could struggle, surrendering only when he had no choice but to surrender. To the Greeks, in short, man was capable of the mastery of the greater part of a human and sunlit world and only the shadowy edges, the dark depths of unforeseeable mischance, were left to the inscrutable amicable contract between the operators and the workers in the pulp industry on the Pacific coast draws attention to the fact that for 7 years not a day has been lost in this industry because of labor disputes; 7 years of unbroken contracts between operators and labor, as this new agreement is virtually a continuation of the original one made in 1934 between companies and unions.

The agreement provides for a wage increase of 10 cents an hour and brings the basic wage per hour up to 75 cents for men and 62½ cents for women. It affects 15,000 workers, members of the International Brotherhood of Paper Makers and the International Brotherhood of Pulp, Sulphite and Paper Mill Workers. One clause of the new contract provides that all employees of 2 years' standing are to receive a week's vacation with pay.

The agreement affects workers in pulp and paper at Longview, Camas, Vancouver, Shelton, and Grays Harbor, all in my congressional district in the State of Washington; and from Port Angeles on the Straits of Juan de Fuca through Anacortes and Bellingham; through Portland and Coos Bay, Oreg., and down as far as Los Angeles, Calif.

According to a public statement by Mr. John Sherman, fifth vice president of the Pulp and Sulphite Workers, and Mr. E. B. Lambton, vice president of the Paper Makers, the Pulp and Sulphite Union workers favored the new contract by a vote of 5,482 to 385, while the Paper Makers Union workers voiced their approval 2,197 to 181.

The method of arriving at agreement is by way of the conference table, known among industrialists as the goldfish method in which profits of the owners and needs of the workers are weighed and become the basis of agreement. Announcement by Mr. J. H. Smith, president of the Pacific Coast Pulp and Paper Manufacturers Association, said the pay increase will total more than $3,000,000 annually, of which $2,000,000 will go to workers in 20 mills in the State of Washington, $500,000 to workers in 8 California mills, and $650,000 to workers in 5 Oregon mills. Union officials have said the pay scale is the highest in the United States for similar work. The agreement brings the annual pay roll in the 33 Pacific coast mills to $33,000,000.

The pulp industry has been one of the industries of the Nation favorably affected by the war in Europe. Before the war much of the American pulp supply was imported from Scandinavian countries where cheaper labor and lower shipping costs made it possible for them to sell their product cheaper than the west coast. Today pulp mills of the coast provide not only a major part of the North American pulp supply but are exporting heavily to South America.

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, newspapers of Monday, June 23, reported that Mrs. Minnie Schneider, of 408 East Seventy-first Street, New York, mother of Frederick Schneider, one of the seamen lost in the submarine O–9, remarked, upon being advised of the tragedy:

To the Greeks, in short, man was capable of the mastery of the greater part of a human and sunlit world and only the shadowy edges, the dark depths of unforeseeable mischance, were left to the inscrutable and fatal will. Men could be destroyed and were often destroyed by inconceivable disaster but they were capable also of compelling the human world—and sometimes the nonhuman. They were capable of victories against odds, achievements in the face of improbabilities—Thermopylae and Salamis.

Our view of fate—the view entertained by men of my generation—differs, however, in every sense from the Greek. It differs even in the manner in which it was formed. The Greeks learned the will of fate by opposing to it their own wills, determining for themselves, by their own defeats, by their own experience, what limits are placed upon the freedom of men to act and at what point it is seemly and proper for a man to bend his will to that other will. Our generation ascertained the will of fate not by opposing it, not even by yielding to it when we met it, but by searching it out in order that we might yield to it, and by yielding then our responsibilities and our wills. And the fate which we searched out—the fate of universal economic laws and universal historical necessities—was a fate which accounted not only for the margins of our lives, the twilight of inexplicable event, but for our lives themselves and the entire world in which we lived.

Fate lay across the road by which the Greeks moved to the understanding of this world. We fled to fate—we invented a fate of our own—to escape a world which had grown too large for us, a world too complicated to understand, too huge to know. The innovations of our period—the plane, the radio, the automobile—did not, as clumsy speakers sometimes say, contract our world. On the contrary, they extended our world, or extended at least our experience of our world, until the physical hearing, the physical sight, and almost the physical presence of an individual man were pushed out to cover an area of which previously he could have had no physical and personal knowledge. This physical extension of a single man's experience moreover was accompanied by no increased extension of his competence to deal with his experience. No innovation in the physical sciences and no triumph of education equipped him to deal either with the larger world he saw and heard himself or with the tangled and complicated world of tangled and complicated social and economic relations which lay beyond his personal experience and behind it.

We became, all of us, huge and unreal shadows of ourselves like the shadows a level autumn sun throws out across a meadow and a hill, to stumble and gesticulate and fade. We seemed suddenly huge and we touched the earth more broadly, but we ourselves were still no larger than we ever were. We realized our smallness, our inadequacy. The thought frightened us, and we accepted willingly, and even eagerly, the notion of a world directed by historical necessity and economic law. We accepted it not as the Greeks accepted the existence of the fates—a power to be reckoned with, a force to be taken into account in the accomplishment of our own purposes—but as the creatures of unalterable law accept the ineluctable necessity of obedience, surrendering to the unopposable will.

The capitalist who "knew" that the law of supply and demand was a universal law which must inevitably operate sooner or later, and to which all social as well as all economic problems could be safely left, took refuge from an insoluble puzzle in a fatalistic reliance upon the will of fate. He was happy in the conviction that the capitalist system would overcome all its difficulties, because the law of supply and demand was a universal law which nothing could successfully oppose. The pre-Fascist revolutionaries, with a fatalism even more naive, entrusted to the sacred laws of dialectical materialism the labors of a revolution they could not make themselves. And their successors, the Fascists, have carried the worship of fate to its last and most devout extreme. The Fascists do not even trouble to translate their private destiny to terms of law. To them the sole duty of the individual is to surrender his will to the single will of his leader, who surrenders his will in turn to the mystical pulse of history. And the individual's sole destiny is to accept the inevitable future as the weeds accept the senseless and inevitable surging of a wave.

But it is not only in our political theories and our historical theories and our economics that the men and women of my generation are fatalists surrendering to the will of fate. We have made the same confession again and again in our literature.

The books we have written about ourselves and the world we live in are books which will take their place in the great tradition of such work. The best we have done is work well done indeed, work which will be remembered. But the picture of our world and of ourselves which these books give is nevertheless a picture of a world compelled by forces beyond the control of men—a world in which men at the worst are violated by these forces and at the best are skilled victims. The heroes of the books we write about ourselves are neither heroes nor are they masters of their fate; the very phrase for us has a romantic, a pretentious, even a silly sound. The heroes of the books we write about ourselves are defeated men whom we pick out for notice because of the manner of their defeat or because of their bravery in accepting it. They are defeated men who have been defeated as the martyrs were defeated, or defeated men who have accepted their defeat with the saving salve of irony or defeated men who have secretly escaped not only from their defeat but from the world, or defeated men who have revenged themselves on their defeat as a street boy revenges himself upon the streets and buildings of his city.

It is commonly said of the literature of my generation that it is realistic and for this it is much praised. It deserves the praise, I think, but not the reason. Other generations whose writers could claim on equal honesty have presented a world which was at least as real and altogether different. What is true of the characteristic novels of my generation is not that they are realistic in any absolute or universal sense, but that they are realistic from a particular and special point of view. They are realistic from the point of view of the defeated man—the man conquered by forces beyond his power to resist.

They are not so much realists' novels as they are victims' novels. The world they describe is the world as the victim sees it. The truth they tell is the victims' truth—the truth told behind the hand, the truth discreditable to the teller and the hearer—the low-down, the confession, the exposure. The enemy of these books also is the victims' enemy. The victim's enemy is not the human enemy—another man or even many other men. The victim is the figure crushed by forces with which no man ever fought, unnameable forces often. And so it is with the books we write about ourselves. The enemy with us is something that rises out of the total life of the time like the sour smoke that hangs over a great city or something that rustles and gibbers and mews in the contemporary psyche or something sprawled along the whole of history, its tail and huge hind quarters buried in the dark of long-past years. The enemy is The System, or History, or Life. The truth of these books is the truth of the victims of this enemy: the victims frustrated, thwarted, crippled, and destroyed.

It is a truth our generation has told as it has never perhaps been told before—a truth our generation has told in novels and plays and poems which surpass, as a whole, the work of any other generation in this country. The books in which men of my generation have written of the world and of themselves are books which mean, if they mean anything, that my generation sees the world as the victim sees it, and accepts as unopposable and inescapable the laws which take for us the place of fate.

It is for this reason that the prophecies you have heard are the prophecies of impotence and defeat. They are the words of men who speak as prophets not because they have greater knowledge of the future than you but because they belong to a generation which believes that life is determined by a preexisting pattern. They are words of frustration and defeat because the pattern of life in which their generation believes is a fatalistic pattern: because their generation sees the world as the victims of impersonal and mechanical laws, necessities, and systems see it.

It is for this reason then that you must be warned against these speakers. Those who tell you that you need not make decisions in this desperate time because the laws of history will shape the future in any case, those who tell you that you need not face the fact that Nazism threatens everything you love because Nazism is an agency of the historic process which will determine everything regardless of your acts; those who tell you this are victims speaking consciously as victims in a victim's words.

Those who tell you that the destroying guns, the ruinous bombs, the lies, the murders, the indiscriminate death, and confusion and untruth of the Fascist military action are a new, creative, irresistible historic force which you cannot oppose but only ride with as the rubbish rides the surf, are victims prophesying with the tongues of victims.

Those who tell you that you cannot defend democracy without losing it because the historic forces and the economic laws will turn it into fascism the moment you attempt to defend it; those who tell you that you cannot win a war against fascism because the military laws won't let you and that you will suffer humiliation and disaster if you attempt to defend yourselves while you still can, gaining honor and glory only if you submit; those who tell you this are victims shameless in their impotence as victims.

But it is not only because these speakers speak as victims that you must be warned against them. You must be warned against them for another reason. You must be warned against them because they are speakers who are not disinterested speakers. Neither they nor any others who accept the fatalism of historic necessity, of social and economic determinism—neither they nor any others who doubt the possibility of human action or the freedom of the human will to act—are distinterested speakers. Whether they so realize or not, they have taken sides already in the basic conflict of our time. They are men who would have been obliged to invent a Fascist revolution if they had not found one, and nothing they may say in disapproval of the Fascist method or the Fascist policy will change that fact. They have already made, and willing made, the one surrender which engenders all the rest.

For the real issue is precisely the issue between those, on the one side, who believe that it is possible for men to imagine, and in imagination to act, and by action to create the kind of world they wish to live in—the kind of world in which each man is truly free—and those, on the other side, who believe it is not possible for men to create for themselves the world they wish to live in, but only possible to accept a world predestined, a world ordered and directed by those who know and can interpret the commands of fate. The real issue is the issue between those on the one side who believe in themselves and believe in their capacity to act, and are willing to accept the responsibility for action and those on the other who believe there is no room for men to act and no possibility that men will govern themselves and control their own lives, and who therefore remit to the fates, to the universal laws, the responsibility for action.

Those who continue to believe, despite the failure of democracy to accomplish its ideal or even nearly to approach it in any country—those who continue to believe despite the failures of democracy and the successes of the Fascist armies—those who continue to believe that man is what the Greeks believed him to be and what the founders of this Republic believed him to be—will not accept the prophecies of defeated men. Neither will they accept the prophecies of those who offer to tell them how they can avoid the necessity of decision and of action. For they know, as they know nothing else on earth, that their first duty is to decide and to decide with individual responsibility, and to decide with full and faithful knowledge of the facts. Only by such decision is government of the people by themselves conceivable.

Members of your generation, troubled by the prophecies, troubled also by the demands made upon your loyalties and your emotions from many sides, have addressed themselves in the last few months to men of my generation demanding of us the answers to certain questions of great difficulty and perplexity—demanding even that we supply you with certain convictions which your education has not supplied: a central faith, a central belief, which you now lack. It is understandable that you should ask but unlikely that your asking will find answers. At least from us. The answers you require are the answers which will enable you to believe in your own lives and to respect your own hopes and to accomplish your own purposes; the answers which will enable you to take the great ambiguous words—democracy, liberty, humanity, freedom—and speak them again as though you first had used them in the world; the answers which will enable you to act and to believe. Our generation has no such answers to supply. Ours is a generation which never learned the answers you have need of; a generation which inherited one set of beliefs and threw them away because the world had altered and took in their place the automatic laws, the mechanical fatalities.

It is not to us but to yourselves that you must look for answers.

And it is in yourselves that you will find the answers. You will remember, some of you, how Odysseus, seeking his way to his own life—his wife, his fruit trees, and his island—beached his ship upon the foreshore of Hell to ask the prophet, Teresias, for answers. You will remember also how he found among the dead there one of his own men, Elpenor, a reckless and self-reliant man who had gone on the roof of Circe's house to drink and had fallen, breaking his neck bone.

You also, seeking your way to your own lives—you also may find upon this shadowy beach of time one of your own years who will answer you as Tiresias could never answer—one who will say as Elpenor would have said:

For myself—if you ask me—
There is no way back over sea water
Nor by earth's oaks or beyond them:
There is only the way on.
You had best—trusting neither to Charts nor to prophets but seamanship—
You had best—if you ask me—
Sail on by the sun to the seaward
Till you come to a clean place
With the smell of the pine in your faces and Broom and a bitter turf
And the larks blown over the surf and the Rocks red to the wave—height:
No sound but the wave's:
No call of a cock from the Windward shore, nor of oxen—
Gull's shadow for hawk's:
Gull's cry for the hawk's cry—
On by the open sea
To a land with a clean beach
An unplowed country
Pure under cleansing sun
With the dung burned dry on the gravel
And only the sand to have
And begin it again: start over.
You have only to cross this place
And launch ship and get way on her Working her out with the oars to the Full wind and go forward and Bring yourselves to a home:
To a new land: to an ocean
Never sailed: not to Ithaca:
Not to your beds—but the withering
Seaweed under the thorn and the
Gulls and another morning.

Again the Party Line Changes

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Daily News of yesterday:

[From the Washington Daily News of June 24, 1941]

AGAIN, THE PARTY LINE CHANGES

For mental gymnastics there is nothing that rivals the corkscrew convolutions of the Communist Party line.

Along about daylight Sunday, Moscow time, when Hitler's bombers and tanks swept across the Soviet borders, the party line turned an abrupt about-face. But our American Bolsheviks didn't hear about it soon enough to prevent the pre-dated Sunday issue of their Daily Worker and the June 24 issue of their weekly New Masses from going to press with articles ridiculing British imperialist rumors of a prospective German-Russian clash.

By the time the American Communists had edited Monday's issue of The Daily Worker, they had oriented themselves to the new direction. In three columns of black-face type down the front page, the Communist Party of America stated its position. Nowhere, in the statement could be found those well-worn phrases, "Wall Street warmongers" and "capitalist butchers." No; Hitler was again in a class by himself as the archenemy of mankind.

Nor, of course, were there repetitions of recent attacks on the program of lend-lease aid to stop the Nazis. To the contrary, there was a clarion call for all Americans who cherish peace and liberty to rally to the cause of the Socialist fatherland.

This latest somersault is no neater than the one the Commies executed in August 1939 when Hitler and Stalin signed their treaty of nonaggression and friendship. Prior thereto the Muscovites in this country had been agitating for "collective security against fascism" and a "united front for democracy." But Stalin and Hitler made their deal and the party-liners were able, without blinking an eye, to hail the pact as "a mighty weapon in the struggle for peace."

Communist policy has been no less inconsistent in the American labor movement. For many years the "line" was to denounce all American trades-unions as tools of the capitalist bosses. But then came orders from Moscow to join up—and they joined, seeking strategic positions of power, using unions to promote discord and advance the cause of the Moscow foreign office.

Another shift in labor policy is now in the cards. Instead of inspiring strikes in defense industries, the Commies probably will start agitating for the speed-up and stretch-out and anything else calculated to increase production—especially if they think there is any chance of cutting Russia in on lend-lease materials.

Our guess is that American workers will not be deceived, but will get on with their duty of rooting out these foreign agents in their midst.

Although the new party line for the moment may happen to coincide with the interests of our friends the British, and may in some instances parallel our own Government's program for national security, there is no assurance that this will long be true.

Let's not forget that in the last World War the Commies made a separate peace with the Kaiser at Brest-Litovsk, leaving their erstwhile allies to stand the whole weight of the German war machine on the western front. The Bolos will do it again if they think they can save their hides that way.

Afraid of the Truth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 25, 1941

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, either because they are afraid to face the facts or do not want the American people to know the truth, or are just indifferent, some folks have charged that Mr. Lindbergh is a Nazi sympathizer.

Some base this accusation upon his acceptance of a medal given him some years ago by the German Government; some upon his statement that we are not prepared to fight a war on foreign soil.

Most intelligent Americans know that we are not prepared to send an expeditionary force to Europe, and the great majority of our people have no desire to do so.

True, Lindbergh accepted a decoration or medal. He accepted one not only from the German Government, but from the Congress of the United States as well, and both were given because of his distinguished service to aviation.

On June 16, 1938, photographers for the Federal press were present at the White House when a picture was taken of Marvin McIntyre surrounded by five well-identified Communists, namely, William Wiener, Max Bedacht, Peter Shepka, John Middleton, and Joseph Brodsky, who were there for the purpose of presenting the President with a portrait of himself.

In December of 1938 another scene occurred in the White House. Upon this occasion members of the Federation of Architects, Engineers, Chemists and Technicians, a C. I. O. affiliate represented by Communists—Marcel Sherer, who ran for alderman on the Communist Party ticket in New York City in 1931, Jules Korchien who had been consulting architect to the Moscow Government, and Lewis Allen Berne, were there to present the President of the United States with an honorary membership in the C. I. O. union.

No one, as far as I know, has ever charged the President with being a Communist or a Communist sympathizer just because these two communistic groups happened to visit the White House and extend these tokens of their esteem, which, as far as the record shows, were accepted and have never been disavowed or returned.

Then consider the case of Jimmie Roosevelt. Jimmie has many medals. The distinguished Representative from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] has called attention to a few of the decorations which the President's son has accepted. See page 4686 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 3, 1941.

We all know that the President's wife, Eleanor Roosevelt, not only entertained Communists at the White House, but that she went before the Dies committee with Communists when she knew, or should have known, that the effect of her acts would be to encourage the Communists and to induce others to overlook their treasonable activities.

Now we find the administration, which has been telling the people that we must fight the battle of democracy throughout the world, rushing to the aid of "red" communistic Russia. The American people now have awakened to find themselves in bed with Joe Stalin and those Russian officials who throughout the years have persecuted, starved, and caused the death of hundreds of thousands of the so-called common men and women.

The Roosevelt diplomacy, the New Deal, has finally gotten us into bed with the enemies of progress, prosperity, and the preservation of liberty. Are the President and his wife and the Communists in the administration—all those foreign-born sympathizers in the administration who wish to remake America—proud of what they have done to America, to our Congress, our courts, including the Supreme Court?

Are they happy, now that they have worked us into a position where men in America no longer have equality of opportunity; where men no longer can exercise the right to work without paying tribute? Where they have us marching not only under the Stars and Stripes but carrying that banner forward in an attempt to place it alongside the red flag of Russia?

Yes; the Roosevelts—and I mean the President and his wife—have done much to "the forgotten man," and they finally have him on the road to complete regimentation and slavery.

Army Red Tape

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT J. ENGEL
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 25, 1941

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Speaker, on the 17th day of April 1941 when I made my report on the construction of the cantonment at Indiantown Gap, Pa., I discussed the question of Army red tape. Those who heard or read the speech will recall that I commented upon the fact that the Army had spent $15,000 for termite shields on buildings in an area where no termite had ever been heard of. I also pointed out the fact that one wooden building had stood on the reservation where these termite shields were used which had been erected in the year 1690 and had stood there for 250 years and no termite had ever attacked it. I also called attention to the fact that the termite shields were placed on the building despite the fact that the camp construction quartermaster had been to Washington and made a recommendation against their being used. The day after this recommendation was made the Army instructed him to put them on any way. It was easier to affirm the order even though it was costing the taxpayers $15,000 than it was to cut the red tape which had to be cut to change the order. Under the system used in the construction of Army cantonments under the cost-plus-fixed-fee system, the contractor purchases a great deal of the material such as lumber, equipment, and so forth, and is then reimbursed by the Army. I have before me a statement showing the amount of red tape that must be unwound before the contractor can be reimbursed for such invoice payment.

When the officers of the Quartermaster General's Department and the Army budget officials were before our War Department subcommittee of the appropriations committee, I questioned them on this procedure, and they stated that this statement set forth the things that must be done before a contractor could be reimbursed for invoice payment. This statement covers nearly 3 regular letterhead-size pages, single spaced. It took 46 paragraphs and subparagraphs to set forth the things that must be done before such reimbursement can be made. I am placing this statement in the RECORD. You will find that it requires the filing of 43 papers before a check is issued and 11 papers after the check is issued, or a total of 54 papers, including originals, duplicates, triplicates, quadruplicates, quintuplicates, and other "uplicates," until in paragraph 5, 12 copies of a purchase order were distributed. It also included the filling out of 5 different Government forms, including Forms 64, 79, 115, 116, and 1034. Paragraph 3 provides that one of these forms is made out in white, yellow, pink, and blue colors. It does not state whether or not any baby ribbon is used. All this is being done under the cost-plus-fixed-fee system of Army construction. Speaking about delays, I am wondering just how much of the delay in Army construction was caused by the winding and unwinding of this type of red tape. I am wondering just what the additional cost of bookkeeping is in putting through the intricate bookkeeping system such as this—54 papers for each reimbursement order, large or small. It will also be interesting to note how many bookkeeping entries were made on the Army and other Government books, and the cost of bookkeeping and accounting in an intricate system such as this. I want to repeat what I said in my Indiantown Gap report, that the Army wraps itself up in red tape until it becomes as helpless as an Egyptian mummy to act quickly in an emergency.

INVOICE PAYMENT AND REIMBURSEMENT ROUTINE

1. Purchasing agent receives estimate of material to be purchased.

2. Three or more quotations are obtained in duplicate from vendors by purchasing agent

3. Quotations are tabulated on form No. 79 and one set is attached to original (C. Q. M. copy of form No. 79), and one set is attached to duplicate (purchasing agent's copy of form No. 79). Form No. 79 (purchase order requisition and tabulation of bids) is made up in quadruplicate, in four colors (white, yellow, pink, and blue), and distributed as follows:

(a) Original is forwarded to C. Q. M. (attached to purchase order).

(b) Duplicate is kept in Purchasing Office.

(c) Triplicate is sent to contractor's chief material clerk.

(d) Quadruplicate is sent to contractor's receiving station.

4. Twelve copies of a purchase order are typed, checked, two copies signed, and remaining copies signature stamped.

5. Distribution of 12 copies of purchase order.

(a) Five copies are sent to C. Q. M through Government field auditor for approval.

(1) Two copies (duplicate and quadruplicate) are retained by C. Q. M.

(2) Three copies returned to contractor's purchasing agent.

(x) Original is sent to vendor.

(y) Triplicate is sent to contractor's auditor.

(1) When ready for payment, if purchasing agent checks invoices.

(2) When material is received and checked, if contractor's auditor checks invoices (as later suggested for future projects).

(z) Quintuplicate copy retained in purchasing agent's file, to which one copy of quotations, invoices, and receiving record is finally attached.

(b) Seven tissue copies are distributed, as follows:

(1) Two copies are sent to Government field auditor for forwarding to C. Q. M. disbursing officer, to accompany invoice for reimbursement.

(2) One copy is handed to contractor's auditor for his numerical file (cost department).

(3) One copy to purchasing agent's numerical file.

(4) One copy to clerk who prepared order, for follow-up and expediting.

(5) One copy to invoice checking clerk.

(6) One copy to C. Q. M. senior receiving inspector.

6. Purchase order listed on transmittal list of purchase orders to C. Q. M., by purchasing agent and sent to field auditor, C. Q. M.'s office. Prices, extensions, footings, etc., checked; purchase order approved by Government field auditor and transmitted to C. Q. M., or executive officer who signs triplicate copy and signature-stamps the others.

7. C. Q. M.'s office returns order to contractor's purchasing agent.

8. Original purchase order is sent to vendor.

9. Acknowledgment is received from vendor (by purchasing agent), and is attached to file copy of purchase order.

10. Delivery slips, delivered with merchandise to material clerk. (When shipments are made by rail, express, and parcel post, shipping memo and tally sheets should be received by material clerk through the mail previous to delivery of material as called for on back of purchase order.)

11. Merchandise delivered and checked by contractor's checker and Government checkers (except that in case of lumber, Government checks for quality only, and accepts the quantity check of contractor and architect-engineer).

12. Receiving record, form No. 64 (original and two copies) signed by chief material clerk, attached to delivery slips (original and two copies) are sent to purchasing agent.

13. Invoice (original and five copies) is received from vendor by purchasing agent.

14. Invoice checked by purchasing agent for correct number of copies, presence of governmentally required certifications, etc. If not in order, invoice mailed to vendor with instructions for corrections. If in order (or when returned by vendor, in order) transmitted to contractor's auditor. It is suggested that on future jobs the quantities and unit prices only of invoices be checked by the purchasing agent and that the invoices then be forwarded to the contractor's auditor for checking of extensions, numbers of properly certified copies, etc.

15. Copy of invoice sent to field auditor (C. Q. M.'s office) by contractor's auditor, for approval (on form 115).

16. Invoice checked by field auditor's office, entered in Government records as approved, and returned to contractor's auditor on form 116.

17. Check issued by contractor and mailed to vendor with original invoice and request that latter be receipted and returned.

18. Invoice receipted and returned to contractor.

19. Reimbursement voucher made up in quadruplicate, but with a separate envelope for each copy; Government Form 1034 written up and certifications signed by project manager; entire file sent to Government field auditor's office, where it is rechecked for payment; also original is checked against copy previously sent to Government field auditor, to detect any alterations in former since approval.

20. Original to Government receiving clerk for certification of receipt of material covered by invoice, then to field auditor (C. Q. M.'s office) for signature.

21. To C. Q. M.'s office for entry in his records, any desired rechecking, and his signature (or that of his executive officer) on Form 1034 certification.

22. Envelopes Nos. 1 and 2 sent to finance officer, Chicago, for reimbursement.

If terms (as in case of Government awards) entail payment of freight bill and deduction of freight from the amount of the invoice, the following steps intervene between steps Nos. 14 and 15 of the foregoing:

1. Freight bill is received and cross referenced to invoice to which it applies. (If requisite number of copies are not provided, or if proper certifications are not present, freight bill must be returned for remedying these defects.)

2. The freight bill sent to Government auditor (on Form 115) for approval; checked for rates.

3. Freight bill returned to contractor's auditor, approved, on Form 116.

4. Freight bill paid and receipted original requested.

5. Freight bill returned, receipted, and amount deducted from the invoice (to which receipted freight bill must then be attached.)

It is suggested that on future jobs, in order to eliminate loss of discounts, that invoices be paid prior to payment of freight bills, or even prior to final checking of invoices from vendors who have continuing accounts.

The Road to Unity

OF

HON. J. WILLIAM DITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 25, 1941

ADDRESS OF CLARENCE BUDINGTON KELLAND, REPUBLICAN NATIONAL COMMITTEEMAN FOR ARIZONA

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Clarence Budington Kelland, delivered at Clinton, Conn., May 22, 1941:

If our country and its institutions are to survive we must search for and find a path to national unity.

There is such a road, but there is only one road and it is straight and narrow. That is the road that will lead us to complete trust and confidence in the purposes of those who are now administering the Government of the United States.

I believe it would be a calamity for America to enter a foreign war before it establishes peace at home

I believe it would be a calamity for America to go to battle with a foreign enemy until it has conquered the enemies that are within our borders. And those enemies are suspicion, uneasiness, uncertainty, and fear of the future. Suspicion, uneasiness, uncertainty, and distrust of the domestic plans and purposes of those who are now in control of the machinery of our Government.

When we entered the last World War we gave to Woodrow Wilson without reservation and without fear the widest and most complete dictatorial powers. We surrendered our freedoms. We gave up for the duration of the emergency our constitutional rights. We placed the resources and the lives of this Nation in the hands of one man unhesitatingly. Because there was not a man, woman, or child in America who did not sleep confidently in the sure knowledge that when the emergency had passed Woodrow Wilson would return those powers to the people and our Republic would continue.

Today we are asked to give powers as wide, as deep, as dangerous to the present administration. I doubt if there lives a man, woman, or child in the United States who is confident these powers will be returned to us when peace shall come, and this Republic and its institutions be left intact.

The question we are asking ourselves and must continue to ask ourselves is: How shall America profit if she goes to war to destroy a dictator abroad if in the process she creates a dictatorship at home? We are asking, and must continue to ask, why we should sacrifice our wealth, our comfort, our careers, our very lives to abolish a detestible form of government in Europe while we sit tamely by to see a totalitarian government set up on this continent.

This is a question that must be answered and a condition of fear and uncertainty that must be abolished before America dares to throw herself into the most dreadful conflict in history. This is a doubt that must be allayed before we can have unity of purpose such as is necessary to prosecute a war. This is a fear that must be erased completely and forever before indispensible unity can be achieved; before we can march to war without a terror lest there be an enemy in our rear.

In such an hour, in face of such a question, the American people are entitled to guaranties by the present administration that it will return the powers it asks, and that the American Republic, with its institutions and freedoms, shall be restored when peace comes again to the world.

We, the people, are asked to make vast concessions. It is our right and our duty to demand that concessions be made by this administration in return.

What guaranties can be given that will restore confidence?

What concessions can be made that will justify us in surrendering what the administration asks us to surrender?

One guaranty that would be conclusive, convincing, complete, and final would be the removal from high places of authority officials, appointees whom experience has taught us are unworthy of the trust and confidence of this Nation. One guaranty that would convince every American of the good faith and honorable intentions of this administration would be to remove from positions of autocratic power individuals who are incompetent, inefficient, visionary, or corrupt. One great step toward unity and faith and enthusiastic support would be to replace these officials with Americans of known probity and ability and patriotism. With individuals who are known to believe to the depths of their souls in the institutions of this Republic, and who could be relied upon to fight to the death for their preservation.

This is not a demand for a coalition government; it is a demand for an American government. It is a demand that this administration guaranty its good faith by seeking for and appointing to the highest, most crucial offices men who are worthy, tried, capable. Let this administration find them and place them where we can see them with our eyes and know that they are working in our behalf. Where we can know they are working for the Republic and not for that incohate, incoherent mass of unworkable theories known as the New Deal.

Let the administration guarantee its good faith by delegating its vast and dangerous powers to men who will in their turn be living guaranties that they will be used for the public good and for the ultimate preservation of this Republic.

The affairs of this country are so vast, so far-reaching, that no single man, no matter how able, no matter how patriotic, can administer even a fraction of them. Powers must be delegated. They must be delegated to appointees. James Farley once said that the ultimate test of an administration was its appointees.

A major part of the distrust with which we Republicans and millions of Democrats regard this administration has its roots in the appointees of this administration.

You can unite and weld this country into an unbeatable, invincible unit behind men it knows it can trust. You cannot unite America behind a coterie of such appointees as we now see mishandling the affairs of this Nation. You cannot unite America behind Madam Perkins. You cannot unite America behind Tommy the Cork and Cohen. You cannot unite America behind that amiable and ailing man, Harry Hopkins. Most emphatically, you cannot unite America behind Harold Ickes.

It is to such appointees as these, incompetent, inexperienced, visionary, and even vindictive, that this administration is now entrusting our destinies. It is their hands that will have the spending of our billions and the control of our lives and of our life's blood.

Already the country is seething with rumors of inefficiency in our tremendous program of preparedness. Already the country is seething with rumors of things more malignant than inefficiency. A complacent people may tolerate incompetency, or even dishonesty, in the handling of its treasure. It dares not tolerate inefficiency when it comes to the shedding of the blood of our sons.

So, as a first guaranty, let this administration place our affairs in the hands of men who are worthy to handle those affairs. Let it remove and cast into oblivion those individuals whose gross caperings and intolerance and inefficiency and social scheming have brought our domestic affairs to their present dire pass. Give America back to Americans. Take it away from pets and parasites. Take it away from yes-men and bunglers. Take it away from blunderers and incompetents. Take it away from those whose sole desire is a perpetuation of their own political power. Give it back, give back those powers, to men whose sole thought shall be for the welfare of this land we love.

This, and only this, can be the road to complete unity.

A second step, and one of almost equal importance, is the step of concessions.

If we citizens are asked to concede all, this administration must concede something

In return for what we are to be asked to give let this administration give in return. And by this administration I mean that group, that cabal known as the New Deal.

The fallacies, the fumblings, the futilities of the New Deal have brought this country to the perilous condition in which it now suffers.

The New Deal has not been the American way.

At this moment, the most crucial, the most perilous in our history, we are rent and torn by something that is only less malignant than civil war. Our factories are closed, our production of airplanes, of tanks, of ships, of armaments is impeded or brought to a standstill by something that is nothing short of a revolt of labor. The conditions that have caused this revolt were caused by the paltering, the political maneuvering, the miscalled social aims of this administration. It had sowed the wind and is reaping the whirlwind. The condition is evident. The reasons for its existence are evident. It must be cured, and it can be cured only by those whose acts have fomented it.

Very well, then, let this administration make definite and categorical concessions. Let it concede the danger and the failure of those New Deal aims and purposes which do not fit the pattern of American life. Let them disavow those aims which have been demonstrated to be destructive of it. Let this administration state in unmistakable terms that it means to return to the American way of life. Let it state that in the future it means to work for America and not against America.

Then, and only then, can 30,000,000 thinking citizens unite behind the leadership of Mr. Roosevelt and give to him that wholehearted support which we crave to give.

We have heard much talk of bottlenecks. When the history of this era comes to be written there will be but one bottleneck that will be noted by students of our times. That bottleneck is the New Deal. It is the New Deal that is the bottleneck strangling our national unity.

Let these things be done; let these guaranties be given; let these concessions be made. Then, and only then, dares America take the awful step which this administration seems to desire to take—the step of war. Then, if we march to battle we will be carrying our rifles—not in a New Deal war—we will be fighting and dying in an American war.

Bad leadership is better than no leadership. For 8 years we have had leadership of a sort—the leadership of opportunism, the leadership of impulse, the leadership that comes from not knowing what to do in face of the necessity to do something. But it has been leadership.

Today we have no leadership. In Washington we see fear and vacillation. We see the hampering of political expedience. We see that theorists have at last come face to face with reality and do not know what to do about it. We see that they hesitate to step in any direction; that instead of showing the way to the people, they sit hesitant and aghast, waiting for the people to shove in one direction or in another.

Today we have a leadership of trial balloons. The air is daily filled with them. Trial balloons sent aloft by Pepper, by Knox, by Stimson, by Ickes. It shows to us the picture of a leader who is not marching ahead of his army, planning their campaign, issuing orders for their victory, but sitting in the rear until news can come to him of where the army wants to go.

You cannot unite America behind a barrage of trial balloons.

You cannot unite America behind a leadership that is groping for signposts.

You cannot unite America behind a leadership that waits to read the Gallup poll before it makes up its mind.

The only flags behind which you can unite this Nation are the flags of frankness, of truth, of fearlessness, of definite disclosed purpose. The only flags behind which you can unite this Nation are the flags of integrity, of honor, of love of this land and of its institutions. You cannot unite behind the limp flag of vacillation or the flag of partisanship in national emergency.

We are demanding a flag to follow; we are demanding that it be held high in steady hands; we are not demanding a reed shaken by every political wind; what we plead for is a battle flag of the Republic upon which shall be written as was written of old, "Give us liberty or give us death." And a firm, fearless hand to hold it aloft to every wind, even if that wind be the tornado of war.

I have sought reasonably and temperately, without vindictiveness or slander, to show to you what I believe to be the road to national unity and security. I have no more to say, only this:

May God bless and preserve and keep safe and secure for ourselves, for our children, for our children's children, this gracious land of ours.

Trade Agreements With Argentina and Uruguay

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROSS RIZLEY

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 25, 1941

STATEMENT OF HON. ROSS RIZLEY, OF OKLAHOMA, TO THE COMMITTEE FOR RECIPROCITY INFORMATION

Mr. RIZLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement I made yesterday before the Committee for Reciprocity Information:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

To the Committee on Reciprocity Information, Tariff Commission Building,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: As a Member of Congress representing a great agricultural district, I am opposed to the proposed negotiation of trade agreements with Argentina and Uruguay.

In the main, those who have favored the trade-agreement policy have maintained that it would be a great moral force for the promotion of world peace. It must now be apparent to everyone that it has completely failed in that respect.

As far as farm exports are concerned, it is to be remembered that the so-called major purpose of a reciprocal trade agreements program was to increase farm markets for American farm products. In this the policy has likewise been a dismal failure. Even prior to the outbreak of the war agricultural exports for the full fiscal year just preceding were lower than they were in 1932.

My State of Oklahoma is a great livestock State, and a lowering of the tariff will result in a corresponding reduction in the prices of livestock, meat, and meat products which we produce.

We cannot compete with either Uruguay or Argentina in the production of cattle and sheep. Due to the fertility of the soil and climatic conditions in both of those countries, a cow and a calf and a couple of sheep can be carried on from 2 to 3 acres of land the year around. The feeding of hay, cake, silage, etc., is utterly unknown. There they are fattened entirely on pasture crops, the result being that the cost of production is far below anything possible in this country. Again, here in the United States the livestock producer must take into account certain fixed minimum standards, which are necessarily reflected in his production costs, by way of land values, either owned or rented, feed cost, labor cost, shelter, and supplies, and certainly more than ever before, taxes, which by necessity must materially increase. It is eminently unfair to the cattle producers of this country to permit competitive products to come in at reduced rates.

By acreage restrictions, loans, food stamps, and export subsidies, the Government has for 8 years undertaken to raise farm prices and control surpluses.

In view of this, how can a policy logically be defended that will lower duties on competitive agricultural products?

Respectfully submitted.

Farmers and Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALFRED J. ELLIOTT

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 25, 1941

Mr. ELLIOTT of California. Mr. Speaker, Congress must take immediate action to afford farmers relief against the use of force and violence, "quickie" strikes, mob picketing, secondary boycott, and "hot" cargo practices, which are making it impossible for them to produce and market vital food supplies for our citizens and fighting forces.

On May 12, 1941, Mr. George Meany placed before this body an article from the American Federationist purporting to tell of the labor conditions of farm employees engaged in picking lemons in Ventura County, Calif. This article in many respects was entirely untrue and in other respects told only half truths, and being privileged by the unanimous consent of this House, I desire to set forth the facts as found by me upon investigation.

It is known that the farm laborer employed by Ventura County growers is better housed, receives higher wages than any other comparable employees in the United States, and were misled into leaving their work by promises and representations of labor agitators which were obviously untrue and never could be fulfilled. These agitators have created racial hatred, have caused to be destroyed hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of agricultural products, and have created a relief burden on Ventura County of hundreds of Mexican families who, before this time, were wage earners.

During the 1941 lemon-picking season, a jurisdictional wrangle broke out between C. I. O. and A. F. of L. organizers attempting to organize agricultural workers of Ventura County. With both unions apparently unsuccessful in peaceably recruiting members, the A. F. of L. instituted a series of "quickie" strikes apparently to force unionization.

During the month of January, officials of the Seaboard Lemon Association were negotiating with the Agricultural and Citrus Workers' Union, Local No. 22342, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, as required under the National Labor Relations Act, after the union had been certified by the Board as the bargaining agent for the packing-house employees.

During the negotiations the union presented a contract on behalf of the lemon pickers in addition to the packing-house employees. Informed by the association officials that the association could not consider pickers' contracts simultaneously, making negotiations for the packing-house employees contingent upon negotiations with the picking employees, who are exempt as farm workers from the National Labor Relations Act, without violating the act, the proposed contract for pickers was withdrawn by the union.

Yet on January 30 a picket line was placed at the Seaboard Association headquarters by the Agricultural and Citrus Workers' Union, claiming to be picketing for the pickers alone. Neither the pickers nor the packers would cross the picket line.

No demands had been made on the association other than the one instance referred to.

A picket line was placed at the Oxnard Citrus Association at noon on January 30 without making any demands. On the following morning, January 31, picket lines using Mexican workers from the Seaboard Association crews were thrown around the Saticoy Lemon Association plant—this despite the fact that an election had been held among packing-house workers at the Saticoy Lemon Association the day prior, January 30, by the National Labor Relations Board.

Absolutely no demands of any sort, either verbal or written, were made on the Saticoy Lemon Association or the Oxnard Citrus Association. Naturally there were big headlines in the local papers, but when reporters questioned farmer members of these associations, who hired their picking crews cooperatively in order to even the flow of fruit to the packing houses and to furnish stable long-term employment to their pickers, the farmers were at a loss to know what the strike was about, as no demands had been made upon them.

The American Federation of Labor organizer, Ed Achstetter, of San Francisco, was joined at approximately that time by A. H. Peterson, of Los Angeles, both of whom are industrial- or craft-union organizers. Evidently realizing they had lost public support by stopping the harvests without even making demands, they used a new tactic. On February 4, between 11 and 12 a. m. they sent a messenger to the Briggs Lemon Association, the Santa Paula Citrus Fruit Association, Limoneira Co., Teague-McKevett Association, Culbertson Lemon Association, and the Ventura County Orange & Lemon Association with a contract demanding a one-third increase in wages and recognition of the union as sole bargaining agent for all lemon pickers, giving until 5 o'clock that same afternoon for them to accede to the demands, or a strike would be called. Of these last-named cooperative associations, five market through the California Fruit Growers' Exchange, with the Ventura County Orange & Lemon Association marketing through the Mutual Orange Distributors.

On the same day the first demands were made on the original three associations struck.

On February 10 pickets from other struck houses were thrown around the Rancho Sespe, all of whose operations are on their own ranch and are not subject to the National Labor Relations Act. This ranch did not receive notice or demands from the union until February 17, 7 days after the so-called strike occurred.

On February 10th pickets from other houses were thrown around the Fillmore Lemon Association. No demands were served on the farmers belonging to this association until February 21, 9 days after the so-called strike began. On that same day at noon the same demands were made on the Ventura Citrus Association and the Ventura Coastal Lemon Association, giving them 5 hours to sign the contract as submitted. Picketing began there on February 13. Of these last two associations one markets through the exchange and one through the American Fruit Growers.

In this particular area most of the associations, which include all parts of Ventura County, are members of the district exchanges, affiliated with the California Fruit Growers' Exchange, but their competitors were included as well. The Mutual Orange Distributors, through which the Ventura County Orange and Lemon Association markets, is a competitor, as is the American Fruit Growers, through which the Ventura Coastal Association markets. This point is reiterated because leaders of the union have claimed at various times that they were striking against the California Fruit Growers' Exchange. That this is untrue is evidenced in the fact that the union leaders themselves announced to the public press that they were striking against all Ventura County lemon growers, and that their move was not a strike solely to increase the wages or improve the working conditions of the lemon pickers, but it was a county-wide first step by the American Federation of Labor to unionize all agricultural labor in California.

Mexican workers refused to go through the lines patrolled by the so-called union pickets. The word "so-called" is used advisedly, because the leaders of the strike admitted in testimony before a State legislative committee that they were in effect handling the strike on a contingent-fee basis and no membership cards in the union had been issued to the Mexican workers involved, but that the Mexican workers' signatures had been obtained solely on a power of attorney after the strike was called, and if the strike was successful they would then sign up. The presiding senator asked Mr. Peterson if the union was drawing a racial line by not issuing bona fide membership cards to the Mexicans.

Throughout the establishment of picket lines and barring of Mexican workers from the picking operations there is ample evidence of coercion and intimidation. These Mexicans did not understand this sudden order not to work, or the threats of violence, being told they had to support their race against the white people. When these organizers told them that the Government wanted them to strike, that Uncle Sam was on their side, they didn't know what else to do. Leaders in the strike went so far as to state that if the growers did not accede to their demands, the Government would take over the property and operate the farms, or divide them among the workers.

These Mexicans were told by Achstetter and Peterson that when they marched on the picket line they were marching in Uncle Sam's Army.

A racial hatred was created, and the pickets, particularly the women, were very offensive in heckling workers who went through the lines.

Remember that none of the white workers would believe or follow the leadership of these outside agitators who came into Ventura County, throwing picket lines around farms and cooperative farm association headquarters, attempting to stop everyone from going to work. Thus these white workers going through the picket lines were called all of the vile names in the Mexican vocabulary. There was engendered a racial feeling and hatred among those workers who had worked together harmoniously through all of the past history of lemon production. Now the farmers are faced with the problem that many of these white workers who went through the Mexican picket lines and assisted the farmers in saving their crops have insisted that they will not work with the Mexicans in the future.

Growers could not accede to the demands of these outside agitators and stay in business. Congress has consistently recognized the fact that industrial unionism, with its complete surrender of job control in seasonal farm operations, could not work in agriculture when they specifically exempted farm workers from the national policy of such legislative acts as the National Labor Relations Act, the Wages and Hours Act, and so forth.

With California farmers already paying wages that are highest in the Nation, no farmer could stay in business if his harvest labor costs were further increased as demanded by the union. With a huge surplus crop, the largest in history, depressing prices, they could not pay the wages demanded. As proof of that, a report of the economic condition of the lemon industry and its inability to bear increased costs has been prepared by the University of California in an impersonal, impartial survey.

Even with economic conditions as they are, according to the report of the Fair Labor Standards Act, dated April 29, 1940, California pays 80 percent higher citrus wages than Texas and 28 percent higher than Florida, the two States against whom California competes in the production of citrus products. In addition to that, California must pay a much higher freight rate to get fruit to the eastern and middle western markets.

It is little wonder that the lemon growers fighting to maintain their groves, without knowing which way to turn to pay interest on mortgages or borrowed money, with a huge surplus depressing the market, and facing the problem of feeding and clothing their own families, resisted the organizers of the A. F. of L., who moved in, forcing pickers to strike for a 30 to 35 percent increase in wages—this at a time when the trees were loaded with fruit, the picking long overdue because of rains, so that due to the large crop and the heavy pickings, the pickers could have made 25 percent more at the old scale of wages than they had made the last year.

For an industry to accede to such demands to advance wages and increase losses at a time when the industry was losing money would be suicidal.

Beyond these points, anyone with common sense knows that farmers are not going to turn over job control on their farms to outsiders who have walked into the county and staged such a strike, using force and intimidation, and allow these men to determine their costs and methods of operation. These men offered no proof that they represented even a majority of the Mexicans whom they forced out of the fields.

The farmers did attempt in this emergency to meet with their own employees and discuss the economic situation. They believed in and publicly announced that they had never done anything to prevent their employees from joining the union and did not intend to do anything. They publicly stated that workers were free to join if they wished to, but that they did not have to join a union to work on Ventura County farms. Quoting from their public statement:

> We never have and we will not in the future treat union workers differently from those who do not belong to unions.

Freely recognizing the right of farm workers to join the union if they wished and agreeing to bargain collectively, in good faith, with duly accredited representatives of their employees, the farmers received neither proof of representation nor any chance to work out the situation with their own employees.

The arbitrary action of union leaders in calling strikes, then serving notice, or serving notice with only 5 hours for consideration of demands, accompanied by no proof of proper representation, with force and intimidation and threats of violence used to force workers from the field, no American farmer could consider that a reasonable approach to negotiation.

Ventura County farmers had for years been proud of the record they had set in wages, conditions, and continuity of employment as compared with agricultural wages in other States, particularly those growing citrus fruits. Monthly reports of the Bureau of Statistics of the United States Department of Labor will definitely show as a comparison between competitive agricultural areas our own wage conditions are much the highest. Particularly pertinent to the citrus industry is the recent study of the Women's Bureau of the Department of Labor.

Lemon pickers have lived for years on the same ranches, have been furnished housing the year round, with continuity of employment that averaged 9 months per year. When there was no employment either in lemon picking or other work on the particular ranch, workers were free to live in the houses and work in the other crops of the county, for Ventura County farmers had rotated their crops, changed their plantings, and arranged harvests so that they were able to furnish the most stable employment for agricultural workers in any seasonal crop-production area in the United States.

Housing in Ventura County furnished to farm workers is recognized, taking the county as a whole, as the finest in existence. I submit herewith photostatic copies of reports on this housing from the Division of Immigration and Housing of the State of California, made less than 6 weeks prior to the calling of this strike.

These reports submitted are on the very camps which are attacked so viciously by such men as George Meany, secretary of the American Federation of Labor, who came to the county for a short survey after the strike had failed, and is now using his national influence in attempting to heckle the farmers to whom the A. F. of L. lost the strike.

The growers were not angry with these Mexicans who struck. They realized they had been misled and intimidated. For 3 months they allowed them to continue living in their houses, despite the fact that they were not working and were paying no rent, and the farmers were even having to pay the lights and water and gas bills on more than 600 of these houses.

After weeks of refusal to work on the part of the Mexicans, the farmers asked them to come back to work again, stating that if they did not come back, they would have to have the houses for new farm labor employed to replace them. Then they gave them 30 days' notice to vacate. At the end of that 30 days they gave them 3 days' notice. Then they filed suits in the justice courts asking for writs of possession.

As soon as the hearings started in the justice courts, counsel for the occupants of the houses asked the growers to not evict these farm workers all at once. The workers signed stipulations admitting that they were in illegal possession of the houses, that their employment had been lawfully terminated with the farmers. In return for that, the farmers granted a period of 30 days during which the Mexicans who occupied the houses were to leave of their own volition, agreeing to move out without further recourse. The growers waived all claims to rents and charges for gas, and lights, and water.

Immediately thereafter the union leaders instructed the Mexicans to refuse to move until they were forcibly thrown out, and it was necessary for the growers to go back to court and get writs of possession on their judgments and have the law forcibly evict the occupants of the houses. Many of the Mexicans, knowing they were in the wrong, tried to slip out of the houses in the dead of night so the union leaders would not be aware of their leaving, until in desperation the union leaders even had picket patrols in the camps so that the Mexicans could not leave.

After waiting months for these Mexicans to return to work, the farmers had to have workers to pick their lemons before they fell on the ground and were lost completely. White workers, many of them migrants, began applying for lemon-picking jobs, and the farmers naturally hired them. These people, many of whom had been blown out of the Dust Bowl, others who had worked as agricultural workers in other States and other parts of California, were able to make enough money at the existing wages that they readily lived in tents and temporary housing until the farmers could furnish the housing to them after the long eviction proceedings necessary to remove the Mexicans from houses which they had built for their workers out of their own funds.

Mr. Meany, who has attempted to propagandize against the farmers of Ventura County in the Nation's Capital and through the national American Federationist, could scarcely be human and continue his defaming remarks if he had seen the tears of gratitude and heard the faltering words of thanks of the women of the migrant families, such as one who said, "God be praised. In all these years we have been roaming around doing farm work, I never expected to get a roof over our heads again, much less a pretty little home like this with flowers growing in the yard, electric lights, and real plumbing." And they were happy, for they were making an average hourly wage, while still new at lemon picking, of 40.8 cents in an area where the continuity of farm employment ran 9 months a year, where they were furnished housing and did not have constantly to be moving around in search of jobs.

To that was added the promise of the farmer that those persons working for him through this emergency, when he had to save his crop despite picket lines, would not be fired at the demand of the union so that strikers who placed the farmers in this precarious position could return to their jobs. The growers cannot honorably let these workers go after making such promises to make places for Mexicans who now want to return to work.

The farmers know these Mexicans did not quit their jobs of their own volition. Their lot had been improved year by year, better housing had been supplied them, constant efforts on the part of the farmers to increase the continuity of employment had been made, but the Mexicans had been mesmerized by the promises made to them by the strike leaders—promises of Government support, promises of huge increase in wages, promises that they would be taken care of throughout the strike period. They were promised food and clothing and money by the union. These promises have not materialized, and the Mexicans now are being supported solely by the relief agencies, with the exception of a few quarts of milk a day and other small contributions so that the union could try to keep up appearances.

At the present time the peak of employment is past in the lemon picking, and labor demand is on the decline. There is no opportunity to rehire those Mexicans who struck in January and February for Ventura County lemon picking.

Under the leadership of the two men who attempted to use Ventura County lemon picking as the initial step toward unionizing California agricultural labor, these Mexicans who were once gainfully employed so that Ventura County had the lowest relief load of any comparable agricultural county in the United States, are now practically all supported by either State or Federal relief agencies.

The State relief administration certified strikers for relief so rapidly that the State legislature investigated its practices. It can be summed up in the public statement of Senator John Phillips, chairman of the investigating committee, who said:

> If you accept the premise that it is all right for strikers to receive relief, then I would say that the State relief administration has not certified too many of the applicants for relief.

The Farm Security Administration made relief available to all who could not comply with State relief administration requirements.

The eviction of the nonworking Mexicans from houses that the farmers needed to house new workers could have been accomplished with little hurt to those involved. It was for this humanitarian reason that the growers waited so long to start and then staggered the time of the evictions. But the union leaders, Achstetter and Peterson, used this for propaganda purposes. An outstanding example of this was the family which was evicted during the day and early that night it started to rain. The farmer had known that Mexican family for a long time, so he took a truck and went down to where their household goods were located and offered to take them anywhere they wanted to go to get them out of the rain.

Union publicity photographers were present, however, and ordered the family not to accept the farmer's offer. So the family stayed there and the children were put to bed on the ground in the rain, and that became a "horror picture" for union propaganda against the farmers in Ventura County.

The union organizers promised housing to all the workers if they would stay in the houses until evicted. They promised tents and they promised to take care of the strikers in every way. They brought in a few tents and then claimed that no more were available, although local newspapers checked with firms in that business and openly stated that plenty of tents were available. It was not good propaganda for the unions, though, for the strikers all to be in tents. The result was that the county board of supervisors made available a temporary camp ground for the strikers. Then the Farm Security Administration opened a mobile camp. And in these the strikers who haven't worked for more than 4 months are being cared for now by the relief agencies.

These Mexicans on relief now are refusing jobs of every type and at every wage. They openly boast that there is no need of their working so long as the Government—county, State, and Federal—furnishes them a place to stay, food to eat, and cash from the State relief administration.

To the Ventura County farmers who faced this series of "quickie" strikes, secondary boycotts, and propaganda attacks, it seems this has been another attempt to establish a union-labor dictatorship in agriculture—an attempt by agitators to gain control of the Nation's food basket.

It has long been a recognized fact—acknowledged even by the union's legitimate leaders, who sought legislation in Washington, such as the National Labor Relations Act and the Wages and Hours Act—that the principles of industrial unionism cannot apply to agriculture and agricultural workers, particularly in seasonal operations.

A farmer cannot padlock his plant and leave his machinery idle during a strike, or even during negotiation proceedings. He is not in the position of a manufacturer whose loss of production is during the time of the strike only. A farmer's crops are perishable and can be ruined or badly damaged in a few days. He is placed in the "or else" position of acceding to demands of the union quickly or else losing his crop if he can find no other way to harvest it.

Industrial unionism, based upon the methods of operations for employees in an industry, cannot fit agriculture where, in a short period of time, the farmer will lose not only his year's effort and money invested in 1 year's crop, but in many instances will lose his farm and homestead.

Added costs to agriculture, unlike in industry, cannot be added to the selling price of farm commodities. The farmer must pay all increased costs. And in agricultural commodities where there is a surplus the surplus makes the price.

Organized labor has gone far beyond their strikes on the farms in an effort to force industrial unionism down the throats of Ventura County farmers. They instituted a secondary boycott, threw picket lines around an auction market in Los Angeles, and tried to stop the sale of all citrus fruit in southern California through that market.

Union tactics shut down the principal lemon byproducts plant in southern California with a picket line in a secondary boycott and the use of hot-cargo tactics—using these practices which have since been outlawed by the State legislature.

They have attempted to use the secondary boycott against all marketing agencies handling any Ventura County fruit. They make a great hue and cry against the California Fruit Growers' Exchange because that cooperative organization continues to deal with the farmers who are members of the Exchange. They try to threaten the farmers' own organizations and to get them to refuse to deal with the Ventura County farmers and thus enforce the union dictates. In doing this, they propagandize against one marketing agency; in another place they pick another marketing agency, such as the Mutual Orange Distributors, against whom they tried to enforce a secondary boycott in Portland, Oreg., because Ventura County lemons were sold there.

Their strategy in selecting one marketing agency here and another there is simply this: They hope to use the force of competition in the markets by the various farm cooperatives to divide the farmers against themselves and get this group of farmers to fight against the other group so the union can take control. It is one of the oldest tricks of enforcing union demands to use the pressure of competition and the very fact that where they boycott Mutual Orange Distributors markets, they do not attack the California Fruit Growers' Exchange; and where they attack the exchange they do not attack the M. O. D., makes it discernible that they are using this old tactic of competitive pressure.

If they had been honest and attacked all Ventura County growers, whether members of M. O. D. or the California Fruit Growers' Exchange, the American Fruit Growers', and the independents, then it would have been a boycott against the farmers to whom they have lost their strike.

All of this ably demonstrates that farmers with perishable crops cannot bow to the will of industrial unionism for agriculture. And if need be, Congress, who has thus far contended that agriculture does not come under the provision of our national laws which support industrial unionism must take action to remedy such abuses. Farmers must have immediate relief against this continued heckling by these labor leaders who have misled a race, created dissension, disrupted a community, and are now attempting to blackmail a sound American farm community into industrial unionism through boycotts and attacks against farm programs. Agriculture is a vital arm of national defense and we must immediately give it whatever protection is necessary to prevent any interference with the production, preparation for market, and marketing of farm products.

Dangers and Advantages to the United States From the Russo-German War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, now that Hitler has turned his face and his armies eastward and is blasting away at Stalin's bloody despotism in Russia, the experts, the near-experts, the would-be experts, the columnists, and the "I told you so's" will all be handing out a lot of good, bad, and indifferent guesses—and guesses only, as to what the new war means. This conflict between these two bloodiest, most selfish, ruthless, and brutal ravagers of humanity since Genghis Khan swept like a plague over a great part of the then-known world, may take any kind of a turn. The guess of the citizen, in any American hamlet, is just as good as that of the experts and the near-experts in Washington. We cannot believe half of what comes to us from Russia, from Germany, or from England. We are told merely what each government wants us to know or think—and nothing more than that.

Hitler is, of course, not fighting to make the world—or Europe—safe against communism. Stalin is not fighting to make Europe or the world safe against nazism. Hitler is trying to grab and control by force all the food, oil, manufacturing, and other resources possessed by Russia. Stalin, the greatest double-crosser known in history, has been trying to promote warfare between all the other countries in the world in the hope they would bleed themselves white, exhaust themselves, destroy their industries, and lie prostrate for the Beast of the Kremlin to assume bloody despotism over all of them.

Of course, generally speaking, the more damage the Nazis do to the Russians and the more damage the Russians do to the Nazis, the safer the world of free and honest men and women and children will be.

But it would be a mistake to regard this new warfare between Hitler and Stalin as an unmixed blessing for Great Britain and the United States.

Stalin is hated by his own armies. He damaged himself more than any one else could ever damage him when he killed off all his able generals, his chemists, and other scientists, his efficient industrial engineers and managers, and his brainiest strategists. Stalin's crazy policy has been to shoot every man who showed enough ability to become powerful in any branch of the Soviet Government.

The doughty little Finns made the Russian Army look like a collection of dumb oxen. If the Russians cannot put up any better fight against the Nazis than they did against the Finns, Hitler's air and tank divisions will conquer them in jig time.

There is another possibility which is disquieting for Britain and for us. If the Russian Army leaders should, because of their hatred for Stalin on account of his slaughter of the ablest Army men, destroy him and turn over the Russian Army to Hitler, the civilized world would face a calamity unequalled in the annals of civilization. Such a surrender—or rather such a coalition—would give Hitler oil, foodstuffs, raw materials, industries, and manpower. Under efficient German direction, the Nazis would be equipped to conduct a long and devastating war against the rest of the world. Japan would quickly swing over actively to the Nazis in such a situation. Under these circumstances, it would be the United States and Britain against Axis Powers which would be potentially deadly dangerous to us all.

On the other hand, if the Russians do put up a real battle, which they can do if their experience with little Finland has taught them anything, Hitler may be kept so busily engaged for a time as to give Britain a breathing spell, time to pull herself together. We also would gain a breathing spell—but the good Lord grant that we improve it better than we have the time granted us so far. Even our military and naval officers are alarmed at the mere trickle of aid flowing out to Britain, and the less than trickle of implements and munitions of war flowing out to our own armed forces. It is little short of criminal the way our defense has lagged while strikes have played havoc with the program.

The writer is not the only one by a long shot who sees in this war between Hitler and Stalin startling new potential danger for the United States and Britain, as well as possibilities for benefits and advantages. The developments will have to be watched. Meanwhile, the only safe course for the United States is to turn to and start building our national defense at the speed we have been told by the administration it is being built—but is not.

We had better prepare—and prepare almighty fast—for the worst. If the worst does not happen we will be well off. If the worst does happen we will not be caught unprepared, if we use good sense.

Meanwhile, the administration should act in this whole world situation solely in the best interests of the United States of America. By so doing it will be acting in the best interests of all enlightened humanity.

Washington's Leading Newspaper Warns United States Against Entering a War To Make the World Safe for Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to call attention of the House to the following editorial from this morning's issue of the Washington Times-Herald, the largest and most widely read newspaper published in the Capital City. I do this, in the first place, to belie the contention that all of the big eastern newspapers are owned or controlled by forces desiring to push this country into the wars now raging in Asia, Africa, and Europe. This is most emphatically not true of the Washington Times-Herald, which continues to wage an aggressive editorial campaign against our entrance in the war and on behalf of tightening our own defenses and those of the entire Western Hemisphere. I am sure that such an assumption is also untrue in the case of several other metropolitan papers of the East. In the second place, I call this editorial to the attention of the House because of the thought-provoking analysis which it makes of the war situation now that communistic Russia has become engaged in the actual fighting.

Mr. Speaker, I know of no responsible and respected American who advocates that the United States send its sons to fight and die in order to help nazi-ism conquer communism and to project its pagan doctrine over all of Europe. By the same token, I believe that very few Americans who lack financial reasons for putting America into a shooting war favor sending American boys to fight and die to help defend the doctrine of communism or to facilitate its spread across the map of Europe. I believe that most Americans are like myself in disliking equally the destructive and pagan philosophies of nazi-ism, communism, and fascism, and President Roosevelt's earlier remark about "a plague on both your houses" seems to be a fitting salute to the plans of Nazis and Communists to spread their doctrines far and wide by invasion or infiltration whenever and wherever domestic governments fail to prepare themselves on the military front and to protect themselves against loss of freedom at home through too much centralization of government and through too long a failure to make free government work to bring justice and happiness to all the people. Retention of national solvency and preservation of the powers of the people and the Congress in our own constitutional framework of government here in the United States are two good ways to safeguard this free Republic against both invasion and infiltration by either nazi-ism or communism. As the gentleman from Texas, MARTIN DIES, has so frequently and factually pointed out through the findings of the Dies committee, in their basic destructiveness of the free way of life there is little, if any, distinction between the poisonous doctrines of nazi-ism, communism, and fascism. All of them are repugnant to the ideals of the free functioning of democracy in the United States.

RUSH TO RUSSIA?

As we try to extract some truth from conflicting German and Russian communiqués about events on the newly opened eastern front we become more convinced than ever that it would be folly for the United States to go any deeper into this war.

HITLER VICTORY

Hitler appears to have reconciled himself to a long war, and to have determined to line up his wheat and oil supply for such a war by carving the Ukraine out of Russia.

He may be able to do that. Certainly his blitzkriegers have begun their multiple stab into Russia with their customary zip. The Reds report initial successes; and Stalin has the vast distances of Russia on his side.

But Hitler has another weapon which we'd expect him to use; namely, the possibility of organizing a counterrevolution against Moscow among the Ukraine peasants. These people, who for ages have wanted to own their own farms, were promised ownership by Lenin in the early days of the Russian revolution, to make them loyal to the Bolsheviks. Later, their lands were taken away from them and communized by Stalin. An estimated four to five million peasants were starved to death in the process, and a reported 10,000,000 exiled to Siberia.

We should think that a Hitler promise to restore private ownership of the land to the Ukraine peasants would light quite a fire in the Ukraine. It might deliver the whole area to Hitler with crops and oil wells virtually undamaged.

In that case, Hitler would be set for his long war with Britain. If his empire held together, it would take decades to beat him if it could be done at all, either by the British Empire or by a British-American coalition.

STALIN VICTORY

The prospect of a Hitler victory over Russia is dreary enough. But how much brighter for us is the possibility of a Stalin victory?

The local "reds" are already reviving their old-time mahoola about "red" Russia being actually a democracy, and some of our interventionists are falling for it. We're being told that we should rush to Russia's aid with as much energy as we are now putting out to help Britain under the Lease-Lend Act.

Actually, Russia is more of a despotism than Germany. It's nicer to have Russia on our side than it would be to have Russia on Hitler's side. But if Stalin smashes Hitler, will Europe be swept by a wave of democracy, bearing the "four freedoms" on its crest?

Europe will not. If Stalin wins, the structure of Hitler-controlled Europe will crack up, and there will be nothing left to keep communism dammed back in Russia. It will be communism that will sweep Europe, and the Communist wave will come all the way out to Europe's Atlantic coast line. It may even jump the English Channel and the North Sea and take possession of England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales.

The repercussions in this country of a Europe-wide engulfment by communism would be enormous. It might mean the end of democracy all over the world. We'd better take notice of these possibilities before we rush to the aid of Stalin.

PAIR OF CROOKS

The long and short of it is, as we see it, that neither Hitler nor Stalin is a man with whom a democratic nation can safely do business, except at arm's length, and preferably with a gun or two cocked on the table.

Both Hitler and Stalin have consistently shown the identifying stigmata of European diplomacy—which in shorter words means either of them would double-cross his mother or murder his grandmother if it would profit him to do so.

The thing for the United States to do, we believe, is to go no deeper into this war than at present, to steer clear of entangling alliances with the Soviet and with everybody else, to keep its powder dry, and collect a lot more of it, by expanding its Navy as rapidly as it can, and building a large Army of plentifully equipped and highly trained mechanic-sergeants at top speed * * * and without further delay to unify its air forces under one separate, independent command, with a view to the most efficient cooperation among our fighting forces of land, sea, and air.

If we stick our fingers into this war, we're likely to get a hand chewed off, no matter who wins.

Authorizations for Reservoirs, Levees, and Flood Walls for Flood Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OREN HARRIS

OF ARKANSAS

Friday, June 20, 1941

Mr. HARRIS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, this bill, H. R. 4911, under consideration by the Committee of the Whole House, is one of the most far-reaching, influential, and beneficial pieces of legislation to this Nation that has been before Congress on flood control and power development. The members of the Flood Control Committee, I personally know, have given unreservedly of their time and study. They have worked hard and endeavored to do the best that is possible for each and every section of this Nation to obtain as much flood control as is possible.

I want to highly commend the chairman, Mr. WHITTINGTON, for the consideration, the courtesy, and patience that he has given all of us in presenting to the committee our problems of flood control, and I also want to commend highly Mr. NORRELL, a member of the committee and my colleague from Arkansas, for the fine, loyal, and diligent work that he has given in this committee in preparing and presenting to this House this most important piece of legislation. Especially, do I want to express the appreciation of all of us who are interested in the agreeable and satisfactory manner in which my colleague, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. NORRELL], has worked with the chairman and other interested members of the committee, in settling the problems of our flood control on the lower Mississippi. This has been a controversial issue for the past 12 years, and in arriving at the conclusion as set out in this bill, the people in the eastern part of my district in this Mississippi area will be pleased and tremendously protected from the devastating floods as never before.

The abandonment of the Boeuf and Eudora floodways, as provided by this act, the elimination of the fuseplug and the construction of the levees on our side of the river to a height that will give a 1-foot freeboard over the project flood, which is the highest and anticipated flood in all history, will give that vast area in Arkansas flood-control protection and enhance the agricultural production, the value of real estate, and the standards of living of our people in that area. The alluvial valley of the Mississippi, which includes a part of Arkansas, and the eastern part of my district, is one of the most fertile and productive regions in the United States. The enactment of this bill certainly solves a problem that has been confusing and controversial for many, many years, and the people of my district will be exceedingly happy to have the benefit of this protection and relief of the continuous threat and discomfort as well as destruction by floods.

Another feature of this bill, in which I am especially interested is the provision for the protection of the town of Calion, Ark., on the Ouachita River. Calion is a small town, with a population of approximately 1,000 people. It has floods from 6 to 10 feet and often reoccurring two or three times a year. The health, lives, and property of the people of Calion and who are residents of my district, are constantly in jeopardy. This problem has existed continuously in the past, and the $50,000 provided in this bill for the construction of a levee around the town of Calion is flood-control money well spent.

The Ouachita River is navigable along there and Calion has become a very important port, because of the strategic location in the agricultural and industrial area and being contiguous to the Arkansas oil field. This territory is under survey by different engineers from the different departments in the establishing of national-defense industries, and this is a very important location, and I have every reason to believe that a part of our national-defense program will ultimately be established in or near this town.

Also, of special interest to the people of my district is the authorization in this bill and provision for what is known as the Little Missouri River project. It authorizes an ultimate expenditure of $6,800,000, with the initial authorization of $3,000,000 for the initiation by the engineers in carrying forward the program as set out in the report. The Little Missouri River runs through my district and flows into the Ouachita River between Camden and Arkadelphia, Ark. The flood-control benefits derived from the authorization of this project will be mostly in my district and the people in that entire area will be greatly benefited by this flood-control measure. It is recommended that flood-control reservoir and power dam be constructed at Narrows, and that the main river channel be improved, as well as the Ozan Creek and the Terre Noire Creek, tributaries of this river. This will increase the opportunties of the people living in the Little Missouri River Basin, giving a greater production of agriculture, as well as other commodities, and will, after all, be another step toward the preservation of our soil and affording to our people opportunities and privileges to which they are entitled. I urge, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that this bill be enacted into law and the iniation of this program go forward as fast as it is possible.

Proponents of Seaway Project Base Their Claims on Illusions—Not Facts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALFRED F. BEITER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 25, 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE LABOR RECORD

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I have the honor to be on the mailing list of the Labor Record, one of the monthly publications of the American Federation of Labor. In a recent issue of this paper I noticed an item which I would like to include under permission to extend my remarks.

Contrary to what the proponents of this seaway would have us believe, the workmen of this Nation, I believe, are aroused to the fact that the construction of this seaway would deprive them of many thousands of dollars in taxes and loss of jobs. These are the men who are in a large majority "the people" of the United States—their welfare is our welfare. They are the Americans who are behind the lines, bending every effort to furnish the ammunition, guns, planes, ships, and other equipment so necessary to national defense. They are not willing, however, to accept the proposal of a seaway in the St. Lawrence River as vital to our defense program; and from all parts of the country I have had letters, telegrams, clippings, and so forth, proclaiming their objection to the expenditure of these millions of dollars on such an unwarranted, colossal construction program as the St. Lawrence seaway. This item from the Labor Record seems to me to be very pertinent at this time:

This paper has published many articles in opposition to the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Treaty project wherein our readers were presented undeniable facts showing that should the seaway be constructed and operated it would prove one of the biggest adverse economic boomerangs thrust upon the American public.

The Trucking Association of Michigan has dispatched a resolution to the Michigan congressional body, endorsing the seaway project on the grounds that the project will link the Middle West with the Atlantic, and serve as an outlet for the national-defense needs produced in this section. The time needed to deepen the 48-mile bottleneck in the St. Lawrence River will require more than 7 years, at the end of which time World War No. 2 will long be over. Many thousands of skilled and unskilled laborers and thousands of tons of dredging equipment will be necessary to begin and complete the seaway. With the national emergency that now exists the United States cannot spare nor divert a single man from the task on which he is presently engaged.

This country has always been served commendably and well by its various transportation systems. Even in its infancy our country realized the importance of adequate transportation, the trek of the "forty-niners" from east to west forced our forefathers to build for the future. Today our railroads, truck lines, waterways, and air lines give perfect satisfaction to all, costly improvements being made from time to time. These great links of transportation serve the country as a whole, east to west, north to south, bringing employment and prosperity to even the smallest hamlet en route. These well-known facts are being repeated to show that up to now nothing in the way of concentrated industrial activity has ever been contemplated.

The seaway's proponents have not considered the various angles to this venture as the more cautious men that constitute the opposition. Let us dissect and study the chaff from the grain. As the entire population of the Great Lakes section know, the waters of this body are only navigable 7 months of the year, which in turn would make the seaway useless during this period. Supposedly for an instant that the seaway would prove the economic boon as claimed by the proponents, would other transportation means content to lie idle 5 months whilst the seaway reaped the golden harvest? No is the only answer. And, furthermore, transportation facilities other than water would be reduced to a point to cope only with the demands of the 7-month seaway-operation period. What has the American investing public done to deserve the proposed unfair competition which would result from operation of the seaway? Our shore lines would be infested with foreign seamen, lowly paid at best, possessing a far different brand of ethics than that of the contented American worker. With these foreigners would also come foreign propaganda and hatred for our capitalistic form of government.

If and when the seaway project would be started we can visualize the endless stream of migratory workers to the Great Lakes region, hoping upon hope to secure a job at a living wage standard. Thousands on thousands of these men, women, and children would only meet disappointment, no pot of gold at the end of the rainbow, having finally to rely on the benevolence of the great American people for a dole to keep body and soul together.

Yes; it is indeed amazing that even the idea of this nonsensical plan to join the States and Canada was given birth. Our people have known previous happiness and prosperity in our own hemispherical domain, and this condition will be present again before long without spending $1,000,000,000 on the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway project.

The Young Democrats of New York Favor Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BERNARD J. GEHRMANN

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 25, 1941

RESOLUTION OF AFFILIATED YOUNG DEMOCRATS OF NEW YORK STATE

Mr. GEHRMANN. Mr. Speaker, forward looking youth of the Nation are proving their metal and Americanism by displaying an intense interest in national affairs, and by actively assuming their share of responsibility in directing our Government.

I offer in evidence a resolution of the Affiliated Young Democrats of New York State declaring their opinion and militant fight for the St. Lawrence development now.

The puppets of the selfish and sectional interests undertake to convince us that New York State is unanimously opposed to the seaway. The open actions of this group, together with the appearance of Governor Lehman and Lieutenant Governor Poletti of New York in favor of the project, serves to discredit their claims.

The resolution follows:

YOUNG DEMOCRATS OPEN FIGHT FOR ST. LAWRENCE DEVELOPMENT NOW

On the eve of the public hearings for the authorization of the St. Lawrence Seaway and power development before the House of Representatives Rivers and Harbors Committee (June 16), the Affiliated Young Democrats rallied the entire New York State congressional delegation in support of the measure. Following by just 10 days the powerful special message of President Franklin D. Roosevelt to the Congress urging the immediate improvement of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin in the interest of national defense, for promoting interstate and foreign commerce, and for generating electrical energy, the Young Democrats launched into the seaway controversy. The Young Democratic endorsement of the proposition actually "put every New York Congressman on the spot." Some New York Congressmen are lukewarm to the project, fearful of the reaction of the Buffalo, Albany, and New York transportation interests. The Young Democratic support was expressed in lengthy memoranda sent by Harold R. Moskovit, State president of the ardent New Deal group. The youth group demanded expeditious congressional approval, and scathingly attacked influential interests which are purportedly spreading false rumors and invalid arguments about the effects of the development.

The memoranda addressed to Senators ROBERT F. WAGNER and JAMES M. MEAD, and the 45 Members New York State congressional bloc, said:

"National defense requires your full and unqualified support of the pending St. Lawrence waterway and power development. In the name of the people of all our Nation and not a restricted self-centered geographical constituency, we are demanding of you and each and every New York Congressman to subvert sectional interests for national preservation. We are asking you to join with us in a last-ditch fight to route unsavory public interests who are purposely spreading malicious rumors in order to block and sidetrack hydroelectric development and greater seaway improvement of the St. Lawrence.

"We need electric power sorely now and later for greater production. We need all available shipbuilding facilities immediately and in the future. To pigeonhole the St. Lawrence project is:

"(1) to play possum with an Axis victory;

"(2) to invite eventual electric-power rationing for home consumers;

"(3) to sabotage the use of all our available hydrogenerated resources;

"(4) to tie our hands in producing defensive equipment, especially aluminum;

"(5) to deny ourselves the right to build 30 American and 50 Canadian battle cruisers to help defend the democracies on the Great Lakes, which would be afloat in 2 years;

"(6) to refuse to free our eastern and southern seaboard for the construction of badly needed cargo ships.

"We refuse to allow the utility gang interests to jeopardize our national integrity for the dollars and cents which motivate their vicious opposition. Don't mistake the supporters of this imperative legislation. This is not a half-hearted effort. The proponents of the St. Lawrence project are in this controversy to the hilt and we want the people of New York State to once and for all break the stranglehold of the octopus utility empire and also free our great Middle West with a navigable outlet to the sea. Progress may not be halted by a possible threat to the personal gain of a few. We did not stifle the production of automobiles because it threatened to hurt the horse and buggy trade. It is tantamount to heresy to delay this project which is so vitally important to this country's future in peace or war.

"To the representatives of the New York City, Buffalo, and Albany areas, we claim the arguments about business loss to these ports are simply home prejudices always apparent to the introduction of something new. The Federal Department of Commerce has demonstrated comprehensively that possible losses will be more than compensated by new diversions. We ask you to look to the benefit for the Nation. The St. Lawrence seaway must be expedited by the Congress of the United States without any further delay."

Father's Letter to Roosevelt Protests Use of Old Subs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 25, 1941

ARTICLE FROM WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Times-Herald of yesterday:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of June 24, 1941]

FATHER'S LETTER TO ROOSEVELT PROTESTS USE OF OLD SUBS

STAUFFER, CALIF., June 24.—A grieving father today made public a letter which he had written to President Roosevelt protesting the use of submarines of the O–9 type.

The father was Thomas W. Tillery, whose son, Thomas W. Tillery, Jr., perished with 32 other officers and enlisted men trapped on board the ill-fated craft Friday.

The father's letter follows:

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: My son, Thomas Winslow Tillery, Jr., has been crushed to death in the submarine O–9. He died without a chance to resist in an outdated, unseaworthy craft. His mother and I find little comfort in knowing that the modern products of America's defense effort are being given to a foreign power. Our remaining son becomes eligible for draft in July.

Tom was a valuable man to his country. For 7 years he worked loyally to earn his rating of machinist's mate, first class. You, too, have sons who have acquired rank and position in the armed forces. If they are serving on sister ships of the O–9, or are dependent upon obsolete equipment, I beg you, as one father to another, transfer them to positions of safety. Then, if we are attacked, they may die honorably in the face of the enemy rather than helplessly at the hands of their own Government.

Respectfully,

THOMAS W. TILLERY.

Members of Our Armed Forces Are Entitled to Tax-Free Cigarettes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 25, 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK JOURNAL-AMERICAN

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CANFIELD] recently suggested to the House Ways and Means Committee that in writing the new Federal revenue bill tax-free cigarettes should be made available to all members of our armed forces.

Congressman CANFIELD's suggestion is a very timely one, since many of the enlisted men of today are receiving a mere $21 a month, and after various deductions have little left to purchase such luxuries as cigarettes.

Congressman CANFIELD's idea has been well received throughout the country. As an indication of the reaction to the suggestion, the following article appeared in the June 23 issue of the New York Journal-American:

[From the New York Journal-American of June 23, 1941]

TAXING SOLDIERS—MEN IN DEFENSE SERVICES SHOULD NOT BE MULCTED

Representative GORDON CANFIELD, of New Jersey, has suggested to the House Ways and Means Committee in Congress—which is writing the new Federal revenue bill—that tax-free cigarettes be made available to all the men in the defense forces—in the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, and the Coast Guard.

This is a proposal that ought to be promptly and favorably acted upon, either in the Ways and Means Committee or on the floor of Congress.

The men in the defense forces, especially those who are drafted from civil life, are making great personal sacrifices in their country's service.

Some of them are having their educations interrupted.

Some are having their careers broken, or the time postponed when they may enter upon careers.

Some have been called away from jobs which in many cases contributed substantially to their families' livings.

For the time in which they serve they will receive very small pay, and out of the pay that they do receive, after allotments and other deductions are made by the Government, they must provide for their personal needs.

Such items as they are able to buy they buy generally from their regimental canteens—that is, from the Government.

So it would be simple enough for the Government to provide tax-exempt cigarettes for the men.

The taxes involved would mean almost nothing to the Government, but would mean a good deal to most of the men.

Similarly, why should frugally paid soldiers be required to pay admittance to motion pictures in Government-owned theaters?

An arrangement could easily be made with the film industry for deferred showing of films at army cantonments, which would in no way affect public patronage of the same pictures elsewhere.

These may seem like little things to some people.

But morale is no little thing in the defense services, and little things like these can be a great factor in building morale.

What's Wrong With Democracy?

OF MINNESOTA

EDITORIAL OF C. H. RUSSELL, OF THE MANKATO (MINN.) FREE PRESS, AND COMMENTS OF THE FAIRMONT (MINN.) DAILY SENTINEL

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the privilege given to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article by C. H. Russell, of the Mankato Free Press, in his personal daily column, 'Round Our Town, together with the comments by the Fairmont Daily Sentinel, of Fairmont, Minn.

Each of us has asked of ourselves this question, "What is wrong with democracy?" and I wish everyone in this country could read these thought-provoking comments in Mr. Russell's editorial.

Mr. Russell's editorial, together with the comments of the Fairmont Daily Sentinel, follows:

[From the Fairmont (Minn.) Daily Sentinel]

WHAT'S WRONG WITH DEMOCRACY?

(By C. H. Russell, in Mankato Free Press)

C. H. Russell, Mankato Free Press editor, never did a more important piece of writing than the following, which filled his personal daily column, 'Round Our Town, in the issue for June 12.

If you are really concerned and thoughtful of the mess our country and the rest of the world are in, you'll be well repaid to read what follows and make it the subject of your best thought:

"They're at it again. The tub-thumpers and the breast-beaters are shouting their old refrain and John Q. Public appears in a state of mind to join the parade and start another crusade. We're all set to save the world for democracy once more, by which we really mean that we're in a frame of mind to spend billions in treasure and to sacrifice millions of lives attempting to foist our form of government on other peoples.

"Unquestionably we need to spend billions on our own defenses.

"And just possibly we're going to be dragged into this war in order to insure a world order in which a democracy like ours can be insured an opportunity to grow and progress in peace and security.

"But let's stop right there, whatever happens. Let's be honest and say that whatever we do regarding this war will be done for reasons of enlightened selfishness and not with the silly idea of telling other peoples of the world how they shall live and what form of government they are to have.

"When we get in this crusading state of mind we lose our sense of perspective. We did back in 1917–18. We refused to see any of the flaws in our democracy and as a consequence they multiplied and flourished like weeds until we brought on the debacle of the twenties.

"After all, there is just a tremendous amount of improving necessary in our own system of government before we can hold it up to the world as an example for others to follow. A lot of superpatriots do not like to hear that but it's the truth nevertheless. The surest way to 'make the world safe for democracy' is to make democracy work better right here at home. And we haven't done that any too well in over 150 years of trying.

"If we're honest we'll have to admit that our democracy never functions as such, in a crisis.

"During the Civil War we resorted to a dictatorship. So, likewise, did we during World War I. In the recent depression and economic crisis that followed we abandoned democratic processes—no dictator wielded greater powers than the President and some of the chieftains of alphabetical agencies down in Washington. When we condemn dictatorships the peoples of other nations point to these lapses in our democratic processes and ask, Why these?

"Thus far we have not been able to give a satisfactory answer.

"If we could sit back more often and see ourselves as others see us, we might avoid these recurring periods of crusading fervor. Coldly analytical leaders abroad ask these questions:

"Did democracy succeed in the United States because it was 'right' or because we had unlimited resources, wealth, and land to make it succeed? Will it continue to function successfully after these resources are depleted or exhausted?

"And similarly they ask, Has democracy succeeded in Britain because it is 'right' or because the British have supported it liberally through the exploitation of backward peoples? Take away this power of exploitation and will Britain remain a democracy?

"'We're getting in a frame of mind where questions like these may be branded as treasonable, but we should think about them nevertheless.

"What we need is a crusade to save democracy here at home instead of worrying so much about other peoples.

"We believe in it as a form of government. We know that it is the ideal toward which the human family has slowly but painfully progressed throughout the ages. It is the Christian ideal of laws, rules, and regulations by which nations and peoples can live together in a complex world.

"But we must realize that, like Christianity, democracy cannot be promulgated by fire and sword. It must come from the hearts of men—not from the mouths of cannon.

"Our task is to make democracy function so well, so soundly, so satisfactorily here at home that it will stand out as the example and model all thinking peoples will want to follow.

"Occasionally we have flashes of inspiration and try to live up to that ideal, but they are infrequent.

"We cannot have a sound democracy when the most able and representative citizens refuse to serve in responsible public posts that make a democracy function.

"We cannot have a sound democracy when political leaders remain in office by pitting one group, faction, clique, or racial segment against another.

"We cannot have a sound democracy when major groups—capital, labor, Government bureaucrats—plot and scheme only for themselves without thought of the welfare of the Nation as a whole.

"We cannot have a sound democracy when thousands of citizens boast of evading taxes instead of bearing their fair share of the Government's expenses gladly and proudly.

"We cannot have a sound democracy when less than 30 percent of the registered voters go to the polls in most elections.

"Until we can correct some of these ills and weaknesses—and there are many more of them—we would do well to ponder putting our own house in order before attempting to inflict our form of government on others. A crusade is needed to save democracy, but we must save it here at home—then it will be safe for the rest of the world and very possibly it will be something they want."

Keep 'Em Flying

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 25, 1941

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH, OF WEST VIRGINIA, AND MAJ. GEN. E. S. ADAMS

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following correspondence:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., June 18, 1941.

Hon. JENNINGS RANDOLPH,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. RANDOLPH: The War Department requests your cooperation and assistance in popularizing the recently adopted slogan, "Keep 'em Flying!" It is the desire of the Department to make "Keep 'em flying" a popular everyday expression used by persons in all walks of life throughout the Nation. It is designed to focus the public mind on unity of purpose and action in our national-defense effort and applies to the wheels of progress in the whole national-defense program as well as to airplanes.

The objective, of course, is to get people everywhere to use the phrase, "Keep 'em flying," as an expression of felicity, high morale, or as a toast, to the point where "Keep 'em flying" will replace such everyday expressions as "So long," "I'll be seeing you," "Down the hatch, "Good-bye," "Good luck," and similar expressions. In short, "Keep 'em flying" is to be our expression comparable to "Thumbs up."

Thanking you, and with kindest regards,
Keep 'em flying,

E. S. ADAMS,
Major General, The Adjutant General.

JUNE 23, 1941.

Maj. Gen. E. S. ADAMS,
The Adjutant General,
The War Department,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR GENERAL ADAMS: Replying to your interesting letter of June 18, you may be sure I will be happy to cooperate in popularizing the Army's slogan, "Keep 'Em Flying!"

The paramount task we have before us as a nation is to build an air force second to none in the world. I am sure that this phrase on the lips of every citizen will inspire the many in the armed forces, in the Government, and in the industries engaged in this great effort.

This is America's answer to those who would destroy the freedom for which we stand. It will fix in the minds of our people not only the fine and brave ideal which is symbolized by planes in flight but will be a constant reminder of the teamwork under democratic methods whereby the American way will prevail over any destructive system.

As I see it, aviation has two jobs which must go forward together. The first is to win the battle of production—to build tens of thousands of planes and hundreds of air bases, to train pilots, and to organize an air power which no unfriendly nation will dare to attack.

The second is to promote civilian flying to the fullest extent that military needs for men and materials will permit. This is a great training and morale building activity for air preparedness.

After the emergency, when the facilities of wartime production can be turned to civilian uses, I believe that aviation will expand as rapidly as did the automobile industry after the last war, and will be a tremendous influence in maintaining a prosperous economy. Looking ahead to this development, it is of great importance that American communities continue with their air-progress programs which will build the airports, air services, schools, and local interest necessary to the foundation for post-war activities.

Therefore, I feel there cannot be a more forward-looking and patriotic motive for every American than—

"Keep 'Em Flying!"

Sincerely yours,

JENNINGS RANDOLPH,
Member of Congress.

Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM B. BARRY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 25, 1941

AN ANALYSIS WRITTEN BY WINSTON CHURCHILL

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, because of the changed position of the Communist Party both at home and abroad, and in order that we Americans may have a better understanding of what is happening, I am taking the liberty of calling my colleagues' attention to an analysis of communism written by the Honorable Winston Churchill. It can be found on page 168 of his book entitled "Great Contemporaries."

In my opinion every American should memorize his words and heed them.

But communism is not only a creed. It is a plan of campaign. A Communist is not only the holder of certain opinions; he is the pledged adept of a well-thought-out means of enforcing them. The anatomy of discontent and revolution has been studied in every phase and aspect, and a veritable drill book prepared in a scientific spirit for subverting all existing institutions. The method of enforcement is as much a part of the Communist faith as the doctrine itself. At first the time-honored principles of liberalism and democracy are invoked to shelter the infant organism. Free speech, the right of public meeting, every form of lawful political agitation and constitutional right are paraded and asserted. Alliance is sought with every popular movement toward the left.

The creation of a mild Liberal or Socialist regime in some period of convulsion is the first milestone. But no sooner has this been created than it is to be overthrown. Woes and scarcity resulting from confusion must be exploited. Collisions, if possible attended with bloodshed, are to be arranged between the agents of the new government and the working people. Martyrs are to be manufactured. An apologetic attitude in the rulers should be turned to profit. Pacific propaganda may be made the mask of hatreds never before manifested among men. No faith need be, indeed may be, kept with non-Communists. Every act of good will, of tolerance, of conciliation, of mercy, of magnanimity on the part of governments or statesmen is to be utilized for their ruin. Then when the time is ripe and the moment opportune, every form of lethal violence from mob revolt to private assassination must be used without stint or compunction. The citadel will be stormed under the banners of liberty and democracy, and once the apparatus of power is in the hands of the brotherhood, all opposition, all contrary opinions must be extinguished by death. Democracy is but a tool to be used and afterward broken; liberty but a sentimental folly unworthy of the logician. The absolute rule of a self-chosen priesthood according to the dogmas it has learnd by rote is to be imposed upon mankind without mitigation progressively forever. All this, set out in prosy textbooks, written also in blood in the history of several powerful nations, is the Communist's faith and purpose. To be forewarned should be to be forearmed.

Americanism and Defense

OF
HON. JOSEPH E. CASEY
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 25, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. THOMAS A. FLAHERTY, OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address recently delivered by my colleague from Massachusetts, Hon. THOMAS A. FLAHERTY:

In these times of national emergency Americanism has come to have a special meaning. When the world was at peace our Americanism consisted chiefly of talking about it and dedicating monuments to the patriots of the past. Nowadays we are backing our speeches and words with action, and the monuments we are producing are dedicated to the purpose of making this Nation impregnable to enemy attack now and in the future. These monuments are guns, ammunitions, planes; they are also national unity and a strong devotion to the principles of our Government.

Never in the history of our country have the times called for more concerted action and for closer unity. The production records of our defense industries indicate that we are getting action. As for unity, all that we have to do in order to convince ourselves that we are bound to achieve it as we never have before is to visit a national-defense factory. There we will see workers of all creeds and from all corners of the world producing, side by side, sharing the same tasks and the same conviction that the democratic way of life is the only way of life. That is a picture for the dictators to look at—those distorted minds who would have the world believe that this is a world that can only be operated by persons who belong to their particular creed and race. In the United States, we not only dismiss that kind of thinking as sheer nonsense but we also go ahead and prove by our day-by-day actions that here men and women from many countries and of different creeds can work and live together and guide the destiny of this Nation. It is a destiny that we are all proud of. We have fought for it once and we shall always defend it, for it is based on a notion that we have come to regard as one of civilization's main tenets—and that is that human beings are perfectly capable of self-government, regardless of race, creed, or nationality, so long as they can believe in the principles by which they live. Those principles are based on the freedoms guaranteed to us by our Constitution.

Our current peacetime Army, consisting of boys of many different nationality origins and religions, is a striking example of our talent for national unity. There never has been any question about the abilities of our selective-service soldiers to mold themselves into a powerful and well-coordinated army, regardless of their varied backgrounds.

About a month ago we celebrated I Am An American Day, a national holiday dedicated to American citizenship. It was a tremendous demonstration of national unity in which millions of Americans, new and old, participated gladly and freely. In some European countries such an occasion would have necessitated giving orders and commanding citizens to assemble and listen to self-appointed rulers. Here there was no coercion and not the slightest regimentation. No one gave orders. Our American citizens assembled and pledged allegiance to our Government because they wanted to and because they believed implicitly in what our Government stands for. Such spontaneity and patriotism can only be found in a land like ours where freedom is the watchword, and where we judge men by their loyalty and deeds rather than by their religion or origin.

From the start, our Nation has welcomed those who came here from other parts of the world. During the first part of the century they came in great numbers. They came looking for freedom and security. They were daring people, for they were leaving their native land, which is always dear to the individual, and striking out for a new land where they knew they could have economic and spiritual freedom. Like our early pioneers, they had the pioneering instinct that has kept our democracy alive and ready to face any new task with the virility and strength that characterize us as a nation. In some respects, the most recent of our Americans have an advantage over old-stock Americans. For one thing, most of them come from a far older civilization and many of them are able to make cultural contributions which we could never acquire otherwise; for another, they came here imbued with the same marvelous vitality that our pioneer fathers had. Challenged by a new country, a new set of customs, and often a new language, they could not and did not rest on their past achievements. It is not surprising that in transplanting their roots to this new land those roots have prospered and blossomed into, sturdy trees that have borne valuable produce.

There have been a number of definitions of Americanism but, because it means many things to many people, no single definition has been widely accepted. I should like to point out, however, that the only definitions of Americanism that make sense must include an appreciation of the varied make-up of our population. Nowhere else in the world has a more exciting mixture of peoples gathered from all corners of the earth. Thirty-eight million immigrants have come to the United States in the past 100 years. Over 30 percent of our total population is made up of immigrants and children of immigrants, all of whom have contributed to the development and progress of our country.

Americanism is not the possession of any particular race or group. It belongs to all of us, regardless of where we came from. Our immigrant population and their children have as much pride in saying, "I am an American" as those of us whose roots extend deeper in American soil. In the last analysis we are, as has often been said, all immigrants or descendants of immigrants, all Americans. It is interesting to note that even that section of our population which we usually designate as alien is not very alien. A recent sampling of the registration forms compiled in the registration by the Department of Justice last year revealed that 40 percent of those noncitizens who registered had already taken steps to become American citizens. The registration also showed that we now have the smallest percentage of noncitizens we have ever had. They number less than 5,000,000 and represent only 3½ percent of our total population.

All these facts add up to stronger national unity and more powerful American defenses, for regardless of how much we can increase the production of arms and munitions, our chief strength lies in our singleness of purpose. We shall become even stronger as we learn to guard against racial and religious prejudices. Those are the propaganda poisons that have infected some of the European nations and produced internal dissension and havoc. Those poisons are the weapons of the dictators who would weaken our national morale by introducing hysteria and suspicion of our neighbors. We know that strategy too well by this time. We have seen the Nazis conquering nation after nation by the expedient of dividing a nation into various factions and then setting those factions against each other. We can battle that divide-and-conquer strategy in this country because we all firmly believe in the democratic principles of our Constitution and will not be divided.

Complete faith in our Bill of Rights gives us a weapon far superior to anything the dictators can produce. That is a weapon, forged through the centuries by all civilized men, which those self-styled supermen fear for they know its power and its ability to draw the people of a democracy together and cause them to defend their democratic principles, as a mother would defend her young.

Let us not lose sight of those principles, even though the heat of the battle may become more intense. Let us keep our heads and refuse to be swayed by those who would try to break up our unity by spreading racial and religious prejudice. Our task is to build and move forward to even a greater democracy than we have enjoyed, and we can do that if we maintain a constructive attitude toward all our fellow Americans.

Production of Aluminum for National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. RICH

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 25, 1941

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following regarding a statement made by me on the floor of the House of Representatives on May 28, 1941, to the effect that the Reynolds Metals Co. is a corporation which was set up by a gentleman in the Attorney General's Office, which was prosecuting the Aluminum Co. of America. By that I meant the Government was setting up a new industry to compete with private enterprise through the Reynolds Metals Co.

In this connection I will state that I would not take the space in the RECORD to elaborate on this statement in full if it were not for the fact that I received a letter from Walter L. Rice, vice president of the Reynolds Metals Co., who was the lawyer I referred to because of the fact that he was chief counsel for the Government under the Attorney General's Office, who was prosecuting the Aluminum Co. of America. I do not want to injure Mr. Rice, the Reynolds Metals Co., nor any other person. As I understand it, before the suit was settled in full and the verdict rendered by the court, he was offered a position and placed as vice president of the Reynolds Metals Co. With the experience and knowledge gained by him in this suit he will now compete with the Aluminum Co. of America in the manufacture of aluminum, using the knowledge he gained at the expense of the Government certainly to the advantage of the Reynolds Metals Co. and especially since most of the money that has been acquired for the use of the Reynolds Metals Co. has been secured by the R. F. C., as per a letter of June 19, 1941, which I received from Jesse H. Jones, giving the amount of money borrowed from the R. F. C. as $23,000,000, and that authorized by Defense Plant Corporation as $12,721,791.50, making a total of $35,721,791.50 that the Reynolds Metals Co. received for the manufacture of aluminum by moneys loaned to them from Government agencies.

Wishing to be fair in this matter, I would not submit this correspondence if it were not for the fact that in the last paragraph of Mr. Rice's letter to me he states as follows:

> I recognize that Congressmen enjoy a constitutional privilege with respect to all statements made on the floor, no matter how erroneous, and that they cannot be held accountable for such statements.

Certainly I had no idea of trying to do anything detrimental to the gentleman,

Mr. Rice, or to the Reynolds Metals Co., but since the facts must be known I publish this correspondence. At the same time, in order to give the public the benefit of the statements that were made by the Aluminum Co. of America, in reference to its aid and assistance to the defense program, I publish the statement made by its vice president, Mr. I. W. Wilson, in charge of operation of the Aluminum Co. of America, before the Senate committee investigating the national-defense program, wherein it was criticized very much by Secretary Ickes, the chief spokesman for this administration, and I believe it was criticized unduly and unjustly. Now, I have no briefs, nor am I interested in any sense in the Aluminum Co. of America, nor with the Reynolds Metals Co., or anyone connected therewith. So the general public can judge for themselves by reading this correspondence whether the Government is justified in setting up new corporations with Government money to compete with the people who are in private enterprise.

I say again, and I have said it time after time, that this administration is doing everything it possibly can to destroy private capital, to set the Government up in business in competition with private enterprise in one way or another, until eventually you will find that we are fast becoming a communistic Nation. This I am doing everything I can to oppose, and will to the end.

I herewith submit to you, first, the letter I received from Mr. Walter L. Rice, vice president of the Reynolds Metals Co.; second, the letter from Jesse H. Jones, of the Federal Works Agency, Washington, D. C., with the statement of moneys loaned to Reynolds Metals Co.; and third, the statement made by I. W. Wilson, vice president of the Aluminum Co. of America. I am responsible for inserting this and was not requested to place it in the RECORD, but do so on my own initiative with the idea of trying to keep the Government out of business.

The letters and statement follow:

REYNOLDS METALS CO., INC.,
Richmond, Va., June 6, 1941.

HON. ROBERT F. RICH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN RICH: I have read the statement which you made on the floor of the House of Representatives on May 28, 1941, to the effect that the Reynolds Metals Co. is a corporation which "was set up by a gentleman in the Attorney General's office who was prosecuting the Aluminum Co. of America." Inasmuch as I was chief counsel for the Government in its prosecution of the aluminum monopoly suit, I assume that your statement had reference to me.

Your statement is a clear reflection upon the Department of Justice, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and the Reynolds Metals Co., and, therefore, I am sure that you will want to make an official correction as soon as the true facts are called to your attention.

The Reynolds Metals Co. is a well-established company which was set up not by me, but by Mr. R. S. Reynolds, a courageous and enterprising man, whom I regard as one of the great industrial geniuses of our day. Mr. Reynolds organized the company in the early 1920's, and by 1940 it had grown into a wide-spread manufacturing enterprise with assets conservatively valued at more than $28,000,000. Recognizing the need for a second domestic source of aluminum for the manufacture of airplanes and munitions, it had the courage to pledge all of these assets, including 18 manufacturing plants, to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in return for a loan of $15,800,000, later increased to $20,000,000. The loan was secured not only by the existing assets, but also by the future assets, including all of the new aluminum plants to be built with the proceeds of the loan.

Since you have stated that I went to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to get "twenty or thirty million dollars" for the Reynolds Metals Co., permit me to demonstrate how ridiculous and impossible this statement is. When the Reynolds Metals Co. applied for the R. F. C. loan, I was in New York City devoting all of my time to the trial of the Government's antitrust suit against the Aluminum Co. of America. I did not even know about the application for the loan until after the R. F. C. had tentatively approved the loan in July 1940. The first time I heard of the loan was about the time when the Aluminum Co. of America's counsel brought up the matter in open court some time in the first part of August 1940. I did not even meet Mr. Reynolds, Mr. Jesse Jones, Federal Loan Administrator, or Mr. Emil Schram, Chairman of the R. F. C., until after the loan had been approved.

In the face of these facts, it is amazing to read a public statement to the effect that the Government prosecutor "got so much information from them (the Aluminum Co. of America) that he thought it would be a fine thing to start a small company, set up an organization to compete with the Aluminum Co. of America." If the Aluminum Co. of America is seeking to create this impression, either through you or through newspaper commentators who are willing to lend their offices to a fight for monopoly, I assure you that it has not the slightest foundation in fact.

If the Government's prosecution of the aluminum monopoly was to any degree responsible for encouraging competition in this industry, that would seem to be highly commendable and in strict harmony with the objectives of the Sherman Antitrust Act. As shown by the record in the pending antitrust suit, the Aluminum Co. of America has been the sole domestic producer of virgin aluminum in the United States since 1893, and I would think that a member of Congress would welcome competition in this vital industry, particularly when a tremendous expansion of the productive capacity is absolutely essential for our national defense.

On May 15, 1941, Mr. REYNOLDS told me that he wanted my services as vice president and general counsel in his rapidly expanding organization. Inasmuch as I had finished the trial of the Aluminum case and had just recently been assigned to a new case by the Department of Justice, I was free to accept the offer promptly, subject to the approval of Attorney General Robert H. Jackson and Assistant Attorney General Thurman Arnold.

I submit these facts to you in all friendliness, confident that you will be fair enough to correct the erroneous statements and unfortunate characterizations which are contained in your speech on the floor of the House. I recognize that Congressmen enjoy a constitutional privilege with respect to all statements made on the floor, no matter how erroneous, and that they cannot be held accountable for such statements; but I am confident that you would not knowingly abuse this privilege, and that you will cheerfully correct the statements that you have made.

Very truly yours,

WALTER L. RICE,
Vice President.

FEDERAL LOAN AGENCY,
Washington, June 19, 1941.

HON. ROBERT F. RICH,
Congress of the United States,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN RICH: In reply to your letter of June 11, I am attaching a list of loans and commitments authorized by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and by Defense Plant Corporation to Reynolds Metals Co. and its subsidiary, Reynolds Alloys Co. These authorizations were all made to aid in the national-defense program.

No loans have been approved to the subsidiaries listed in your letter, with the exception of a loan of $200,000 authorized on December 14, 1934, to Richmond Radiator Co., prior to the time when Reynolds Metals Co. acquired control of this concern. This loan was subsequently canceled in full.

Sincerely yours,

JESSE H. JONES.

STATEMENT OF I. W. WILSON, VICE PRESIDENT IN CHARGE OF OPERATIONS, ALUMINUM CO. OF AMERICA, BEFORE THE SENATE COMMITTEE INVESTIGATING THE NATIONAL-DEFENSE PROGRAM

At the hearing Monday, Secretary Ickes made statements challenging the good faith of the Aluminum Co. of America in its efforts to aid in this country's defense program. We welcome the opportunity to refute these accusations and we believe that when the facts are known no fair-minded person can fail to agree that the Aluminum Co. has done everything within its power, and more, probably than any other corporation in the United States, to uphold the President and the Congress in building up our defenses.

We first want to tell this committee some of the details of what this company has done, and is doing, to increase its production of aluminum.

In 1938, when our plants produced 286,881,690 pounds of aluminum, and our total shipments were only 175,525,773 pounds, the Aluminum Co. of America finished the year with an inventory of 277,538,066 pounds of aluminum, or more aluminum than normally would be used in a year.

As late as April 3, 1939, Congress had only authorized the Navy to build 3,000 planes, and the Army 6,000. Such a program required no expansion of production facilities, particularly when the Aluminum Co. of America already had more than a year's supply of metal on hand. Yet late in 1938, the company did inaugurate a program which, with the additions since made to it, calls for a capital expenditure of over $200,000,000 of the company's money, and which has resulted in an increase in the number of its employees from 25,000 to about 50,000.

The Aluminum Co. of America is now producing well over double the amount of aluminum produced in 1938 and when its present program is completed the production of 1938 will be almost tripled. The expansion of the production of aluminum is not as simple a matter as is the expansion of many other industries. As this committee is well aware, the production of aluminum requires enormous quantities of electric power. It takes not only large sums of money, but many years to build the extensive hydroelectric developments necessary to get blocks of power in the magnitude required. An aluminum plant without electric power is useless.

In addition to the acquisition of the needed power, this increase in the production of aluminum has already required the doubling of the production of alumina, the tripling of the steamship tonnage used to bring bauxite from South America to this country, and the doubling of the production of bauxite as well. A further expansion of all these facilities is a necessary part of the existing program.

This expansion included large additional facilities for manufacturing fabricated forms. Within a few months the company's capacity to produce strong alloy sheet and extruded shapes will be 6 times that of the beginning of 1938, while our ability to produce aluminum forgings will be 16 times that of the beginning of 1938. All of these products are of vital interest to the aircraft industry.

An inquiry has been made concerning the Aluminum Co.'s attitude with respect to the Fontana power project which will require 3 years to complete. Some months ago a declaration of intention was filed with the Federal Power Commission for this project in the belief that the Commission would not require a Federal license. Such a license permits the Government to take over the project at the end of the license period on terms that might be confiscatory. The Commission, however, made a ruling that would necessitate taking out such a license. The company felt then, and still feels, that in the light of its other huge expenditures for the defense program, it cannot, with proper regard for its financial stability, put up its own money to develop this project in the face of the Government's power to take over the property at the end of the license period. Notwithstanding this feeling, the Aluminum Co. has informed O. P. M., and also T. V. A., that it stands ready to take out a license and develop this project if the Government will assist in financing the development; or, the company will sell the project to T. V. A. so that Authority may develop it; or if neither of these alternates is acceptable, the company is ready to cooperate in any other way that will make the power from this development available for the production of aluminum. The company now reiterates that position. This matter is, and for some time past has been, under consideration by Government agencies and the Aluminum Co. is ready to proceed in any manner that they may determine.

We have been criticized on the theory that estimates by various governmental agencies were in some way mistakes attributable to the Aluminum Co. of America. This we emphatically deny.

Many of the things that have been said before this committee concerning aluminum seem to be based on the assumption that it is the function of a private industrial corporation, in this case the Aluminum Co. of America, to estimate not only what it will produce to meet the defense needs of the United States, but also, to set itself up as an authority for what those needs are. Under this assumption we should not only have been able to tell how much aluminum will be required, for instance, to build the number of airplanes needed to defend the democracies, but to forecast how many of these planes will be needed.

We have not presumed to tell Congress, the Army, or the Navy how many planes are needed for defense. Our function as to forecasts is, and can only be, to tell what we will produce and how far we can expand under the instructions and requests of the Government and then to produce such aluminum. There has never been a single month when we have not exceeded the amounts of such forecasts.

We understand that the present estimates of O. P. M. call for the production in this country of at least 1,400,000,000 pounds of aluminum per year. Last October, the Defense Commission advised the company that it should increase its production by an additional 100,000,000 pounds per year, or thus to a total of 850,000,000 pounds per year. The company thereupon submitted to the Defense Commission a program of further expansion which would have increased production by more than 100,000,000 pounds per year within a period of from 6 to 8 months. Since then, O. P. M. has been advised by the company, again and again, that if O. P. M. would procure the necessary electrical power, the company would increase production by such further amounts as the Government wishes. But it has not yet, to this very hour, been possible to determine at what place or in what amounts electrical power will be made available, and, until this is known, the company cannot proceed with the construction of the necessary plants in which to produce the additional aluminum desired by the Government.

Mr. Ickes stated Monday to this committee: "I have a profound conviction that the Aluminum Co. of America would prevent the necessary expansion of our aluminum manufacturing facilities, regardless of the consequences to the country or the world, in order to get them all within its own domination and control." He further stated, referring to the Aluminum Co. of America, "It did its damnedest to prevent us from making this contract for power with the Reynolds Metals Co."

We want to state, without reservation, that the Aluminum Co. has no desire to prevent the necessary expansion of the aluminum manufacturing facilities in this country, or to get them all within its domination and control. We are interested in but one thing, that there be sufficient aluminum produced to meet the defense needs of our country. Furthermore, the Aluminum Co. has never in any way done anything to make it difficult for the Reynolds Metals Co., or anyone else, to go into the aluminum business, and has never endeavored to prevent the Reynolds Metals Co. from obtaining power.

The company has no desire to use the present emergency for the purpose of increasing its own position in the industry. This is shown by the fact that the company has repeatedly offered to put all of its technical resources at the Government's command, to design and build plants for Government operation, if it so desires, and to furnish the technical staff to make this possible or, if the Government prefers, to operate for the Government under a management arrangement. The company has also offered to use its own resources, as far as they will go, in financing any expansion program adopted by the Government, in addition to the $200,000,000 it has already used for expansion. No company could offer to do more.

Monday, Secretary Ickes referred to a request of February 4 from O. P. M. for an additional 65,000 kilowatts of Bonneville power, and explained why he would not allot it to the Aluminum Co. He also said that later he was again asked to allot 65,000 kilowatts of additional power to the Aluminum Co. and gave another explanation as to why he would not do that. Secretary Ickes failed to point out and perhaps he did not know that the Aluminum Co. has continuously, over the last 6 months or more, told the governmental agencies that it would make all the aluminum for which power could be obtained.

In the face of that record; in the face of the fact that the Aluminum Co. has already doubled and will shortly triple its 1938 output; and in the face of the further fact that the Aluminum Co. is spending over $200,000,000 of its own money to advance defense; it is hard to understand how Secretary Ickes could state to this committee Monday that, "When the story of this war comes to be written, it may have to be written that it was lost because of the recalcitrance of the Aluminum Co. of America."

Secretary Ickes may know how wars are lost, but you gentlemen know that wars are won by using as quickly as possible every available resource for the production of war materials.

Allegations have been made that the Aluminum Co. of America is a monopoly and is a party to agreements with various foreign companies, or foreign agencies, under which it is claimed production of aluminum has been restricted in this country. These and other similar questions are now pending in the courts against the company and its officers. In view of the fact that these suits are still unadjudicated, we feel constrained to remain silent in the face of these charges, believing it to be improper to discuss, or make any representations, publicly regarding matters which are still pending before the courts for decision. Suffice it to say that all of the principal officers of the company have vigorously denied that any such agreements exist, and they likewise have denied such charges are justified. I can assure you that it is no easy matter to be compelled to keep quiet in the face of charges that we regard as unfounded, but the proprieties of the situation have unfortunately made this necessary.

The Aluminum Co. of America was the first company in the world ever to produce aluminum at a price which brought it into commercial use. It pioneered the industry. It is still the foremost company in the aluminum industry, in spite of the fact that it has had the most severe competition from foreign companies, at least one of which is government owned.

The Aluminum Co. of America has given the United States leadership in this industry, both from the standpoint of knowledge and technique, as well as quality of product. Until Germany came into the fruition of its enormous armament program in 1939, the productive capacity in the United States was the greatest of any country in the world. In pioneering this industry, the principal job of the Aluminum Co. of America has been to find new uses for the metal. The problem of the company, therefore, has heretofore been not the production of aluminum, but the finding of people who would buy the metal and use it.

Let me assure you gentlemen that the sole desire of the Aluminum Co. of America is to be allowed to use its every resource in the production of aluminum for the defense of the country. We urge that we be allowed to do so.

The Arkansas Valley Authority Is Inevitable if Our Floods Are To Be Controlled in Southwest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE T. ELLIS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 20, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE SOUTHWEST AMERICAN

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, either there will be an Arkansas Valley Authority or there will be major floods on the Arkansas, Red, White, and St. Francis Rivers.

Herewith I insert an editorial appearing recently in the Southwest American, Fort Smith, Ark.:

[From the Southwest American, Fort Smith, Ark., of June 7, 1941]

CONTROLLING FLOODS

How floods are controlled by combination power- and flood-control dams was illustrated this week at Grand River Dam in northeast Oklahoma.

Heavy rainfall sent a 12-foot rise down the Grand River from the upper branches.

Engineers at Grand River Dam opened the spillway gates ahead of the floodwater and reduced the level of the lake by 2 feet, in order to make room for the floodwaters when they arrived. The water let out of the dam moved down the lower stream well within the banks. The floodwaters which moved into the lake restored it to its original level.

Such a reservoir permits holding floods and the orderly discharge of their waters in such quantities that the lower stream can move them within its banks. Without such a dam, the 12-foot rise would come downstream all at once.

That sort of arrangement can be worked and is worked wherever flood-control dams are installed. It can be worked just as well with dual-purpose dams, for flood control and power production, wherever the capacity of the reservoir is sufficient to provide power and leave storage capacity above the minimum power pool level for floodwaters.

That kind of flood control, coupled with use of the energy of falling water for power production, is the purpose of the proposed Arkansas Valley Authority proposal, now pending in Congress.

The Grand River Dam is owned and operated by the Grand River Dam Authority, a creation of the State of Oklahoma. Its primary function is power. Flood control and aid to navigation are secondary.

The majority of the flood control and power dams now building in the Southwest are constructed by the Federal Government, through the United States engineers. Several are owned by private power interests.

The purpose of the Arkansas Valley Authority proposal is to create a single Federal authority with the legal power and the finance to build needed works, and to operate them as a whole so they may best accomplish the triple purpose of flood control, power production, and aid to navigation.

Letter to the President Urging That the United States Should Not Enter the European War

HON. BEN F. JENSEN

OF IOWA

LETTER FROM FRED A. HULSEBUS, HARLAN, IOWA

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I wish to include a letter written by Mr. Fred A. Hulsebus, of Harlan, Iowa, to the President of the United States, dated May 10, 1941. Mr. Hulsebus tells me that he had a great number of his friends pass on this letter, who insisted that he send it to the President before he did so. Having been personally acquainted with Mr. Hulsebus for a number of years, I know the desire which prompted him to write this letter was motivated by his deep concern for the best welfare of his country in these distressing times. The letter follows:

MAY 10, 1941.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In these troublous times when most of the world is full of hate, fear, jealousy, malice, and greed, I know that you are carrying a tremendous load and responsibility and that you are bothered by all kinds of people and flooded with thousands of letters, all telling you what to do and what not to do.

I have often wondered how anyone in the highly charged atmosphere of words, writings, and propaganda of Washington could do any thinking at all, not alone think clearly.

Instead of writing this letter I wish that I could have a talk with you here, right now; here where we could put our feet upon the ground, look about, and see all of the wonders of God and nature at their best; here where we could be free from reporters, politicians, or anyone if we wished. I am sure that after a short acquaintanceship and a talk we would both have a different slant on some things than we have now, and that we would agree on most things.

It is generally easier to judge a letter if you are acquainted with the writer and his background. Therefore, I shall introduce myself the best I can. I was born in Illinois and, with my parents, moved to a farm located in this county in the year 1886. I was reared on the farm, and have spent the past 40 years in the telephone, hardware, and automobile business in this county.

My father was born in Germany, but his ancestry goes back to Holland. My mother was born in the United States, but her parents came from Switzerland.

I am about your size and age, and almost everyone tells me that I look like you. I am mechanically inclined, and take a great interest in public and political affairs. I am a Republican, but I agree with you on much of your domestic policy, but cannot agree with you on much of the foreign policy.

Every citizen must admit that the President of the United States has information that everyone does not get. We, as private citizens, get our information from history, friends, papers, radio, and many sources, and much of it is propaganda.

As I see it, to analyze, think, and judge clearly on this war, our interest in it, and the future, we must know about the events before, during, and after the World War. From a study of those events, the money system, and history, I have come to the conclusion that it is not only best for us but for the world in the end if we stay out of this war as a combatant.

In my opinion, the greatest troublemakers in the world in my time have been the money system, trade barriers, and unfair peace treaties; and the greatest troublemakers in our own United States have been our money system and group legislation. They usually work to the advantage of the "haves" and to the disadvantage of the "have nots."

I am glad that during your administration there has been some reform legislation along this line. We need much more, such as no tax-free bonds, etc., but what we need now most of all is to keep out of war. We have nothing to gain by going to war for ourselves or for the people of the world in the end, but we do have much to lose.

Our people are much divided on the question of going to war, but they are almost 100 percent united on the building of proper defense and defending our own country.

During the World War we went across to defend democracy. Today, almost everyone will admit that we came back with less democracy.

Mr. President, in the position you are in, the head of the greatest nation on earth, and the condition this world is in, with your position, influence, and great statesmanship, you can do a thousand times more good by keeping us out of this war than all of the military men and others can by pushing us in.

Most all military men and many others believe there are but two motives that move men and women to action, and these two motives are fear and self-interest. They overlook the greatest moving power of all, the power of love; love for family, love for home, love for country, love for ideals and principles. That is why Napoleon met his Waterloo; he overlooked the greatest moving power of all. That is why Hitler, Mussolini, Churchill, and Stalin will all lose in the end; they haven't a spark of love or humanity in their souls.

If you choose the course to keep us out of war, you are in the greatest position in the world to spread good will, love, and democracy.

If I were in your position, I would send supersalesman to every country that I could to create good will. I would let the world know that we were going to take more interest in a secretary of peace than a secretary of war.

Most of the people who have studied the peace terms and the events which followed the World War will agree now that hatred, fear, and self-interest, and lack of foresight is largely the cause of this war and that we, ourselves, are not free from guilt.

We call this Nation a Christian nation, but we, with others, let thousands of persons go hungry and starve to death, and we had more than we could use.

I know, because my daughter did social-service work in France. She was a delegate also in a movement for "no more wars," which was sponsored by the young people of France, Germany, Italy, Switzerland, and other countries. This gave her the opportunity to spend some time in these countries and England also.

Mr. President, you are not to blame, but I would say we, as a democratic Nation, "missed the bus."

At this peace conference, some things were done, not intentionally, however, to help Germany build up an up-to-date fighting machine and people. She was forbidden to build large fighting ships, and so she concentrated on small, fast ships, which she found to be an advantage, because speed and numbers are what count most now. She was not allowed to make planes, and so she made gliders. The result is that thousands of boys and men and women can fly.

In my opinion, the bottleneck in the British fighting machine isn't lack of planes; but it is the lack of enough fighting fliers. Only a small percentage of the boys who pass for flying will make good fighting fliers. They must have a good physique, must have nerve, mechanical ability, lightning coordination, and excellent judgment. It takes time to make such a man, and I believe it takes three for each plane.

Germany did not have much after the war—no money, food. She had a wrecked nation and a wrecked government and much unemployment. Lack of money brought on bartering and bartering increased reaching out for trade. The unemployed were put to work on roads. Knickerbocker says they have the finest road system in the world. Good roads are the builders of progress, and a great arm for national defense, and last, but not least, work developed and united the people of Germany.

It is my honest opinion that if we get into the fighting of this war millions more will be injured, killed, and made to suffer, and if we must fight in all parts of the world we may lose and Stalin may win.

As a private citizen I ask you, Mr. President, to think back to your election campaign when you were meeting thousands of people from all parts of the United States, when you had a cross section of the people's thoughts from all parts, then when you made your promises to the voters. You were elected by the majority of these people. Today, you are the leader of these same people, and, naturally, as our servant we expect your first interest to lie with us. We realize that conditions have changed somewhat. We also know that there are influential and powerful groups that have selfish motives in mind. They care not a whit about the burdens, suffering, nor the future of our own people and country. They are thinking only of their interests.

In conclusion, what is to follow is hard for me to say to you, Mr. President. But what I am saying in this letter has been milling around in my mind for a long time, and I must say what my conscience dictates.

I feel that if you will make a statement as soon as possible to the people of the United States and the world, telling them that as the servant of the people of the United States you are under obligation to your people first of all but you cannot help but be interested in the welfare of humanity in all parts of the world and the future destiny of the people and nations. "It isn't the desire of my people to enter this conflict; therefore, as their leader and servant, I deem it my sacred duty to avoid conflict if possible. I also deem it my duty, as President of the United States, to do all I can to stop this horrible war. It is my belief that all of the nations would be willing to settle things at a conference table at this time if they could trust the men at the conference. To show my sincerity and willingness to help end this conflict and get a just peace, I am offering Herbert Hoover, a man whom you all know, to represent me and the people of the United States. We sincerely hope that every country will cooperate in ending this conflict."

I know that you are big enough to place the welfare of humanity and peace above everything else.

If this will accomplish what I hope it will, millions of people in this country and throughout the world will praise you and you will go down in history as one of the greatest men.

Sincerely yours,

FRED A. HULSEBUS.

American Citizens of Polish Extraction Pledging Support in Present Emergency

OF

HON. ALFRED F. BEITER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 25, 1941

RESOLUTION ADOPTED AT ANNUAL PILGRIMAGE ON JUNE 15, 1941

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a resolution adopted by a group of American citizens of Polish extraction on June 15, 1941, at the annual pilgrimage to Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario, Canada, to pay homage to the soldier dead who are buried at the St. Vincent de Paul Cemetery:

We, the citizens of the United States and Canada of Polish extraction, and citizens of Poland, having gathered this 15th day of June 1941 at the annual pilgrimage to Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario, Canada, to pay homage to the soldier dead who lie under the sod at the St. Vincent de Paul Cemetery, hereby express our deep loyalty to our respective Governments, and, bearing in mind that Poland, the land of our forefathers, which was only recently redeemed by the sacrifices of her brave sons, and having again been invaded by her totalitarian neighbors of Nazi Germany and Soviet Russia, we hereby adopt the following resolutions:

Whereas the soldiers who rest in this St. Vincent de Paul Cemetery at Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario, Canada, and the soldiers who rest on the fields of France and Poland, having died and given their lives in the service and on the battlefields, and for the independence and freedom of Poland and in the defense of democracy at the side of the United States, Great Britain, and their allies; and

Whereas in the year 1917 the Polish Army was organized and trained at Camp Kosciuszko, Niagara-on-the-Lake, Canada, and once again in these grave times of world history a Polish Army consisting of volunteers is being organized at Owen Sound, Ontario, Canada; and

Whereas Great Britain, Poland, and their allies constitute the first line of defense in the preservation of Christian and democratic ideals; and

Whereas the duly constituted governments of the world, based on democratic principles and ideals, are being threatened and in certain instances have already been superseded by nazi-ism and communism, and as a result of which chaos and desperation permeates all the subjugated nations: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That to the soldiers who are buried at the St. Vincent dePaul Cemetery at Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario, Canada; to the soldiers that died on the fields of battle in the first World War in France and in Poland; and to the soldiers who died heroically in Poland, Norway, Greece and Africa, and other lands, both on land and sea in the defense of Poland in the present World War, we hereby express our deep gratitude for their heroic efforts in the defense of freedom, justice, culture, and religious freedom, and in the preservation of civilization and in the preservation of governments based on the fundamental laws of God and democratic ideals; and be it further

Resolved, That to Poland, the land of our forbears, which through the ages remained and today remains the bulwark of Christianity; to Poland, which gave to the world numerous heroes and military geniuses, men of knowledge, arts, and science, we hereby express our undying hope for an early victory and the regaining of Poland's independence. In this regard we hereby appeal to all the citizens of the United States of Polish extraction for moral and financial aid, and to the citizens of Canada of Polish origin we hereby appeal that every effort be expended to enlarge the new Polish Army now being formed in Canada, and we hereby appeal to all peoples to give every financial aid possible until it hurts to the poor unfortunate victims of this war in Poland and other lands where these unfortunate human beings took refuge, and who are presently threatened with extermination and certain death.

Resolved, That to the civil and military authorities of the Dominion of Canada we hereby express our sincere gratitude and appreciation for their untiring efforts in permitting the organization of the Polish Army in the first World War and in this present war, and we express the hope and confidence that the new Polish Army formed at Owen Sound, Ontario, Canada, will become a mighty power under the command of General Sikorski in England. In commemoration of the brave heroes of Canada and Poland who gave their lives fighting together for freedom and liberty of Canada and Poland, we hereby place a wreath to their sacred memory at the Soldiers' Monument at Niagara-on-the-Lake; be it further

Resolved, That to the President of the United States, Franklin D. Roosevelt, we express our deep gratitude for the far-reaching necessary steps he has taken in the defense of the United States; in sponsoring the lend-lease bill; in declaring a state of emergency; in taking proper action in curtailing subversive elements among labor. To the King of England, George VI, and his able Prime Minister, Winston Churchill, the civil and military authorities of Canada and Poland and their allies, we extend a message of admiration and our sincere hope and confidence in final victory for Great Britain, Poland, and other countries fighting side by side with Great Britain, based on God's law and democratic principles and ideals.

Resolved, That we hereby fervently appeal to all citizens of the United States and the Dominion of Canada, regardless of race, color, or creed, for extreme loyalty to their respective Governments. May the one-hundred-and-odd years of continued peace and friendship between the United States and Canada continue to be an inspiration and beacon light of peace and friendship among nations, based on love and the spirit of good neighbors.

We hereby unqualifiedly denounce any and all subversive activities in any shape or form in the United States and Canada, and we fervently urge all the citizenry of both countries to mutually cooperate with their authorities for the better defense of our respective Governments and for the better securing of our liberties by buying defense bonds, and, if need be, to give our lives in the service of God and country.

Long live the United States.
Long live the Dominion of Canada.
Long live freedom.

Los Angeles Nazis Prepare for Lindbergh Rally

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 25, 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE NEWS RESEARCH SERVICE, INC.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks and to include therein two articles, I am inserting an article from the news letter published by the News Research Service, Inc., which gives very important facts and information which I feel will prove of interest to the membership and to the country. The article is as follows:

A new political party is about to emerge on the American scene. Its spokesmen will include appeasers, Fascists, Communists, Nazis, pacifists, so-called isolationists, Coughlinites, and professional patrioteers. Membership will consist of all elements bearing the same labels. Prominent speakers are now touring the country, addressing mass rallies, conditioning the public mind to follow the soon-to-be-unfurled party banner. As yet, no official anncuncement of plans has been made, but message bearers have been instructed to allude cautiously to the advent of this organization, and to report—to the powers behind the scenes—the mass reactions to these subtle hints.

Ex-Col. Charles A. Lindbergh, leading the vanguard of speakers, is scheduled to speak on June 20 at a mass meeting at the Hollywood Bowl in Los Angeles. His appearance will put the finishing touches to the conditioning process of Angelenos, subversive and otherwise. The following exposé concerns itself, mainly, with Los Angeles, but N. R. S. correspondents report that similar activities prevail everywhere in the land. Lack of space, however, prevents the presentation of details. All indicate how the public mind is to be prepared for acceptance of the new appeasement party.

THE LONE EAGLE SWOOPS TO CONQUER

Two days after President Roosevelt declared a national emergency, Lindbergh addressed a mass meeting in the Philadelphia Arena. More than 16,000 persons, inside the hall and out, booed and hissed the name of the President. Adolf Hitler's name was cheered by this vast throng, which fanatically declared itself against any aid to Great Britain, any preparations that will lead us into war—even a defensive war.

Present at this meeting, among others, were Heinrich Schafhausen, German Vice Consul; Peter Kreckmann, manager of the North German Lloyd offices; Rev. Sigmund von Bosse, one-time president of the German-American National Alliance (which N. R. S. exposed in No. 133); Capt. William Schmidt, of the Philadelphia German Societies; Dr. Bessie Burchett, a school teacher recently expelled when she displayed anti-Rocsevelt and pro-Nazi placards in her classroom; Kurt Geppert, president of the Rundfunk Klub (German Radio Club); Thomas A. Blissard, chairman of the Committee for the Preservation of Constitutional Rights, the Coughlinite organization of this city; and representatives of various mothers' groups.

Climax of the evening was Lindbergh's question, slyly put: "Is it not time for us to turn to new policies and a new leadership?" Nazi heilers and their fellow travelers shouted their enthusiastic "Ja." His call for new leadership reverberated all over the Nation. America First speakers everywhere repeated it, and many commentators referred to it, including Westbrook Pegler, who said:

"I want to know just how Lindbergh will turn the trick (of a new leadership) without resorting to the method used in all European countries which changed leaders to avoid trouble and found themselves on leash to Hitler."

The Philadelphia Record saw the significance in the flyer's statement and treated it appropriately in a featured cartoon.

When put on the spot as to what he meant, Lindbergh tried to crawl out from the dead give-away of his own words, by saying:

"Neither I nor anyone else on the America First Committee advocates proceeding by anything but constitutional methods. It is our opposition which endangers the American Constitution when it objects to our freedom of speech and expression."

On June 10, Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen, writing in Washington Merry-Go-Round, pointed out that some America First generalissimos are trying to get rid of pro-Nazi elements in the organization. At the recent Lindbergh meeting in Madison Square Garden John T. Flynn, of the New York branch of America First, took the platform, denounced the presence of Joe McWilliams and other Fascists, and asked them to leave. Flynn and his supporters have been unable to get any help from America First platform stars and little headway has been made in the purification of the committee. Christian Front leaders are now gunning for Flynn's scalp.

The attack upon real Americans, who sincerely believe in isolation, but who would have no truck with the Nazis, is just getting under way. Father Coughlin immediately made himself their spokesman. Said he, in a back-page editorial in Social Justice of June 9:

"For some time dire rumors have been circulated about certain individuals who take it upon themselves to act on behalf of the America First Committee. The purpose of this comment is not to blast the America First Committee but to ask the responsible heads of the committee—including Gen. Robert E. Wood—to make a pronouncement before radicals within the ranks of the America First Committee succeed in splitting the organization into a thousand segments.

"Recently, Mr. John T. Flynn, of New York, went out of his way to assail Mr. McWilliams, seated in the audience of an America First meeting at Madison Square Garden. Why? Social Justice holds no brief for Mr. McWilliams. But the point is, if the America First Committee decides to accept only those whose lives, religion, philosophy, associates, business partners, etc., are streamlined to fit the definition of America Firstism as concocted by Dorothy Bromley, then the America First Committee will soon develop into the 'America Last' Committee. * * *

"If Father Coughlin's friends are not pleasing to the America First Committee, then it is high time for the Christian Front to go outside the catacombs where it has been slumbering for some time. * * * Definitely, the pro-Marxists, Dorothy Bromleys, and others want the America First Committee rent in twain. * * * As you remember, the National Union for Social Justice went through the same turmoil now being experienced by the America First Committee. The Communists joined our ranks. And the Communists split the organization from within."

Social Justice is on sale at practically every America First rally throughout the Nation. What the paper stands for is best revealed in a startling editorial, captioned "Colonel Lindbergh," in the May 12, 1941, issue. This editorial, sacrilegious to the extreme, compares the once Lone Eagle to Jesus Christ, setting him upon a pedestal to be worshipped by the duped masses.

"WE"—LINDBERGH AND INGALLS

On June 10, Laura Ingalls, famous aviatrix, addressed a meeting of the Los Angeles division of the National Executive Committee of the Mothers of America to Keep the United States Out of War, whose national chairman is Cathrine Curtis. The audience was liberally sprinkled with people whose names are familiar in the files of Government agencies concerned with the investigation of subversive activities. Miss Ingalls aroused her listeners when she revealed a plan to fly over Los Angeles, San Francisco, Chicago, Detroit, and Washington, D. C., with other flights to be arranged as the plan nears completion. She intends to take to Washington a large batch of petitions for presentation to President Roosevelt. In explaining this, she said:

"The plan is that I shall fly the petitions you are now filling, to Washington, where Cathrine Curtis will present them to the President, and if she does not, I will take them in the back way myself. I have always been able to reach anyone I really wanted to. I suggested this to a mothers' rally in San Francisco, and Mrs. Henry Morris' group is going to cooperate, too. I will also call upon Mrs. Rosa Farber to join us in this. We will be able to get publicity because airplanes are news." (Mrs. Morris, daughter of Mayor Rossi, is head of the Curtis group in San Francisco. Mrs. Farber is head of the Detroit group and closely affiliated with Coughlin.)

On June 12, Miss Ingalls spoke before the Women's Activities Group of the America First Committee, at Los Angeles headquarters. She endorsed a United Europe under Hitler, although she was careful in the phrasing of her recommendation. Calling for "vulgar, fanatical action on the part of mothers whose job it is to inject themselves in the controversy," she argued: "For us women, the issues are clear-cut. We are not interested in what happens in Europe. All we are interested in is seeing our boys live, instead of fighting and dying."

Of course, the flyer carefully avoided to point out that the developments in Europe concern us greatly. Her policy evidently is not to let the right hand know what the left is doing, for she added:

"We need an American symbol of unity. We ought to adopt an American salute—the outstretched left arm. This is the old Indian salute, and therefore, purely American, and no one can accuse us of being Nazis, for the Nazis use the right arm."

After the meeting, the aviatrix spoke to a group of women, reminding them that the swastika is an old Indian sign, therefore American. She showed them a bracelet she was wearing, containing many swastikas as part of the design.

Miss Ingalls is not a newcomer among those who would sell out to Hitler at any price. Four weeks after this war got under way she clamored for a new Munich. This time England was to be sold down the river. America was spared for later.

On September 27, 1939, Laura Ingalls—always publicity hungry and inclined to do the dramatic—created a national stir when she dropped appeasement pamphlets from an airplane over the White House zone. The Civil Aeronautics Authority suspended her license for two violations. Investigation revealed that Miss Ingalls was flying in the interests of a committee headed by none other than Cathrine Curtis. The next day both women appeared and demanded to be admitted to a meeting of the Foreign Relations Committee. When refused entry, Miss Ingalls burst into a denunciation of the Government, exclaiming:

"And this is the Government of the United States! I can't understand it! Imagine! Holding hearings behind closed doors. This is a dictatorship already!"

NAZIS AND COPPERHEADS

Several hours after Miss Ingalls's Los Angeles address, Mrs. Louise Ward Watkins took up where the former left off, presenting another peace-at-any-price harangue, similar to that reported by NRS a week ago.

Very dramatically it was announced at this meeting that ex-Colonel Lindbergh will speak at the Hollywood Bowl on Friday night, June 20. Members were told that the bowl was obtained at a very low cost "because the management looks with much favor upon our cause." Admission will be free. Immediately machinery was set in motion to prepare for an overflow attendance. Nazis who were at this meeting forthwith reported to their own organizations that the lone eagle is winging westward and "it is up to us to make the most of it."

Los Angeles Nazis received the news of Lindbergh's coming with great joy. Typical is the reaction of the German-American Alliance (also known as German-American League), headed by Dr. H. A. Gebhardt, attorney for the German consulate. On Sunday, June 15, the alliance held a folk festival at Hindenburg Park.

At bund headquarters, under ex-citizen Hermann M. Schwinn's direction, great quantities of literature were readied for distribution, among them batches of reprints of Lindbergh's Letter to the American People. Originally published in Collier's magazine, this was reprinted by Edith Marion Shol. Mrs. Shol is editor of the American Freedom magazine, head of the American Freedom Association, and her Nazi activities, already described in detail in previous news letters, include the printing of literature for Los Angeles subversivists of all sorts.

Another propaganda missile is a cartoon recently released by Chicago Nazis. It is a sequel to the drawing reproduced in NRS No. 143, captioned "The Betrayal," showing Uncle Sam nailed to a cross that symbolized the lend-lease bill. The follow-up picture shows multitudes of Americans being led through the portals of the United States Constitution by Columbia, by America First, by Crusading Mothers, and "patriotic" groups. It states that it is "The answer to the betrayal (H. R. 1776) of the internationalists, money changers, social experimenters, warmongers." It was drawn by a prominent Chicago artist of German origin, whose past affiliations with Nazis are well known. Misspelling of certain words has a German flavor, as, for instance, "hypocrisy" being spelled "hypocracy." Original sponsors of these cartoons include Elizabeth Dilling and Newton Jenkins, whose Nazi activities are well known.

Also among the planners for the Lindbergh rally are F. K. Ferenz, notorious as exhibitor of Nazi-propaganda pictures; Ellis O. Jones, founder and head of the National Copperhead Association; and Bruce Tarkington Dowden, America First Committee speaker, recently found guilty by a Los Angeles jury of assault and battery.

OF

HON. R. T. BUCKLER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. ERNEST LUNDEEN, late a Senator from the State of Minnesota

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, when Senator ERNEST LUNDEEN, of Minnesota, was killed in an airplane accident August 31, 1940, Minnesota and the Nation lost one of its pioneer and most energetic liberals.

Senator LUNDEEN was one of the builders and founders of the Farmer-Labor Party, which has enacted and advanced a fine social program in Minnesota. He was one of its leaders and one of its strongest fighters for its principles for two decades.

Senator LUNDEEN was a man of great principle and great courage. When to some people he may have appeared obstinate, it was not obstinacy at all; he refused to compromise on principle so long as he thought that he was in the right. To do the expedient thing never appealed to his nature; it was always to do the right thing.

That Senator LUNDEEN suffered because he charted his life along that course is quite generally known. He suffered politically, and he suffered economically. He knew, at the time, that he would be made to suffer—to take punishment—when he championed causes that for the moment were unpopular. But he lived to see the day when he was vindicated and the causes for which he fought were generally approved.

Everyone who knew Senator LUNDEEN—ERNY LUNDEEN, as his friends knew him—knew that he loved human beings. His conversations were intimate, and he loved to talk with people, heart to heart. He was warm and affectionate. His family ties were warm and affectionate—which made the blow of his death to his friends and his charming family, of wife and two children, the terrible shock that it was.

ERNEST LUNDEEN served his country in war and in peace. He answered his country's call during the Spanish-American War while a mere youngster, and he served in the ranks. No call to service to his country would ever have gone unheeded. He was raised in the atmosphere of America; he breathed the American air, and he was American through and through—a son of America who was never anything else than pro-American.

But while he was pro-American, and thought always of the interests of America first, he deeply sympathized with the common people of all countries suffering because of war. He knew that they were the innocent people who must bear the hardships of wars—wars that they did not create and for none of the responsibilities of which they should share.

Senator LUNDEEN's record, in the Minnesota Legislature and in Congress as a Representative and as a Senator, is a record of support for progressive measures for the betterment of all the people, and particularly for the betterment of the masses struggling for a better life. He was their friend. To America's record of progress, he has lent a historical contribution.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. JOHN W. GWYNNE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIS BENJAMIN GIBBS, late a Representative from the State of Georgia

Mr. GWYNNE. Mr. Speaker, BEN GIBBS died during his first term in Congress, but during that brief period he rendered excellent service to his Nation. I had the pleasure of serving on a subcommittee with him, and so came to know him well and to have a high regard for his ability and his character. He was regular in his attendance at committee meetings and did with thoroughness the tasks assigned to him. He was blessed with a strong sense of humor and a deep understanding of people. These characteristics, together with his practical and charitable approach to all problems, made him a valuable member of the Judiciary Committee. We regret the untimely death of this splendid Member and good friend.

The Proposed Trade Agreements With Argentina and Uruguay

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH BUTLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

STATEMENT BY HON. HUGH BUTLER, OF NEBRASKA, BEFORE COMMITTEE FOR RECIPROCITY INFORMATION

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have placed in the RECORD a statement made by me before the Committee for Reciprocity Information on June 23, 1941.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I appear before this committee not alone in my capacity as a Member of the United States Senate, but as a producer of agricultural products. General farming and livestock feeding is the only occupation or business in which I am financially interested. I feel that I can speak the sentiments not only of my fellow citizens of Nebraska, but likewise the producers over all the western and central western agricultural area, where livestock production is such an important part of their program.

Since many concessions to be granted under the proposed agreements will involve agricultural products and since agriculture is Nebraska's major industry, any concessions or reductions in tariffs on farm products are of particular interest to the people of my State. Livestock and livestock products are the principal source of Nebraska farm income. In 1940 $181,000,000, or 78 percent of Nebraska's cash farm income, was derived from the marketings of these products. Nebraska farmers produce meat, wool, and other animal products, dairy products, fruits, vegetables, flaxseed, as well as other commodities, tariffs on which the administration now proposes to reduce. The only purpose in reducing tariffs on farm products is to encourage imports of farm products, yet agricultural imports from Argentina and Uruguay amounted to over $80,000,000 last year. In other words agricultural imports from these two countries in 1940 represented about one-fourth of total Nebraska's cash farm income, or about twice the amount Nebraska farmers received in Government payments for complying with the farm program. Last year imports of farm products from these two countries represented about $660 per Nebraska farm.

There are three questions that we must keep constantly before us in considering the wisdom of negotiating these agreements at the present time.

1. Will the proposed agreements help American farmers solve their many pressing problems?

2. Will they speed and facilitate our national defense effort?

3. Will the two agreements help or hinder our postwar reconstruction efforts?

I

An examination of the trade-agreements program to date and the facts of trade between the United States and Argentina and between the United States and Uruguay furnishes no support for the proposition that American farmers will gain from the agreements. Ever since the first World War American farmers have sought to achieve economic, political, and social equality with other groups in the population. They have attempted through every fair and legal means to receive prices for their products commensurate with the prices they must pay for commodities used on the farm. Now the administration proposes to reduce tariffs on farm products and thus to give foreign agricultural products an additional competitive advantage in the domestic market—a market which rightfully belongs to the American farmer. Such a move is in direct opposition to the attempt by farmers to achieve equality, parity prices, and parity income. No less a person than President Roosevelt has testified to the truth of this statement. Speaking in Baltimore on October 25, 1932, he said:

"It is absurd to talk of lowering tariff duties on farm products. * * * I promised to endeavor to restore the purchasing power of the farmers' dollars by making the tariff effective for agriculture and raising the prices of the farmers' products. I know of no effective excessively high tariff duties on farm products. I do not intend that such duties shall be lowered. To do so would be inconsistent with my entire farm program and every farmer in the United States knows it and will not be deceived."

II

That the reciprocal trade-agreements program would increase exports of farm products has been the major argument advanced by the New Deal to justify the trade-agreements program to farmers. Secretary Hull and others have claimed that reducing tariffs would stimulate imports, thus giving foreign customers more dollars with which to increase their purchases from us. This was the theory, but has not worked out in practice, for farm exports have actually declined. Exports of agricultural commodities were lower the fiscal year 1939, or in the last year prior to the outbreak of war, than they were in the fiscal year 1934, when the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was passed, or even in 1932. Cotton has for years been the No. 1 export problem confronting the New Deal administration; yet cotton exports in August 1939 were at their lowest level in over 60 years.

Exports of all farm commodities in the fiscal year 1939 were valued at $683,000,000, compared with $789,000,000 in the fiscal year 1934 and $752,000,000 in the fiscal year 1932. Lard exports, cured pork exports, and wheat and flour exports in the fiscal year 1939 were all below the level reached in the fiscal year 1932. In the last year before the outbreak of war, agricultural exports were only 24 percent of total exports, or the lowest on record with the exception of the 1940 fiscal year. Meanwhile imports of competitive agricultural commodities had increased from $375,000,000 in the fiscal year 1932 to $486,000,000 in the fiscal year 1939.

An examination of our trade with Argentina and with Uruguay indicates that these agreements will not open new markets for American farm exports. This is true for the simple reason that the economies of Argentina and Uruguay are based on the production and export of agricultural and pastoral products. In 1939 pastoral and agricultural products made up 94 percent of Argentina's total exports. Argentina ranks along with Canada as one of the two most important surplus food producing areas of the world. It is the largest exporter of wool and beef, at times has exceeded Canada as an exporter of wheat, and ranks third after New Zealand and Australia in shipments of mutton and lambs. Virtually the same is true of Uruguay. Exports of animal and animal products constitute more than 90 percent of Uruguay's total outward trade. Although reducing farm tariffs would make it possible for Argentina and Uruguay to increase their exports of farm products to the United States, it is quite unlikely that they would increase purchases of the very commodities that they are striving to sell.

Nor can it be demonstrated how the proposed agreements will expedite our defense effort. National defense is a matter of national morale and productive efficiency. Reducing tariffs on American farm products will lessen rather than increase the morale of American farmers, and American farmers, it should be recalled, constitute 25 percent of total population. Nor will the agreements, if negotiated, speed the assembly lines which are producing tanks, airplanes, and ammunition or the launching of ships. Although it might be argued that some of the products on which we are contemplating granting concessions are essential to defense, the record shows clearly that products which might be so classified are already flowing to this country in increasing quantities irrespective of our present tariff structure. Accordingly it cannot be demonstrated that our present tariffs are restricting the flow of essential defense materials to this country.

Although the proposed trade agreements will not help us in producing for defense, it should be observed that any steps taken to reduce tariffs on farm products will tend to nullify the agricultural phase of our defense and aid-to-Britain program. At the present time we are encouraging farmers to increase their production of livestock, dairy, and poultry products as well as their production of certain vegetables by price-raising activities. As President Roosevelt observed in 1932, lowering tariff duties on farm products is inconsistent with the objective of increasing farm prices. Farmers, he said, know this "and will not be deceived."

As noted above a New Deal argument in support of its reciprocal trade-agreements program has been that reducing tariffs would stimulate exports of American products. The great bulk of our exports to Argentina and Uruguay, however, consists of metals and metal manufactures, machinery and vehicles, and other products which we are not even producing in sufficient quantities for our own purposes. For these and other reasons the proposed agreements cannot be justified on the basis of national defense.

III

In 1940, when Congress was asked to extend the life of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act for another 3 years, it was argued that the trade-agreements program would have an important role to play during postwar reconstruction years. The program, it was said, would help achieve the progressive lowering of barriers to world trade. There is no factual evidence, however, to support this argument. Trade barriers throughout the world actually increased during the period when we were negotiating trade agreements and lowering tariffs. Officials of the State and Commerce Departments have testified to the validity of this fact. If one is to be realistic, one will recognize that the present war will create problems more difficult of solution than those which confronted us during the years from 1934 up until the outbreak of World War No. 2. Since the trade-agreements program was unable to cope with prewar problems, it stands to reason that it will not succeed during postwar years when the problems will be magnified many times over. When peace comes, as it inevitably will, we will need even stronger weapons with which to combat these trade barriers and trade restrictions. When that time comes the higher our tariffs the more bargaining power we will have. Consequently, this is no time to effect a further reduction in tariffs by granting and generalizing concessions in the proposed Argentine and Uruguayan trade agreements.

Historical background of the tariffs as affecting livestock producers in the United States today

In properly considering the proposed trade agreements, there are a few historical records I would like to point out.

I

(a) Until the turn of the century, 40 years ago, there certainly was no need for a tariff on cattle or other meat animals or upon meat products, since no other country in the world could compete with the Great Plains States in the production of meat animals. Land values were extremely low, labor costs were equally low, taxes were relatively so unimportant as to be seldom considered, and, finally, transportation costs (railway freight rates) were still at very low levels.

(b) Argentina and other large foreign producing areas had not yet come into prominence. In fact, cattle and sheep could not successfully be produced in the Southern Hemisphere to be shipped as live animals many thousands of miles through equatorial regions to Europe, and artificial refrigeration, which made possible the shipping of frozen and chilled beef, veal, mutton, and lamb, had not yet been developed.

(c) Turning to the demand side of the picture, there was an immense foreign market (in United Kingdom and Europe) for meat animals, especially cattle and sheep, so that from the United States we exported as many as a million cattle a year (on cattle boats) and exported the necessary feed along with the animals, so that the fattening or finishing job was carried on near the point of slaughter and final use. In other words, the United States was a tremendous exporter of meat and other livestock products in the form of live animals and feed.

At that time cattle and sheep, as well as the food grains, wheat and rye; the feed grains, corn, oats, and barley; and special crops like tobacco and cotton were all in the same position. We were heavy exporters and feared no competition and needed no tariffs. Internationalists and free-traders in general were brought up under that school. They seem to be blind to the fundamental changes which have taken place since the turn of the century.

The situation described above gradually changed between 1900 and the World War.

II

Introduction of electrical refrigeration: Development of scientific refrigeration, including the chilling and freezing of beef, veal, mutton and lamb, led to a real revolution in sources, destinations, costs and prices of red meats. Such regions as Australia and New Zealand, Argentina and Uruguay (and other lesser areas), became the world providers or sources of supply for great consuming areas in the United Kingdom and western Europe. Animals were "finished" in the producing areas, slaughtered there, and only the finished products were shipped to the consuming centers. Thus, on the one hand we have vast new producing areas coming into the picture; we have a complete new type of trade with Europe; and from the standpoint of our own great Middle Western States, farmers were forced to turn to "corn and hogs," the products from which were converted into hams, shoulders, bacon, lard, and the other pork products which have made that region famous.

III

The World War likewise led to the plowing up of millions of acres of land in the Great Plains area which found its way into the production of wheat and rye and the production of corn, oats, barley and other feed grains. This pointed in the direction of less emphasis upon cattle and more emphasis upon hog production.

IV

The World War too led to a tremendous increase in transportation costs. It no longer was economic to ship live cattle from the Great Plains region to coastal cities for transshipment to European markets. On the other hand, the cattle and sheep of such regions as Australia and New Zealand, Argentina and Uruguay and other lesser areas were produced relatively very close to the coast lines. In other words, the cost of bringing them from producing areas to the coast cities for shipment or for slaughter was very low compared with transportation costs in the United States.

V

While land freight rates in the United States mounted higher and higher and became prohibitive from the standpoint of middle-western farmers, governments of great nations such as the United Kingdom, United States, and continental European countries encouraged the development of the merchant marine, as an auxiliary service to their navies, and supported ocean transportation from government funds by the payment of a multitude of different kinds of subsidies for the merchant marine. Briefly, land freight rates went higher and higher while ocean freight rates went lower and lower, relatively.

Summary

From the above it will be seen that a veritable revolution has taken place during the last 40, or, indeed, the last 25, years, and the United States is no longer in position to compete in the foreign market as an exporter of meat animals or products and feed grains. From year to year, on the other hand, we have faced the opposite situation of competition in our own markets from the products of these other foreign producing areas.

The great consuming centers of the United States lie along our coast lines. It is actually cheaper for them to secure meats and other livestock products from foreign areas than from our own central regions. Hence the need for tariffs to protect domestic markets.

VI

There is an interdependence between the manufacturing and distributing centers of the coastal areas and the great agricultural groups of the Mississippi Valley. If farmers of the Great Plains States cannot market their products in the United States, they, in turn, cannot buy the manufactured products from domestic industries. It is, therefore, in the interest of the people in the coastal cities to buy from domestic producers if they wish to sell their products to the 25,000,000 farmers who live inland.

VII

The difficult position of the great body of inland farmers is increasing daily. Recently all workers in coal mines were given an advance in wages approximating a dollar a day. Is this extra dollar to be spent buying Argentine beef? Most of the workers in the iron and steel industries during recent weeks or months have been advanced in wages at about the same rate. Is this dollar, too, to be used in buying Argentine beef? Wage earners in a multitude of other industries are rapidly being granted similar wage increases. And is this another dollar to be used in buying Argentine beef? All railroad workers (numbering about 1,000,000) are now negotiating for wage increases in harmony with those recently granted mine workers and others. If these advances are granted, transportation rates must be advanced in proportion. All of this points in the direction of higher costs to farmers for everything which they produce to ship in the direction of the coasts and everything which they wish to buy which is brought in from the direction of the coasts.

Conclusion

With the above broad picture in mind, the query presents itself, How are American farmers to attain or preserve parity prices if rates of duty are reduced? (During the last 15 years sanitary regulations have supplemented tariffs in protecting the American market for American farmers. If these sanitary regulations are removed or modified, farmers will face even greater difficulties.)

If rates of duty are to be reduced,

A. It will not suffice merely to limit imports by some tariff quota permitting a certain quantity of imports at the lower rate and unlimited imports at present rates of duty. Imports must be limited by absolute quotas, or tariff rates and sanitary regulations must be preserved.

B. If rates of duty are reduced, they should be definitely linked to a proviso to the effect that the lower rates of duty shall not be permitted to operate unless farmers are receiving at least price parity for their products.

VIII

There are a number of other very important considerations which would need to be dealt with. Only one further item will be mentioned here. Because of monetary policies pursued by this country and most foreign countries, exchange rates and monetary values are in a state of utmost confusion. Frequently foreign areas can now ship into the American market without regard to tariff rates. At the present time sanitary regulations rather than tariffs are controlling factors.

IX

So far as foreign policy is concerned, including the good-neighbor policy with Latin American countries, the greatest need at the present time is to strive for world peace. This should be followed by the building up of a great market for Argentine products in the United Kingdom and on the Continent of Europe rather than a program to provide a market in the United States for competing farm products.

During the turmoil of war is no time to negotiate a revolutionary change in our economic relations with foreign nations in matters of trade, exchange, tariffs, etc. Following the return of peace—that some time is certain to come—we can better plan long-term hemispheric trade policies than at this time of war hysteria. Our friends in the Southern Hemisphere should not expect to balance their foreign trade by totally disrupting our domestic economy. We want hemispheric solidarity—but not at the expense of national solidarity.

I conclude that there is no justification whatsoever for negotiating the proposed agreements at the present time. They will not help farmers solve their many and trying problems; they will not increase exports of American farm surpluses; they will not aid our defense program, nor will they facilitate post-war reconstruction. The decision to negotiate these agreements at this time was ill-conceived and not conducive to national unity. Early in 1940 the State Department terminated trade-agreement negotiations with these same countries. I submit that this was a wise decision and one that could be followed at the present time.

The Sugar Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. NORRIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

LETTER BY HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, OF WYOMING

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter appearing in the Washington Post of June 24, 1941, written by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] and printed under the heading "The sugar bill defended."

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of June 24, 1941]

THE SUGAR BILL DEFENDED

A STATEMENT BY SENATOR O'MAHONEY

To the EDITOR OF THE POST.

SIR: Now that you have published the reply of the Maritime Association of New York to your editorial of June 8 expressing approval of the sugar bill introduced by Senator ADAMS, of Colorado, and the undersigned, the supporters of this legislation are under a double obligation to you, for Mr. Callaghan's letter has clearly revealed the insubstantial and sectional character of the opposition to this proposal. I venture to set forth a few undisputable facts to demonstrate the soundness of your own editorial opinion and the weaknesses of Mr. Callaghan's argument.

The bill, already passed by the Senate and now pending in the House, is very similar to a measure introduced in that body by Representative HARRY COFFEE, of Nebraska, and approved several weeks ago by the House Committee on Agriculture. The bill, therefore, has the endorsement of a substantial majority of the United States Senate and of an important standing committee of the House. It can be defeated only if opponents succeed in confusing the issue which was set forth with admirable clarity in the Post editorial of June 8.

The proposal is simply that, in the present emergency, with an acknowledged shortage of shipping, domestic sources of sugar supply be first utilized to fill the anticipated Philippine deficit before certain Latin American countries are given a larger share in the American market than they have ever enjoyed. The position of the Maritime Association of the Port of New York is that the farmers and planters of 23 States and 3 island possessions should not be permitted to utilize their present productive capacity to supply the American market with sugar the Philippines cannot deliver. It argues that American consumers should be made even more dependent than they now are on foreign sources of supply, even though the Nation is confronted with a shipping crisis and is in great need of strategic commodities like rubber and tin.

These are commodities which must come from overseas because they cannot be supplied by the sugar States nor even by the port of New York. It is probable that the Maritime Association of the Port of New York might more profitably devote its energies to an attempt to secure shipping to bring in these necessary supplies rather than to the attempt to cut down a domestic agricultural industry and thus risk a shortage of sugar as well as of rubber and tin.

Mr. Callaghan has with commendable frankness acknowledged his "bias," to use his own word. He warns us that he speaks only for the shipping industry of a great port. We are therefore the better able to judge the merit of his arguments when, for an imagined benefit to his city, he advocates the suppression of beet and cane farming in more than a third of the United States. I think the facts demonstrate that he is in error.

"In the first place," says he, "no agency of the United States Government connected with shipping and defense has ever stated that an expansion in the beet-sugar industry is necessary to relieve a shipping shortage."

Very well. Let's look at the record.

On April 5 last the Maritime Commission, having been charged by the President with the duty of making a survey of shipping facilities, addressed a letter to the Secretary of Agriculture in which is definitely and explicitly recommended the reallocation of the Philippine sugar quota.

This is what the Maritime Commission wrote:

"As of March 25 there remained approximately 635,000 tons of duty-free Philippine sugars to be brought to this country in accordance with established quotas. While we cannot give you an accurate estimate at this time, it is apparent from the demands for ships and space that consideration should be given to the reallocation of quotas if this can be done, so that the quantity of sugar to be transported from the Philippines can be reduced, and the ships made available for the transportation of other strategic commodities which are urgently required in the defense effort. A reduction in the required importation of sugar from the Philippines will make tonnage available for the transportation of rubber, tin, ores, wool, and other strategic commodities which must be brought to this country in large quantities from the Straits, the Dutch East Indies, the Philippines, and Australia."

The need of rubber is so great that only last week the Government suspended all private imports of that commodity from the Far East, and, effective today, according to the announcement of Federal Loan Administrator Jesse Jones, a Government defense corporation has become the exclusive buyer of rubber imported into the United States from the Far East. But the Maritime Association of the Port of New York wants to use ships for sugar instead of for rubber, although the farmers of 23 States, if permitted, can grow more sugar.

On May 31 the Division of Priorities, Office of Production Management, issued a statement in which it said that copper had been on that day added to the list of vital defense metals under mandatory, industry-wide control. It pointed out that copper is urgently needed for the manufacture of shell cases, small-arms ammunition, fire-control equipment, power and telephone equipment, switchboards, generators, and parts in plane motors.

But the Maritime Association of the Port of New York wants to use ships to transport the sugar American farmers can raise, instead of using them for copper. In the face of the specific recommendations of the Maritime Commission for a reallocation of the Philippine quota and of the official declarations of that Commission, of the R. F. C., and the O. P. M., Mr. Callaghan seeks to convey the impression that the defense agencies have never taken a position, and that there is really no shipping shortage.

The Maritime Commission wants to use ships for rubber, tin, ores, and other strategic commodities instead of for sugar, but the Maritime Association of the Port of New York wants the House of Representatives to defeat the sugar bill so that instead of using our own home-grown sugar beets and sugarcane to supply the Philippine deficit, we must become dependent on Peru and San Domingo.

If, however, it will be difficult if not impossible to secure enough ships for Chilean copper, as O. P. M. predicts, where are we going to find the ships for Peruvian sugar?

Here, then, are the irrefutable facts:

1. This country urgently needs rubber, tin, ores, and other strategic commodities from the general area of the Philippines.

2. This country urgently needs copper from South America.

3. The United States Maritime Commission, for the purpose of obtaining strategic commodities, recommends that shipping from the Philippines be used to transport these commodities rather than sugar.

4. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is prepared to buy 500,000 tons of Chilean copper, but the Office of Production Management seriously doubts whether there will be sufficient shipping available to bring in all the copper we need.

5. The New York Journal of Commerce shows that shipping rates have increased approximately 500 percent in the last 8 months.

6. The beet farmers of the United States, who have been compelled this year to reduce their plantings by 170,000 acres, and the producers of Louisiana and Florida sugarcane, who will be permitted to market only 448,000 tons while they are capable of producing 580,000, can supply sugar for the American consumer without the use of a single ship and without impeding the importation of strategic commodities needed for national and hemispheric defense. Let me remark that it is a good deal more important for San Domingo, Peru, Cuba, and, incidentally, the port of New York, that we get rubber, tin, and copper in sufficient quantities to perfect our hemispheric defenses than that Latin America send in and New York City receive sugar which we can produce at home.

It will be noted that the brunt of Mr. Callaghan's attack is directed against the growing of sugar beets, and he charges that this domestic industry is subsidized by the Government at the expense of the consumers of this country. This is a common charge by those who do not understand the sugar law and those who understand it so well that they would like to undo it for the purpose of making the consumers of the United States once more wholly dependent upon the seaboard refiners of cane sugar.

The charge is demonstrably unsound. It is supported by arguments which, consciously or unconsciously, misrepresent the facts, as in the case of Mr. Callaghan's misquotation of Vice President WALLACE. In his letter to you he writes about "subsidy system for sugar which, according to the Vice President of the United States, HENRY A. WALLACE, costs consumers and the Public Treasury some $350,000,000 a year." Vice President WALLACE has not made any such statement. As Secretary of Agriculture, he endorsed and supported sugar legislation from the beginning. In 1937, when a decision of the Supreme Court had invalidated the processing tax and when the sugar industry was seeking to continue the quota system without the tax, Secretary WALLACE argued for the tax, but not against the quota system nor against the beet-sugar industry.

A reading of the whole letter shows that the argument of Mr. WALLACE was that a sugar act without a processing tax would result in undue profits for the refiner at the expense of both the farmers and the consumers. It will be observed that the Secretary was comparing the cost of sugar to American consumers in 1936 to the depressed prices that prevailed in the world market. The whole purpose of the sugar legislation was to provide reasonable prices and a stabilized market for all engaged in the sugar industry—producers, processors, seaboard refiners, agriculture workers, refinery workers, and consumers. It was enacted precisely because the depressed prices of the world market made it impossible for any factor in the sugar industry to operate at a profit.

Consumers were protected by the provisions of the bill under which the Secretary of Agriculture determines the amount of sugar to be consumed. He may raise his estimates if the price should get out of line. So successful has the operation been that the retail prices of sugar since the enactment of the Sugar Act have been lower than at any time in the history of the sugar industry.

If American consumers should again be obliged to depend for their sugar supply upon shipping facilities from off-shore areas and upon a refiner-controlled industry, they might expect to see again the prices which they paid during the last war. The average prices year by year during that crisis went up steadily from 9.3 cents per pound in 1917 to 19.4 cents in 1920.

Under the Sugar Act, despite the benefit payments to farmers of which Mr. Callaghan complains, the consumer has never paid more than 5.8 cents. These benefit payments are not a subsidy in any real sense of the word because they are paid out of the proceeds of a processing tax which is borne by the industry itself. The tax falls upon processors and growers, not upon the consumers, and amounts to a transfer of a portion of the excess profits of processing sugar from the processor to the farmer.

Without casting any burden upon the consumer, the Sugar Act has so reorganized the entire sugar industry that it has stabilized and improved conditions for every person engaged in it. It has been particularly successful in improving labor conditions upon the cane plantations in Hawaii and Puerto Rico where, until this law was adopted, sugarcane was raised under the substandard labor conditions that have notoriously existed in Cuba and San Domingo.

To argue as the Maritime Association of the port of New York does that sugar beets should not be raised upon the family-sized farms of the 21 States now engaged in that industry, but that our sugar supply should be brought in from the Caribbean and Latin America, is merely to argue that for the benefit of the organized refining industry of New York City, the beet farmers of the United States should be driven from the industry and their place taken by the plantation exploited labor of areas which do not have our standards of social existence.

The German-Russian War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STYLES BRIDGES

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, we have heard a great deal of discussion in the country about Russia's entrance into the war. There appears in the New York Times this morning an editorial entitled "America, Britain, and Russia." It is one of the outstanding editorials which it has been my privilege to read, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICA, BRITAIN, AND RUSSIA

It will make for greater clarity in the thinking of the American people and for greater speed in the action of their Government if from the very start of this new discussion of our policy toward the German-Russian war, we drop the false and misleading slogan of "Help Russia" and concentrate our attention on the real aim: "Stop Hitler!"

Certainly, the only people in this country who want to "Help Russia," in the sense of helping Stalin, are the handful of our domestic Communists, who time and again have shown their hatred of every American principle, their unfailing intellectual dishonesty in the face of Stalin's twists and turns, and their willingness to sabotage our own defense program in any way they can.

The rest of us have no use whatever for the Government of Russia. We bear no ill will against the Russian people; we should like to cherish the hope that one unintended result of this new war may be to bring them closer to some kind of humane and democratic rule. But we have only the utmost detestation for the brutal regime of Stalin. And we have not the least desire to enhance the prestige of that regime, or to hail it as a new-found friend, or to help prolong its stay in power, or to increase its capacity to do us evil.

But the question of stopping Hitler is another matter. Every act of the Congress of the United States—from repeal of the arms embargo, through the adoption of compulsory military training; the decision to build a two-ocean Navy; and the passage of the Lease Lend Act—and every test of the sentiment of the American people, wherever and by whatever means that test was taken, reveals a deep and well-founded conviction that an aggressive, ruthless Nazi Germany is our most immediate danger—a danger now so rapidly expanding and so near to breaking down the defenses of the Atlantic world that our own free institutions have been put in deadly danger, and that they will remain in deadly danger until this Nazi Germany is halted in its tracks.

What has happened as a consequence of this sudden turn in the fortunes of the war is that we have now been given an unexpected opportunity not to help Russia but to help stop Hitler. That is what the American people want to do. That is why they are willing to pay unprecedented taxes, and why they are impatient with the old doctrine of business as usual, and why they demand that Congress pass such measures as the Lease Lend Act, and why they applaud their President every time he makes a fighting speech and leads them another bold step forward.

There are four compelling reasons, we believe, why American action at this new crisis in the war can best take the form not of helping Russia but of stopping Hitler by redoubling our aid to Britain. The names of these reasons are time, strategy, incompetence, and unity.

First, time: If there is one thing we ought now to have learned, it is that Hitler strikes with tremendous speed. We were going to help France, we were going to help Yugoslavia, and we were going to help Greece. Our help never got there. It never got there because the battle was over before we made up our minds to act. In the present case, even if our resources of weapons and munitions were inexhaustible—and they are not—we could not possibly transport these weapons and munitions across the Pacific and expect the Russians to transport them across Siberia in time to affect the critical stages of this new war on the eastern German front.

Second, strategy: By sending our weapons to Britain instead of Russia we can make them count at once. A thousand American bombers and pursuit ships and fighting planes, delivered at British ports within the next 3 weeks, might well be the decisive factor in the winning of this war. They would enable Britain to bomb Hitler's vital war industries almost at will while his hands are full on the eastern front; or else they would force Hitler to deflect a great part of his air power from the east to the west in order to defend himself, in which case there would be much greater likelihood of his bogging down interminably in Russia.

Third, incompetence: Even if we were willing now to trust a Russian Government which we have never trusted in the past, there is the question of competence as well as of good faith. The Government of Russia is notoriously incompetent. It is quite possible that American war material sent to Stalin would end up in Hitler's hands. That will never happen in the case of American war material sent to Britain. The British have shown both their courage and their ability to manage planes and ships. They will fight those planes and ships to the last ounce of strength that lies in them.

Fourth, unity: It is already clear that aid to Russia would involve the American people in a discussion of issues which are irrelevant to the all-important central question of seizing this chance to deal Hitler a deadly blow. American aid to Britain has had at every step the overwhelming support of our people.

The course is clear. Let the President comb our Army and our Navy for as many planes as can possibly be spared. Let him fly the big planes to Britain. Let him put the smaller planes aboard our ships. Let him arm those ships and give them the protection of our Navy, to make sure that they get there.

Now, with Hitler engaged in war upon two fronts, we have an opportunity for action that may never come again if it is lost. This is the time to strike.

The Proposed Trade Agreements With Argentina and Uruguay

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

STATEMENT BY HON. ARTHUR CAPPER, OF KANSAS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON RECIPROCITY INFORMATION

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement submitted by me before the Committee on Reciprocity Information in opposition to proposed tariff-rate reductions in imports of agricultural commodities in connection with negotiations for reciprocal trade agreements with the governments of Argentina and Uruguay.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I am appearing before your committee today to urge most respectfully that due consideration be given to the welfare of the farmers of the United States, in any trade agreements negotiated with the Governments of Argentina and Uruguay. I note that there are listed for consideration in the proposed negotiations under the provisions of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act a very comprehensive list of meats and meat products, practically all of which would be directly competitive with livestock production of the United States.

I wish to say that I appreciate the difficulties which your committee, and the State Department, face in negotiating trade agreements with any other nation. The United States is an industrial nation. Naturally our manufacturers are seeking foreign markets. But the United States also produces surpluses of a number of farm commodities.

Naturally, our manufacturers desire that these agreements, when completed, provide increased foreign markets for their manufactured products, but not increased domestic markets for products of foreign manufacturers. And naturally, also, the American farmers, paying higher wages and higher prices than farmers of other nations, do not desire to have the American market flooded with farm commodities produced in foreign lands.

I believe I appreciate also the fact that in the present world situation, there is a great desire on the part of the Government of the United States—and I am in hearty sympathy with that desire—to cultivate friendly relations and increase trade with the nations of South America. We want to be good neighbors to the South American peoples. We want them to be good neighbors of ours. And all of us are in agreement on that kind of a policy. We want to be good neighbors with the farmers of Argentina and Uruguay.

But, Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee on Reciprocity Information, I would also call to your attention the fact that you have some farmer neighbors even closer than in Argentina and Uruguay. These are the farmers of the United States; the farmers of Kansas, whom I represent, and all the other States in the Union. Particularly affected by any trade agreements with Argentina and Uruguay probably will be those farmers engaged in the production of livestock, and those States and communities depending largely upon livestock production for income and purchasing power.

The importance of the proposed trade agreements with these two nations to the people of the Corn Belt, the Great Plains, the Southwest, and the cattle country of the Northwest, is plain when one reads the list of articles included in the scope of the proposed negotiations. For the record, I will call special attention at this point to these items:

Argentina: Casein, vegetable oils, tallow, oleo oil and oleo stearine, meat extract, prepared and preserved meats, cheeses, corned-beef hash, wools, cattle hides and skins, dog food, blood, bones, lamb and sheep fur and skins, fertilizers, hoofs, horns, sausage casings, and horse, sheep, lamb, goat, and kid skins.

Uruguay: Casein, tallow, oleo oil and oleo stearine, meat extract, preserved and prepared meats, wools, wool pelts, cattle hides and skins, blood, bones, fertilizers, and sausage casings.

In other words, Argentina and Uruguay have surpluses for export, and seek a market for those surpluses in the United States, of many of the same farm products which the farmers of the United States already produce in surplus quantities. Any agreements made which allow increased importations of these commodities into the United States threaten irreparable injury to the farmers, particularly the livestock producers of the United States.

I believe I am entitled to presume that the main purpose of the proposed trade agreements with Argentina and Uruguay is to increase our trade with these countries; another purpose is presumably political rather than economic—to promote hemisphere defense.

Now, I am in favor of building up our foreign trade, but not at the expense of our domestic welfare.

I am not in favor of sacrificing the farmers of the United States to promote our foreign trade.

Any attempt to build up our foreign trade at the expense of our domestic economy is attacking the problem from the wrong angle.

I hold it is fundamental that our trade with foreign countries flourishes most in periods of domestic prosperity.

When farmers have adequate purchasing power, then is when we import the largest quantities of necessities and spend most freely for foreign luxuries.

The intelligent way to stimulate and expand foreign trade is to create a sound domestic prosperity. In the long run, trade depends upon markets. Markets depend upon purchasing power.

Anything which improves the purchasing power of the American people will encourage foreign trade. Anything which tends to destroy the purchasing power of the American people, or of any considerable group of the American people, defeats the admittedly desirable objective of increasing foreign trade.

I favor increasing our foreign trade through policies that will increase the purchasing power of the American market.

I am opposed to what I consider the fallacy of trying to build up our foreign trade through diminishing the purchasing power of the American market.

It is my contention that if these proposed trade agreements with Argentina and Uruguay are to be effective they must result in diminishing the purchasing power of those great areas in the West and Southwest that are so largely dependent upon a prosperous agriculture, particularly a prosperous livestock industry, for general prosperity in those areas.

Now, it seems to me there are one or two things in connection with these reciprocal trade agreements that are almost self-evident.

The reciprocal trade-agreements policy is based upon a mutual adjustment of tariff rates downward. I believe it is self-evident that the purpose of reducing the tariff rate on any commodity is to encourage the country with which the agreement is made to believe it will dispose of larger quantities of that commodity in the American market.

It happens that nearly all the exportable products of Argentina are directly competitive with the products of American farms.

When it is proposed that changes be made in the tariff rates on numerous farm products of Argentina, we are entitled to believe—and Argentina is entitled to believe—that means more of the Argentina farm products will be imported into the United States.

If it does not mean that, then our State Department would be guilty of attempting to flimflam the Argentine people—and we know that Secretary Hull would not be guilty of flimflamming those people.

If it does mean that, it seems to me almost inescapable that these increased imports from Argentina will either displace an equivalent amount of United States produced products in the United States market and/or force a lower price for all the commodity sold in the United States. When you increase imports of farm products into a domestic market already oversupplied, you drive the market price of that commodity downward. I hope this committee will bear that in mind in making its recommendations for tariff reductions on farm commodities from Argentina and Uruguay, also bearing in mind that these reductions also will apply to other nations.

I have no doubt you will be told that the additional imports will be so small, in comparison to the total domestic consumption, that the price effect will be imperceptible. That is just not true. The effect is not imperceptible. It is immediate and very noticeable.

The reason for this is simple. In an open market the lowest offer sets the price. And in the United States we have normally an open market on farm commodities.

Without reviewing the entire history of the reciprocal trade agreements so far negotiated, I will simply state that the experience of American agriculture under these agreements has not been particularly happy. Tariff reductions on farm commodities have increased trade in those commodities, but the increase has been in imports of competitive agricultural products or products that are similar to or interchangeable with farm commodities produced commercially inside the United States.

Importations of such competitive products were valued at $486,000,000 in the fiscal year 1939, as compared to $410,000,000 in fiscal year 1934, before the act became effective. That was an increase of some 16 percent. In those 5 years imports of unmanufactured tobacco increased from $25,000,000 to $38,000,000; vegetable oils, from $38,000,000 to $54,000,000; flaxseed from $18,800,000 to $21,800,000; wool imports, $10,400,000 to $16,700,000; canned beef (including corned beef), $2,700,000 to $8,400,000; cattle, $700,000 to $16,700,000. On the other hand, farm exports dropped 13 percent, from $787,000,000 in 1934 to $683,000,000 in 1939.

Now it is proposed to make additional reductions in tariffs on farm products. That State Department's announcement indicates that tariffs will be reduced on important dairy products, animal products, fruits, vegetables, farm crops. Of course, none of us will know until after the agreements are completed, upon what items tariff reductions will be made, nor how much the reductions will be; presumably around 50 percent.

No matter how much language is used to make these trade agreements sound palatable, the fact cannot be escaped that the real purpose is to increase imports of farm products into the United States from these countries.

If it is argued in support of these proposed trade agreements that they are necessary to our national defense and our national security, it seems to me that is in effect arguing our national defense depends upon importing food and other farm products from beyond our shores. Administration spokesmen also contend that to have a strong national defense we must increase our economic efficiency and promote the national welfare. I fail to see how reducing tariffs and encouraging the importation of foreign-produced farm products, while the Federal Government is spending a billion dollars a year to curtail production of farm commodities in the United States is sound economics. The trade agreements and the A. A. A. taken together just don't make sense.

I can even remember back to the time when President Roosevelt himself—in a campaign speech at Baltimore in October 1932—assured farmers he would not reduce tariffs on farm products. The very thought of doing such a thing he declared to be "absurd." He knew of "no effective excessive high tariff duties on farm products" and as I remember it, promised specifically that such duties would not be lowered. It is only fair to state, however, that since that time there have been some 150 or so reductions in tariffs on farm products, in connection with the trade-agreements program. It seems sometimes to us out in the Farm Belt that promotion of foreign trade through these trade agreements consists in providing for more and more imports of farm commodities, and increasing exports of nonfarm manufactured goods.

I know it is contended that lowering duties on farm products and increasing imports of farm products will provide foreign countries with necessary dollar exchange to buy our products. Specifically, that we reduce tariffs on flaxseed, dairy products, meat products, and so on, Argentina and Uruguay will increase their sales of these commodities to us, and in return will then buy more from us. But they will buy nonfarm products. In other words, this program compels the American farmer in effect to finance the farmers of Argentina and Uruguay on the one hand, and the American manufacturers on the other.

Rather interestingly, the things which these countries take from the United States are largely products which are secondary to our own national defense and to the aid-to-Britain program; some of them articles on which it is proposed to put heavy taxes so that our own people will buy fewer of them so the materials in them will be available for national-defense industries. And that doesn't seem to make any more sense than does the program of paying American farmers not to produce because of surpluses, and then encouraging imports of these surplus farm commodities.

That leaves the argument that we must negotiate these trade agreements—and provide for increased imports of farm commodities already produced in surplus or, as in the case with beef cattle, which will be produced in surplus quantities as the cattle cycle moves upward—in the interest of hemisphere defense. In other words, we must buy from these countries to hold them in line, just as Britain bought tobacco from Turkey (at the expense of our tobacco growers) to hold Turkey in line. After which Turkey entered into an agreement with Hitler, I believe.

Now, I will say this much. If I believed these proposed agreements would aid in hemisphere defense; if the proposed agreements did not jeopardize the American farmer; if the agreements were required to be ratified by the Senate—then I would be unequivocally in favor of proceeding with the negotiations. But I do not believe these agreements are necessary to hemisphere defense; their effect will be to depress farm prices, reduce farm income, seriously impair farm purchasing power; the agreements are not subject to review by either branch of Congress.

Furthermore, I would point out that the present tariffs are not so high as to shut out imports from these countries. In 1940 we bought $17,629,000 worth of goods from Uruguay, and sold only $11,275,000 worth in return. What is more, our purchases from Uruguay were 88 percent larger than in 1939. Our purchases—imports—from Argentina increased 35 percent over 1939 in 1940. We took more wool (164 percent increase); more animal products, more dairy products, hides and skins, undressed furs, corn, oats, bran, pears, tungsten ore, lead ores, tin ores, than in 1939. Our present tariffs are not prohibitive; they do serve as a measure of protection for the American farmer. And I maintain that protection should be continued, in the interest of farmer morale as a necessary part of sound national defense.

In closing I appeal to the committee, and to the State Department, to show as much good will and good neighbor spirit in dealing with the welfare of the American farmer as in taking care of the interests of the farmers of Argentina and Uruguay.

The Services of the Catholic Hospital As a Health-Caring Agency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES E. MURRAY, OF MONTANA, BEFORE CATHOLIC HOSPITAL ASSOCIATION

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, on the 17th of June last, the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] delivered an address in Philadelphia before the Catholic Hospital Association. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I appreciate greatly the privilege of addressing this meeting of the Catholic Hospital Association of the United States and Canada.

As a member of the United States Senate Committee on Education and Labor I have for some years been actively interested in the subject of national health and in the problems incident to the expansion and improvement of facilities for the care and treatment of the sick and indigent among our citizens. In connection with our legislative activities in Washington we have often had the benefit of the valuable experience and advice of your able representatives appearing before our committee hearings. It is therefore appropriate that I should take this opportunity to express my appreciation of the splendid assistance rendered by your association and its able officers in connection with these national problems.

I feel particularly indebted to Father Alphonse M. Schwitalla, president of your association, and the Reverend Morris F. Griffin, senior trustee of your association, both of whom have on many occasions attended our hearings and rendered conspicuous aid in the study of these important problems. I must not fail to also mention Mr. William F. Montavon, director of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, of Washington, D. C., who has likewise been of material assistance to us in Washington in considering these problems.

For a long period of time the Catholic hospitals have been an unfailing source of social strength among the private agencies devoted to the service of the sick and the control of illness. The great service which has been rendered by Catholic hospitals in these two countries can never be fully evaluated. History shows us that the establishment of Catholic hospitals in Canada and the United States roughly approximates the onward movement of cultural areas. This was true in the days of the Spanish exploration and settlement of the great Southwest and likewise appears true in the case of the pioneers who founded Quebec and Montreal, whose advent was coincident with the establishment of Catholic hospitals in Canada.

To the daring pioneering spirit of the sisters who planted the Catholic hospitals at the frontier of the western march of culture we owe a debt which can never be paid. Their supreme courage, their unfaltering faith, and their progressiveness in the face of almost insurmountable obstacles have carried the Catholic hospitals to a high pinnacle in the social development of the United States and Canada.

Another source of high service to both nations is the idealism, unselfishness, and motivation of the Catholic hospital sisters. The Catholic hospital, in almost all areas where it has gained a foothold, has been a center of diffusion of social influences for the betterment of the people. While they have played a leading part in the technical development of our hospitals, their spiritual contributions have been of greater significance.

We hear altogether too much emphasis upon economics in health care and too little of the importance of the individual's triumph over himself in the maintenance of health and in the endu ance of illness. The Catholic hospital has not minimized the evils of illness, and has, of course, bent all its efforts to the eradication of disease and the promotion of health. But neither has it seen in illness the one great social evil which so many present-day advocates of national-health programs would have us to believe it is. The philosophy of life that sees only evil in human suffering, and fails to recognize that in suffering there often appears a hidden benefit which enables many a patient to step from the depths of depravity to a better and fuller life, precisely because of his illness, is a philosophy which in the present day is popular, but, manifestly, a mistaken one. It is in this field of spirituality that the Catholic hospital sister exercises such a profound influence and has given the Catholic hospital such a high position in the life of these two nations.

Life is the greatest of our material possessions, and the health of our people is our greatest national asset. Today, far more than in any normal times, it is necessary to safeguard the health of the people of our democracies, and to strengthen the social services which are vital to the operation and the survival of democracy as a way of life. In these trying times service to the sick and prevention of disease are especially important in helping people meet the stress and strain involved in this great world crisis affecting so seriously these two democratic nations.

Although the well-being of the populations of the United States and Canada has vastly improved in the last 50 years, much remains to be done. For example, in the United States we are now deeply concerned over the high proportion of rejections under the United States Selective Service Act because of physical and mental infirmities uncovered among the enrollees. The figures recently made available confirm the conclusions from numerous surveys and special studies that a large amount of ill health persists, even in the years of life when health should be at its highest level. To effectively reduce the burdens and suffering caused by preventable sickness, all our existing facilities, private as well as governmental, must be used with the greatest skill we can command.

The growth of Catholic hospitals has been coincident with the settlement, expansion, and cultural developments of the United States and Canada. Indeed, so great has been the growth of these hospitals that, in the year 1940, in the United States and Canada combined, there were 900 Catholic hospitals and over 400 Catholic medical, health, and nursing agencies. The 689 Catholic hospitals in the United States in 1940 equal about 10 percent of all registered and nonregistered hospitals in the country. It is significant to note that Catholic hospitals comprise more than two-thirds of all the registered hospitals operated by church organizations in the United States.

I have been interested to review the extent of the facilities which the Catholic hospitals of the United States and Canada have available and the amount of service they furnish. The figures are impressive and worthy of note. Exclusive of other medical and institutional agencies, during 1940 these hospitals maintained more than 127,000 beds to meet the hospitalization needs of these countries. An additional 30,000 beds would be added to this number if the beds in other Catholic medical and institutional agencies were considered. In the continental United States, of a total of about 121,000 beds in all hospitals operated by religious organizations, Catholic hospitals contained over 92,000 beds, or more than three-fourths.

It is not enough to supply hospital beds and facilities; it is more important that they be utilized. Hence, more significant than the figures I have cited are the facts concerning the use of the Catholic hospitals. In 1940, in both countries, over 3,000,000 patients received more than 33,000,000 days of hospitalization. Somewhat more than two-thirds of the patients and of the hospital days apply to the United States and somewhat less than one-third to Canada. Also, it is heartening to note that the use and occupancy rates of the hospitals are increasing.

The importance of the Catholic hospitals in the hospital system of the United States is further evident when it is noted that the patients admitted to Catholic hospitals in the United States comprise about 25 percent of all patients admitted to all general hospitals in the country and about 86 percent of all patients admitted to all church hospitals.

It would be expected that hospitals owned and operated by a church whose fundamental precepts include the care of the poor would provide a considerable amount of charitable service. Therefore, it is not surprising to find that in the United States about 18 percent of the patient-days of care furnished in the Catholic hospitals in 1940 were given without cost to the patient. In Canada, the corresponding figure was 45 percent for free service. The number of free patients in the Catholic hospitals of the United States declined during 1940 by 11,000 under the figure for 1939. This reduction in free service is not, I understand, the result of any change in policy with respect to furnishing free care.

It was probably due to economic improvements in the condition of the people and to a greater participation by the hospitals in the funds set aside by other private agencies and by government bodies for the support of the poor and the indigent in need of hospital service. Group hospitalization plans have also had a part in reducing the demand for free hospital care in the areas where these insurance plans are in operation. Apparently, such private and governmental funds are not as substantial in Canada as in the United States; the volume of free service increased in Canada from 37 percent in 1938 to 43 percent in 1939 and further increased to 45 percent in 1940.

The financial burdens, of which the Catholic hospitals relieve many whom they serve, are indicated not only by the figures on free service but also by the large proportion of persons who pay only part of the cost of hospital care. In the United States and Canada during 1940, 32 percent of all the patients served in the Catholic hospitals received care at partial cost. Thus, more than 58 percent of the patients hospitalized in the Catholic hospitals of the United States and Canada combined received free care or care at partial cost. In Canada, 72 percent of the patients received free or part-pay care.

Even this brief review of services rendered to the sick by the Catholic hospitals would not be complete without mention of the care given by these hospitals to nonhospitalized patients. Catholic hospitals have established extensive facilities for aiding such individuals. In the United States, 133 organized out-patient departments are recorded for Catholic hospitals; also, 314 hospitals have reported that they maintain emergency services and 268 that they operate facilities for the care of ambulatory patients. In Canada, the Catholic hospitals have 117 departments providing these services. These various kinds of out-patient facilities have given aid to a total of about one and three-quarter million sick persons in both the United States and Canada. Thus, it is quite apparent from even these few statistics that the Catholic hospitals are not unmindful of patients who need care but who do not require full hospital bed service.

Of all the hospitals operated by the various religious organizations, those operated by the Catholic Church are the most important from the standpoint of number and volume of services rendered to society. Not only are they important in this sense alone, but also because their services are not restricted to Catholics. It is noteworthy that of the total number of patients served in the Catholic hospitals of the United States in 1940, or in 1939, about 60 percent were non-Catholic patients. Since most of the Catholic hospitals of Canada are located in the Province of Quebec, which is predominantly Catholic, it is not surprising to find that only 39 percent of the patients in the Catholic hospitals of Canada were non-Catholics.

These few facts concerning the Catholic hospitals and their operation indicate that they have had and have a very important place in the provision of health services in the United States and Canada. Also, the Catholic hospitals have not only played an important part in providing medical care, but they also carry great responsibilities and are making large contributions in the training of medical personnel of all important types.

These brief and general considerations of Catholic hospital facilities and services must be supplemented by a few comments directed to the special problems of today. Speaking of our own country alone, it is quite obvious that the hospitals of the United States have a very important part in our preparedness program. And the Catholic hospitals, as the largest representative of church hospitals, will undoubtedly contribute to the medical preparedness problems of today as effectively as they have done in the past.

Not only will your hospitals contribute to the prevention and care of physical and mental ill-health; but just as important, if not more so, they will contribute to the enlargement of the medical, nursing, and other technical personnel so vital to our national well-being, especially in this time of national emergency.

At this time when many physicians are being called into the military services, it is of the utmost importance that they be replaced with well-trained physicians and that the supply of physicians be not only unimpeded but, if possible, even increased. The Catholic hospitals have rendered valuable service in the training of physicians through their participation with medical schools and through the many interneships and residencies available in these hospitals. There can be no question about the desirable continuance and expansion of these functions. One avenue of approach to increase their public service would be to see that all Catholic hospitals do everything within their capacity to meet high professional standards and thereby become qualified for the training of interns and residents.

The Federal Government is acutely aware of these needs and opportunities. I am confident it will endeavor to minimize the effects of defense requirements in interrupting the training and supply of physicians, or in reducing the opportunities of the hospitals for civilian service.

As some of you know, I have given much effort to the development, under the national-defense program, of an orderly policy to safeguard the education and training of medical students, and to assure a constant supply of trained physicians. I heretofore introduced in Congress a bill providing for the deferment of medical and dental students, interns, and resident physicians. I am, therefore, gratified to note that, as a result of hearings on that measure, Brig. Gen. Lewis B. Hershey, Deputy Director of Selective Service, on March 4 proclaimed a policy of deferment from military training of individual medical students, and also a qualified deferment of interns. In announcing the policy of deferring medical students, General Hershey recognized that there could be no replacements for students withdrawn from medical schools, and that, if the supply of medical students who are to be graduated into the medical profession is reduced through their induction to serve in nonprofessional capacities, an increasing reduction of physicians available for military service, as well as an aggravation of the increasing over-all national shortage, would result.

Our need for auxiliary medical personnel is also, or is likely to become, acute. In all these fields of education and training I am confident that our Catholic hospitals and institutions will give generous and wholehearted help.

The quality of the training which nurses have obtained in the nursing schools connected with Catholic hospitals has been of high order. I understand that these schools can substantially increase the number of students they undertake to train and that this subject is receiving careful attention. Judging by the past, we have good reason to assume that the Catholic hospitals will not only do their share in the training of additional nurses, but that they will also carefully review the services now performed by nurses and make whatever adjustments are necessary and practicable so that the professional skills of nurses may be utilized to the fullest.

Without a doubt, it will be feasible to increase the number of trained laboratory technicians and other technical personnel. Training of personnel is an important aspect of defense in which the Catholic hospitals can aid our nations.

Today, more than ever, it is important to view the work and the opportunities of hospitals from a broad perspective. It is not enough to serve only the immediate patients in the beds or in the out-patient facilities. It is necessary to utilize health-service opportunities in all their aspects. Every city, town, and village in our countries is affected by the health problems created by national-defense activities in addition to the health problems already there.

Nutrition, for example, is now being recognized as a major problem. Advances in knowledge concerning human nutrition which have been made in the past two or three decades should be made effective in the daily life of every family in our nations. The cooperation of the Catholic hospitals can be of great aid in spreading such knowledge through the programs of health education, dietetics, and effective family budgeting. We must recognize, of course, that it is not enough for our people to know what the right foods are; this alone will not assure physical and mental health and vigor. Nutritional knowledge is useless without a basic economic security or, in plain words, enough family income for the purchase of essential foods. So, a nutritional health program must be accompanied by sound measures for economic security to assure work and income and social security for the family.

In times of stress new health problems constantly arise. They must be met and solved. They will entail considerable scientific study and research. The well-equipped personnel and laboratories of the Catholic hospitals can render important service.

Health needs are particularly serious in those areas where defense activities are concentrating new or larger populations. In attacking the problems of sanitation, medical care, and public health—including the prevention and control of communicable disease and the special protection of mothers, children, and infants—there will be need in many areas for the extension and multiplication of public-health services. In other places it will be necessary to create entirely new services. And the special services, facilities, and programs designed to deal with health problems will need to be closely coordinated with educational, recreational, religious, and other activities.

The new industrial areas multiply manyfold our tasks in the field of industrial hygiene. To insure productivity for defense, not only is it necessary to have fair working conditions for the worker in regard to wages and hours, but also our factories and mines must be so operated that industrial accidents and diseases and industrial fatigue will be reduced to a minimum.

However, we must not concentrate so intently on the health problems arising from industrial and military projects that we neglect the health of civilians in our nations. Thus, for example, special attention must be given to the correction of physical defects in those young men who would otherwise be eligible for military service; yet it is equally important that we make adequate provision for the health needs of the civilian population to insure their fullest participation in the defense efforts of our nations. A considerable number of Catholic hospitals are located in the defense areas of the United States. These hospitals will, I am confident, play a strategic part in meeting the varied needs of these communities.

We must never forget that health is not a negative concept; it is positive; its fullest expression requires a well-rounded life. Therefore, those interested in promoting health must be fully aware of the importance of wholesome recreation. As you know, there has recently been established the United Service Organizations to provide for the leisure-time activities of defense workers and members of the armed forces. It is gratifying that the Catholic Hospital Association is a member of the National Catholic Community Service, a unit of the United Service Organizations.

I appreciate that I have dwelt at great length on the statistics of Catholic hospitals and other medical facilities, and I have indicated a few of the specific ways in which these hospitals and facilities can aid in the national-defense program. I am not unaware that statistics, though informative, do not usually form the basis of an entertaining address; and yet these simple facts and figures in relation to the origin, development, and expansion of Catholic hospitals in the United States and Canada are a truly inspiring story of cultural growth in our two countries. The self-sacrificing character and spiritual strength of the personnel of our Catholic hospitals needs no encomium from me. Facts speak more effectively and more eloquently than any mere words of mine.

In any final sense, service for the sick is primarily a spiritual undertaking. The devotion of your personnel, in the service of their fellow men, is the leaven that our nations need most of all to strengthen their activities toward the supreme goals of democratic and Christian living.

Food for Small Democracies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELMER THOMAS

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

ADDRESS BY RAYMOND S. RICHMOND

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD copy of an address delivered over the blue network of the National Broadcasting Co. on Saturday, June 21, by Raymond S. Richmond, secretary of the National Committee on Food for the Small Democracies. This address, entitled "Food for the Small Democracies," was part of the weekly farm and home period of the National Grange, which has endorsed the proposal for finding a formula through which millions of helpless and unarmed fellow humans in the small nations, overrun by the Germans, may be saved from starvation and subsequent pestilence. Mr. Richmond's address gives the essential factors relative to Senate Resolution No. 124, which was recently presented jointly by 37 Senators.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Millions of Americans are listening to this program in the comfort of well-ordered homes. Not far from their living room is the kitchen and in the kitchen it is probable there is a well-filled ice box. If any in this listening audience should feel even mildly hungry, that hunger can be satisfied by walking a few steps and opening the ice-box door.

Hunger in this land of plenty is something very transient. It is even something pleasant because it merely awaits satiation by the eating of the next meal. And in the United States there is always a next meal. No citizen of our country is starving or needs to starve. How fortunate our lot.

Let me give you a tragic—an appalling tragic—contrast. Millions are starving in the small invaded democracies as I talk. Theirs is a terrible gnawing hunger—a hunger they have absolutely no means of satisfying. They have no ice box, or if they have it is as empty as Mother Hubbard's cupboard.

MILLIONS THREATENED WITH STARVATION

The war in Europe has already slain its thousands. Starvation threatens to slay its millions. And back of starvation crouches the unfailing companion of mass malnutrition—pestilence.

In Belgium and Poland unarmed defenseless populations are starving. The food situation in these countries is tragically acute. It is hardly less acute in Norway. The Netherlands are beginning to feel the pinch. Finland, although not at war, has been intermittently blockaded. She is suffering extreme hardship. Some of these little countries import as high as 50 percent of their foodstuffs when life is normal there.

There is only one voice that can save these peoples. That is the voice of the American people. That voice is being raised in increasing volume. The starvation of these friendly small nations, who have always lived at peace with us, is something that cannot and must not be hushed.

Belgium, Poland, Norway, and the Netherlands are caught and helplessly pinioned between two mighty forces. One is the German invasion and the other is the British blockade.

Through no fault of theirs, millions of children, women, aged, and infirm in these small invaded countries are slipping day by day down toward the valley of the shadow of death. They cannot revolt. They haven't arms. They haven't the physical strength. If they are permitted to starve they will even lose the will to revolt. They must be saved. Hunger will not wait. While we, in the well-fed comfort of our homes, debate the rights and wrongs of Europe's devastation, these small invaded nations totter on the brink of the world's greatest mass catastrophe.

Millions of Americans are gravely concerned about the situation. They insist that something be done. A Nation-wide committee has been formed to enlighten the American public and to assist in finding a formula through which the lives of these helpless folk may be saved. This committee, of which Herbert Hoover is the honorary chairman and of which I have the honor to be secretary, has on its roster 900 outstanding citizens, representing every State in the Union. Back of the national committee are 4,000 local committees.

"GIVE US THIS DAY OUR DAILY BREAD"

This is not a pressure committee. Democrats and Republicans alike are united in common cause—the saving, rather than the destruction, of human life. In Congress its supporters are drawn from both parties. This is not a political question. The members of the Committee believe they are following the teachings of Holy Writ. "Give us this day our daily bread" is to these men and women of the committee more than just an isolated line from the Lord's Prayer. Forty million helpless people in the small invaded democracies are breathing that line from the prayer of prayers, with hope in their hearts, as they stretch out their hands to us in their desperate hour.

Will America, her granaries bursting with burdensome food surpluses—surpluses so great that they constitute an economic liability—hear the piteous plea of these small peoples, who are not our enemies, but our loyal friends?

There are those who want to go to war to rescue these peoples from the invader. There are those who, while wanting to save these peoples, are willing to starve them in the meantime, which is a curious paradox. They say the food blockade is Great Britain's chief weapon. They contend that any system of food relief will aid Hitler. They believe Germany is being starved out. Let us examine, in the cold light of reason, these contentions.

If the intention of the blockade is to starve Germany, that weapon is falling on the just and not on the unjust. It is clear that Germany is 88 percent self-sufficient in foodstuffs. It is Germany's victims, Great Britain's allies, who are starving. Yesterday I talked with an American who has just returned from Berlin. He tells me that while there are no table delicacies to be had in Germany, none there are near starvation or are likely to be. True, the meals are uninteresting, but they are meals and they sustain life at a reasonable level. So much for the effect of the blockade on Germany.

It may well be that Germany has a moral and ethical obligation to feed the conquered peoples. Does anyone expect the German military machine to be motivated by morals or ethics? None of us are that naive. Germany's moves are plotted and charted in Germany's interest alone.

DIFFICULTIES CAN BE OVERCOME

Millions of Americans believe that agreements can be reached between the belligerent governments and representatives of the captive democracies, whereby the starving in these countries can be fed without benefit to Germany or without in any way impairing Great Britain's heroic defense. If agreements are reached, and they are violated by Germany, the experiment can be stopped and the everlasting onus for mass starvation will not then rest on Great Britain and her blockade and the United States with her enormous food surpluses. And the whole world knows we have these life-saving surpluses.

The National Committee on Food for the Small Democracies recently made a proposal for a trial feeding in Belgium through which 3,000,000 children, women, and unemployed men would be fed on the spot by soup kitchens. This trial feeding would require monthly 25,000 tons of breadstuffs and 20,000 tons of meat, fats, beans, peas, and rice for soup materials and milk and cocoa for children.

The Germans have agreed to furnish the soup kitchens the 25,000 tons of breadstuffs monthly. They have agreed to refrain from requisitioning imported and native food supplies. They have agreed not to attack mercy ships. The 20,000 tons per month of soup materials needed is definitely not available on the Continent of Europe, and must be imported through the food blockade. All of Europe is experiencing a destructive shortage of fats. To date the British Government has declined to lift the blockade to let the 20,000 tons of soup materials get through to these starving friends of theirs and ours.

It is proposed that the trial feeding be administered by a neutral commission, which would safeguard the guaranties. Under the trial-feeding plan there would be no large supply of foodstuffs on hand at any one time. If the Germans violated their agreement, the German Nation could not possibly benefit from a military standpoint and the experiment could be abandoned forthwith.

American ships need not be used in transporting supplies to the stricken countries. There is neutral shipping available from unembroiled nations.

DEMOCRACIES NOT ASKING FOR CHARITY

These people are not asking for American charity, unless compassion itself is the highest form of charity. They want to buy our food with their money. The exiled Belgian Government has funds with which to finance the test feeding and has indicated its willingness to use those funds on behalf of its people. Further, the Belgian Government has urged the British to permit the test feeding.

The Netherlands and Norway have money to finance the feeding of their starving citizens.

Some funds may be needed for Poland, where there has been a limited feeding of 50,000 children under way for many months. This operation has been conducted by the Commission for Polish Relief, Inc., an American body. The Polish commission has sustained its work through occasional small grants from the Polish Government and through voluntary subscriptions on the part of Americans of Polish ancestry, of whom there are several million in the United States. I do want to make it absolutely clear that the American public will not be asked to raise money for these test feedings. America is asked to raise its voice to the end that the pending mass tragedy may be averted. Time after time Mr. Hoover, as the guiding spirit of the food committee, has been appealed to by the exiled governments and by prominent and trustworthy citizens in the countries involved to continue his efforts to save them.

GENERAL PERSHING AND ADMIRAL PRATT APPROVE PLAN

Let me enlarge for a few moments on the statement that the feeding of these starving captive peoples can be accomplished without military gain for the Germans. I am going to give you the exact statements made by two men who should know. The first is Gen. John J. Pershing, our World War commander. He said recently:

"I wish to send my greetings to those who are endeavoring to find a method by which food supplies can be furnished to the democracies in Europe occupied by the German armies. There is no doubt millions are in jeopardy unless they are given aid from somewhere. From my own war experience and some knowledge of the problems involved, I have every confidence that the salvation of these people can be worked out along the lines proposed by Mr. Hoover without military loss or benefit on either side. The interest of this committee in maintaining American ideals and the friendship to America of these nations by saving these millions is worthy of every support."

Admiral William V. Pratt, who dealt with the blockade in the past war and who long commanded the United States fleet, said:

"I have no hesitation in saying that this aid can be given under Mr. Hoover's proposals without any damage to Great Britain. Taking the long view of the future of constructive forces in the world and America's relation to it, it is of vital importance to America that Mr. Hoover's plans be carried through. Not only is the need pressing now, but what is of equal or more importance, an organization must be perfected now to start a more extensive campaign when this war is over. Only America will be able to meet this emergency."

There is now pending before the Senate of the United States Senate Resolution No. 124, dealing in full with this tragic problem. The resolution was presented recently by Senator ELMER THOMAS of Oklahoma on behalf of himself and 36 other Senators. The resolution has been referred to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, of which the distinguished Senator WALTER F. GEORGE is chairman.

The resolved section of the resolution recites:

"Resolved, That the Senate of the United States does express the conviction that immediate steps should be taken to formulate some plan to prevent this impending tragedy of mass starvation in the various countries heretofore named, by the institution of a system of complete guardianship of relief guaranties through some neutral agency or government; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Senate of the United States, through the Secretary of State, endeavors as quickly as possible to work out, in cooperation with the British Government and the accredited representatives of the other governments concerned, the setting up of systematic and definite relief for all stricken and hungry countries, beginning with Belgium, where the need is now the most acute; this relief to be based on agreements by the belligerents for the protection of the native and imported food supplies, with rigid safeguarding of such relief so that no military advantage whatever may accrue to the civil populations or the armed forces of the invading nations."

MANY SENATORS FAVOR PROPOSAL

Millions of Americans hope this resolution will be favorably reported out of the Committee on Foreign Relations and that it will be adopted by the Senate at an early date. We know the resolution has tremendous support in the Senate as well as throughout the country. If you agree that we must try to do something to save the lives of these people it would be helpful if you would make your own compassionate feeling known by writing your own Senators and Congressman.

Unless something is done to save these people, democracy on the Continent of Europe is forever doomed. These people are our friends. They subscribe to our pattern of life. Up to the limit of their abilities they have tried to hold aloft the torch of freedom and the ideal of respect for the rights of their fellow man.

AMERICA MUST NOT FAIL THEM

We dare not fail these little countries. If we coldly turn our backs on their plight, their belief in us will wither and die and the mothers and fathers of babies who perish, and others who grow up with horrible malformations, will excoriate us through many decades to come. Our alleged compassion and mercy will be a bitter myth to them.

The wounds of war can be healed, but the wounds resulting from a cold-blooded and callous policy of starvation will never heal. By raising our strong voice on behalf of our helpless European friends we can keep alive in their hearts their belief in God and His mercy. We can prove to these little nations again, and for all time, that the spirit of democracy embraces justice, mercy, and compassion, and that, therefore, democracy deserves continued life on this troubled globe.

Flag Day Address

OF

HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

EXCERPTS FROM ADDRESS BY CHARLES MOYNIHAN

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, Charles Moynihan, a well-known Montrose attorney, is perhaps the most eloquent orator in Colorado. On Saturday, June 14, Flag Day, he delivered an inspiring address at Rifle, Colo., in which he paid a stirring tribute to the flag of flags. I should like to have excerpts from that address printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, where Members of Congress and others might enjoy them.

Mr. Moynihan points out the futility of converting to our thoughts peoples who have no conception of nor desire for our traditional idealism. He apparently feels, too, that our boasted "arsenal of democracy" ought to be something more substantial than a pretty phrase; that, instead, it consist of arms, airplanes, tanks, and ships, and, furthermore, that it be conserved for peoples who are not only fighting to preserve democracy as we know it but who are also already converted to the ideals of the democracy which we espouse. Mr. Moynihan points out quite effectively that we "speak forcefully" to "totalitarian states armed to the teeth" only when forceful words are backed by a club behind the door.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MOYNIHAN GIVES FLAG DAY TALK AT RIFLE TODAY

We assemble today to give a tribute of veneration to the flag of our country. These services are for the purpose of giving the citizenship of America an opportunity to refresh their homage to an emblem of the deepest spiritual and patriotic significance.

That flag is not merely a combination of colors. It is a symbol, in every fiber of which is written the historical background of the struggles of our forefathers to provide for us the form of government we today enjoy. It symbolizes a group of hardy people who were willing to suffer the hardships of a dangerous voyage to reach an unknown shore where shelter and food had to be produced from the wild countryside—all in order that the dignity of the individual could be developed and preserved; where religion was to be a matter of conscience between the individual and his God; where the decree of kings was subordinated to the deliberate voice of the people; freedom of speech and of the press were to become the inalienable rights of the citizen.

It symbolizes a constitution wherein were written the proven truths of almost 300 years of colonial laboratorial experience; a national independence that by trial and error the universals of human rights, of human privileges could be vindicated.

It symbolizes a nation preserved from disunity as a result of a great Civil War.

It symbolizes a free expression of the spirit of private enterprise, with the result that by the exercise of human energy and ingenuity the highest standard of living the world has ever known is everywhere available in America to the man who will work and save.

Government under our theory was to be the agent of man and to reflect the humanitarian sentiments of the average citizen to the end that he could live together with his fellows in a spirit of peace, tolerance, and human consideration, so that he could dwell in a country where free speech, freedom of press, and freedom of religion were to represent the foundation stones of an unusual endeavor, inspired by human beings for the primary benefit of the individual citizen.

After many experiments a flag was finally designed for the purpose of symbolizing not only the enveloping accomplishments of the forefathers but the efforts of each succeeding generation to fulfill the creed which had always been that of the founders and disciples of America. The flag was to be an altar of devotion.

I repeat today no detailed history of our country's past. That is well known to all of us. Hate, suffering, poverty, and an inclination to murder fellow human beings and crush the highest ideals of individual dignity and self-preservation which it has taken centuries to acquire, like a drifting cloud, afflicts the world of the present; and so today we find a fear complex surging like an hallucination inspired by the wrath of God, filling our hearts with fear, and muddling our minds with confusion.

We see the purpose and spirit of democracy crushed and denied over a greater portion of the world. We see the forces of totalitarianism and dictatorships rushing like mad molochs, scattering anguish, blood, human destruction, and death with increasing severity, and continuing the invasion of areas where human rights had theretofore been recognized and enforced by established law, and taken for granted as much as the air we breathe.

The essential realities of democracy are a combination of law, equality, and justice. A totalitarian state has none of these, and hence is the worst of all possible states.

Many of the younger members of our generation were born under an unlucky star, because during their formative period we paid little attention to these characteristics, and particularly to the fact that each thereof was merely an approximation of the weaknesses and prejudices of the average citizen.

Thomas Jefferson fully recognized this during a period of scanty population and before inventions had made possible the congestion of people in large urban centers, when he uttered with the fervor of a prophet:

"My God! How little do my countrymen know what precious blessings they are in possession of, and of which no other people on earth enjoy."

The forces of totalitarianism cannot last because they are not human; they are not moral; their way is not the spiritual way. No matter what men think, the human heart is the compass which controls the direction of a human being's longing for a high destiny.

As people we are so apt to become discouraged over trends and events about us that are not fatal in themselves.

After all, devoted and patriotic as we are to our America, we should not fail to remember that it is impossible for us to convert peoples and nations whose traditional thoughts for centuries have been different from ours. While America may be the "arsenal of democracy," it is my judgment that she cannot serve any purpose other than to cooperate with like-minded peoples to preserve our great political ark of the covenant. A citizen of Australia can talk with citizens of Canada, New Zealand, the United States, with citizens of Scotland, Wales, or England with an understanding for the simple reason that Anglo-Saxon civilization is like-minded in its major purpose: The dignity and development of the individual's rights. Beyond this it is too much to hope that we can command the peoples of other nations to change their minds, or to adhere to theories and aspirations foreign to their traditions and backgrounds.

No matter what the status of nations is, I realize that old orders change, but I also know that new orders change, too. Only one thing never changes—the human heart. Revolutions and ideologies may lacerate it, even break it, but they cannot change its essence. After fascism, and communism, and socialism, and capitalism are over and forgotten as completely as slavery in the old South, the human heart will still be clamoring for the old things it wept for in the Garden of Eden—love and a chance to live, a chance to adore something, somewhere, somehow.

If we but realize this, the whispering comments of our heart today will give us the faith we need to seek constantly the fixed star of human hopes which never fades and never becomes nonexistent. The clouds may hide it for a moment, but it is still there. So long as it exists our faith must be stronger than the darkness which temporarily obstructs our vision.

In our present dilemma there are two or three things the unofficial citizenship of our America ought to know. From the standpoint of mechanical equipment, is America today in truth and in fact the "arsenal of democracy"? To what extent have we progressed in completing the manufacture of arms, airplanes, tanks, etc., to be prepared to meet an attack? Whatever else may be argued, the truth is that we must recognize realities. Totalitarian Germany is literally armed to the teeth, and because of that fact no nation and no combination of nations has been able to thwart or for any length of time obstruct either her attack or her advance. What is the state of our preparedness? If it is such that we are ready for war, we may speak forcefully.

Theodore Roosevelt said once we should speak softly but carry a big stick. There is much in his philosophy. If we are prepared, we do not need to boast. Our ample preparedness will be known and will protect us. If we are unprepared, we are like the dog which bays the moon to no purpose other than to hear the sound of his own barking.

Morgenthau Magic!

EDITORIAL FROM THE SIOUX FALLS (S. DAK.) DAILY ARGUS-LEADER

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, as Congress is about to be confronted with one of the largest and most sacrifice-compelling tax bills ever to be proposed, the entire country is at long last becoming interested in the methods by which taxes can be prevented from becoming confiscatory in nature. America is awakening to the stark reality that, after all, Uncle Sam does not pick his money off from bushes or pump it out of wells but that he really does exact it "from the sweat of the man who toils."

Consequently, the following editorial written by Fred C. Christopherson of the Daily Argus Leader, published in Sioux Falls, S. Dak., is especially timely and telling. His analysis of the miraculous method by which Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau proposes to reduce the tax burden for us all merits a most careful reading in view of the fact that there are still many old-fashioned citizens of the horse and buggy era in this country who have the antiquated, pre-New Deal theory in the backs of their minds that the way to reduce taxes is to spend less money.

This new formula for escaping the sting of the tax collector should give special cause for rejoicing to all Americans who still believe in Santa Claus, or who hope to provide dairy products for the undernourished by feeding them rich slices of the cheese from which they think the moon is made.

MORGENTHAU MAGIC

In order to promote public understanding of the sale of defense bonds now under way, the United States Treasury has prepared a series of informative questions and answers.

Idly thumbing through these, we encountered the following oddity:

"Q. By buying all the defense bonds I can afford and then some, do I do anything to keep taxes down?

"A. Yes. If you will do this and influence all your friends to do this, you will produce a great effect. The more money raised by borrowing, the less need be raised by taxation."

Alice in Wonderland couldn't have done better than that. Evidently our Treasury is living in a fantastic world of make-believe—a delightful paradise where we can eat our cake and have it too.

Surely Secretary Morgenthau and his aides must be gifted with some extraordinary power. They promise the millennium and the normally impossible.

Such magic. Such a beautiful world of finance into which we are invited.

We buy defense bonds. In return the Government will pay interest and in due course retire the principal. And yet this operation will reduce the necessity for additional taxes.

To say that that is remarkable is to put it mildly. We never appreciated before just how wise Secretary Morgenthau is.

We wonder, however, why he stops where he does. Why not eliminate taxes entirely by selling more bonds to the people? The more bonds that are sold, he says, the lower the taxes will be.

Then, too, why be selfish about it? Why not impart the secret of this perfectly grand method to the Governors, the mayors, and the others who are associated with tax-levying bonds? Why must we pay any taxes?

Evidently our own Governor Bushfield, our own Mayor John McKee, our own county commissioners, and our own board of education are hopelessly benighted. They are so old-fashioned that they believe in levying taxes to obtain the money required for public purposes.

How silly! How absurd! Why don't they just sell bonds to the people as Secretary Morgenthau is doing? If the people buy enough bonds, as the surely wise Secretary informs us, they won't be required to pay taxes.

But that's too perfect, too ideal. There must be a flaw somewhere. We remember that once upon a time the State of South Dakota sold a lot of bonds. But it didn't work out in quite the way that Secretary Morgenthau now suggests. In due course we had to repay the bonds along with the interest. It so happened, as the statistics show, that we didn't reduce the necessity for new taxes. In fact, we expanded it. We were compelled to levy taxes not only for the principal of the bonds but the interest as well. In some cases the interest accumulated so largely that we paid back eventually as much as $2 for each $1 that we borrowed.

European War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. GERALD P. NYE, OF NORTH DAKOTA

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address which I delivered over the Columbia Broadcasting System on last Saturday evening.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The people of the United States could, if they would, stage a demonstration of determination to keep out of Europe's war that would make certain our noninvolvement. There is but one condition preventing such a demonstration. That condition is the continuing success with which foreign and domestic propagandists have convinced or caused millions of Americans to entertain something of conviction that our entry into the war is an inevitable thing.

This condition is not as discouraging as it might be, for the reason that this defeatist attitude is waning, that people are gradually coming to realize that the thought of inevitability is planted and nursed by forces with the most selfish kind of purposes to serve—incidentally, purposes to be ultimately served not by themselves but by the sons and purses of 100,000,000 and more of Americans unless those Americans quickly awaken to the need for a united front against war.

The oft expressed and repeated thoughts that "the President's conduct of our foreign policy has been such as to make our staying out of the war impossible," or that "we've gone so far now that we cannot stop," or that simple thought that "we just can't stop it now; it's too late," are so exceedingly shallow that the people must, given time, quickly discover themselves to be but the victims of propaganda in which they themselves unwittingly become a participant.

Getting into this war is not inevitable for America. It is as fair to say that our staying out of the war is inevitable. Indeed, it is fairer to assert the latter, since the desire to stay out is so overwhelming on the part of the American people. Yet this overwhelming majority has let the interventionist minority plant the defeatist thoughts to an extent which was, at one stage, carrying our country to the precipice of war.

Getting into this return engagement of war to Europe is only as inevitable as we, the people of America, will permit it to be. Staying out of this war is inevitable if only the people will continue and multiply their forceful demands upon the Government at Washington to keep its promise to the people to keep our country out of this mess which seems destined to wreck every civilization that lends its hand to it. It would be well at the same time if the people would politely suggest that the same Government at Washington cease its almost daily issuance of engraved invitations to all the rest of the world for trouble and war.

If a sizable proportion of American fathers, mothers, sons, and daughters who deeply sense the consequences of our involvement in the war were to make their views and demands heard by their letters to their Congressmen, their Senators, and their President, the door to the chance of our involvement would be closed quickly and tightly. Squelching the defeatist attitude will bring this result.

We cannot help but observe how an awakened people have improved upon the chance to stay out of war in the very recent weeks. Those millions who have conquered the defeatist complex have brought about magnificent changes, changes in spite of newspapers, fireside chats, cabinet speeches, and a virtual blitzkrieg of propaganda to drive us to war. The result is an amazing demonstration of how successfully democracy can operate if only the people will themselves play their rightful part in the conduct of that democracy by making known their wishes and interests. Democracy falls down only when the people it is presumed to serve ignore their own responsibility to it. Democracy fails when a small minority, such as are the American interventionists, can convince a great majority, such as are the American noninterventionists, that the only way we can have unity in this country is to follow the wishes of the minority.

Following passage of the lend-lease bill there was good reason to believe that the chance of staying out of Europe's war was next door to being insignificant. The march to war by the interventionists had been and continued to be so rapid as to make it seem quite impossible to even halt for a brief moment the tramping feet and rolling drums of war. But the small chance that remained of staying out was used, first by a few, then more and even more of Americans, until today, in spite of what we see and hear each day, the chance of staying out has been multiplied to a degree that causes many of us to feel that it is better than a 50–50 chance. But this degree of chance will continue and increase only as the people will continue and increase pouring their wishes and their expectations in letters to their Representatives and especially the President. The interventionist hope in this hour is that the people will let up in their splendid effort and leave to them, the organized interventionists, the exclusive ear of the President who shapes our foreign policy.

These interventionists had the President fooled plenty up until a few weeks ago. They alone were sending their letters and telegrams supporting each step that took us nearer to war. The masses of people were filing their prayers with Congress. The President could not draw any conclusion other than that the people were with him in the moves he made; his mail proved it to his own satisfaction. When the people got onto the interventionist game and started expressing their views to the President, he sat up with a start; was, some say, bewildered to a point that caused him to send agents out over the country to try to sense the real pulse of the people. It was no doubt this expression of feeling by overwhelming numbers that caused the canceling of a fireside chat and that caused the President to back up the day after he made his recent public address in which people were given to feel that he was going to ask repeal of the neutrality laws and undertake convoys in spite of his promise to the contrary.

Ah, democracy does work when the people contribute their part to its operation and decline to let a minority rule the day by instilling a defeatist complex in the majority.

Defeatism on the part of the people is not going to be as fully squelched as it should be, however, until people will stop to do more thinking and pause long enough to let truth have its hour in times when propaganda has so much of fiction which selfish ones would make the base for American judgment and decision. I am sure there has never been so devastating a line of fiction laid down upon which to base a most serious decision as is that line of fiction planted by those who would have us in this present war. Have a look at some of this fiction:

First. Much circulation is given the story published by a British aviation machine to the effect that Germany and Italy have developed types of bombers capable of successfully attacking our eastern seaboard, or, with bases at Dakar, capable of attacking the Panama Canal. This is fantasy, pure and simple. American aviation authorities will acknowledge that the Germans have a type of plane capable of flying from Germany to New York, but carrying and dropping a bomb of only 10 or 12 pounds, but unable to fly back to its base after it dumped its "firecracker."

Second. Then we have the fairy tale about how utterly dependent is our American future upon the British Navy. When we are really thinking and not just letting someone plant convictions for our adoption without any thinking, we know full well that through the lifetime of our Nation the only navy that we've had to build against in a large way—the only navy that has successfully operated in an aggressive way against North, South, or Central America—has been the same British Navy.

Third. The fiction that a Hitler victory in Europe would be followed by a Hitler invasion of America is too silly for words. If we will use our defense dollars for defense, we can finish Hitler and all his associates before they get within sight of America, even if they combine in the operation to invade. Right here let me suggest that there should well be a unity of mind on this issue of American defense, however. Our defense needs are multiplied each day if we would prepare for the very worst that might develop out of these pending wars, for President Roosevelt has been overlooking no opportunity for the past 2 or 3 years to shake the American fist at virtually every power on earth, and this at a time when it would have been smart to try to make a few friends instead of all enemies for ourselves.

Fourth. The livest bit of fiction afloat at the present time, it seems to me, is that to the effect that if the old order in Europe does not continue to prevail, then we are doomed to loss of our foreign trade, to trade isolation. Normally, our foreign trade constitutes between 3 and 6 percent of our total economic dependence. If we are any good at all, we can increase our American consumption to a sufficient degree to take up the slack if we had to lose all our foreign trade. But why must we conclude that there is even a chance for loss of our foreign trade? Come what will to Europe and Asia, they are going to need some things that we can supply more economically than anyone else. We will need some things that they can supply. We'll go on trading. Bernard Baruch, answering the suggestion of a totalitarian victory as a challenge to us commercially, recently declared (though his declaration found very few news outlets) that the United States can undersell the totalitarians in the world markets, and that it would be Germany and not the United States that would be "on the spot" in the event of a complete German victory. Incidentally, wouldn't we do well in this hour to remember that our severest competitor in the field of foreign trade has always been Great Britain with her control over the trade channels over the earth?

Fifth. Fiction? Look to that which would have us join with Britain in a policy and program of stopping and destroying the aggressor nations. The pages of the last three centuries of history are overflowing with the accounts of military aggression accomplishing the building of the most titanic empire of all time—the British Empire. As recently as 1937 Britain was bombing civilian populations in Arabia in order to accomplish British dominance there. And we would make Britain our ally in stopping aggressor nations. What preposterous fiction.

Sixth. Fiction is the base for a lot of thinking over here these days, but none of it compares with that thought that if we'll just take a hand in this pending war on the British side, we can win and save freedom of the seas again and make impossible more Robin Moor incidents. What folly. What utter deception that lets this thought be encouraged. We acknowledged after the last war that in time of war there was no such thing as freedom of the seas. Congress wrote laws acknowledging this. President Roosevelt gave lip service to support of these laws.

Freedom of the seas went by the board in 1919 when, at Versailles, Woodrow Wilson failed to win a consideration for No. 2 of his 14 points. Who smothered this honest Wilson effort to win freedom of the seas after Europe was done with her last war? None other than England and France. They wouldn't give the cause or theory a chance. Read what Lloyd George and Winston Churchill wrote in their books covering the peace conference about freedom of the seas. Why, they wouldn't tolerate freedom of the seas. What they wanted was what they had always had, namely, freedom of the seas for Britain, sovereignty and dominance over the seas by Britain. Will we now let ourselves be moved to war again, this time to help Britain win freedom of the seas? Minister Eden may go on contending that Britain is fighting for freedom of the seas and for the four other eloquent freedoms which the President is declaring it American purpose to deliver to all the world in our own time and generation, but for my own part, I'm inclined to listen to the British statesmen who denied us freedom of the seas when they had it to give but bluntly refused it.

I find no pleasure in saying these things at this time. While Britain stands courageously in her battle against the forces which would destroy her, I would find it much more pleasant to overlook and forget the fiction about which I have spoken were it not for the fact that the future of my own country was so largely dependent upon what we did with this fiction. America's grave need in this hour is for a substitution of fiction by truth, truth we all acknowledge when we let the record instead of propaganda have our ear.

Thus far there has been no substantial offering to demonstrate that the causes involved in the present war are different than those which have plagued Europeans for generations. They are the same causes that fooled us once before into unending costs, burdensome debt, depression, heartbreak, and hospitals filled with men, many of whom wish they hadn't come back from over there; the same causes America helped the Allies to win, only to be told afterward that we hadn't done our full part, when they full well knew that we had more boys fighting in France than Britain had during the concluding war months, and only to hear ourselves called Uncle Shylock. The cause abroad today is the age-old cause of determining who shall dominate Europe; this time, shall it be Britain or Germany. I'm frank to confess that it would seem easier to get along in a world where the prevailing order continued because we never easily accommodate ourselves to the possible necessity of change. But the chance or danger of change does not merit the pitching by the United States of her young blood, her wealth, and her energies into so futile a cause as is a European war, especially when we so well know that even though we might help to win a war over there we can't inflict a peace to our liking after the war is won. Thomas Jefferson put it well when he said:

"For us to attempt to reform all Europe and bring them back to principles of morality, and a respect for the equal rights of nations would show us to be only maniacs of another character."

If it be thought that Jefferson is out of date, and that he had no right to tell we of 1941 what was right and wrong, then let us turn to a more modern American who dresses this fine Jefferson theory in modern garb; listen to Dr. Wilbur, president of Stanford University.

"If anyone believes the American people can go out and force other nations around to our way of thinking, that person has a Hitler complex."

Fiction, hate, fear, and uncontrolled emotions can be our complete undoing if we Americans don't more largely guard against drifting back into pitfalls from which the patriots of 1776 freed us. Isolation of the right kind has built America to the point of greatness and happiness above all nations. That is the Washington and Jefferson kind of isolation—isolation from the hates, fears, jealousies, power politics and wars of Europe. None will deny this, that such isolation has been exceedingly good for us, and that it hasn't hurt Europe. None will deny this, that our nearest approach to disaster accompanied our ignoring of the Washington kind of isolation and returning for a taste of those European bitters back in 1917-18. Why haven't we learned better the lessons which far-seeing fathers and experience have tried so hard to teach us? Shall we let fearmongers convince us that this present European war is really our war?

By the way, whose war is it anyway?

We dig up $7,000,000,000 as a first installment in our lending and leasing of Britain's war to make it unnecessary for Britain to spend of her own wealth to make purchase of such materials as she needs from us. We call it the lend-lease program. In Canada, a part of Britain, at war, they haven't thought of a lend-lease program and get from Britain cash on the barrel head for what they sell to Britain.

We go on selling oil to Japan—without which Japan couldn't last very long with her undertaking in China—while Secretary Ickes threatens gasless Sundays in America.

The Food Minister for Britain asks us to inaugurate creamless days in the United States so there can be more butter and cheese for Britain. A few days later Secretary Wickard urges Americans to eat less cheese.

And while all this goes on, the Canadian Travel Bureau, inviting us to come to Canada for our vacations, advertises in the New York Times of June 8 as follows:

"It is easy to enter and to leave Canada; there is absolutely no rationing of food."

Whose war is this anyway?

Well, in spite of all the effort of some to make it seem like our war, it still very definitely is not our war. And it seems rather certain that the sooner we let the world know that we don't plan to be in it, then the quicker will come whatever kind of peace is to be had in Europe and an end to the madness that besets them over there. If Britain finds she cannot finish and win this war which she herself declared, let her ascertain and advise us what kind of a peace is available before she asks and expects us to pour blood and more wealth into her defense. We are certainly entitled to a more truthful statement of reasons and principles than has yet been afforded. We need far more than a mere echo by Anthony Eden of President Roosevelt's four freedoms and freedom of the seas.

Whatever emergency confronts our country today is pretty largely home-made. The President, since his quarantine speech, has gone out of his way to challenge virtually every power on earth. That gives us an additional defense obligation, an emergency to be sure, but this doesn't of itself call for such attitude as that demonstrated by the President in his Friday message to Congress, his effort to be spectacular in closing the offices of German consuls in this country, or the feverish effort to instill fear in the American heart while he assures us that the only thing we need fear is fear itself.

If the President and the interventionists have failed to sell their emergency to the people it doesn't follow that we must be blitzkrieged and incidented into war hostilities and bad temper. The truth is they have not been able to sell the people this war abroad, however much the people are ready to accept the need for a large defense program. The people will respond to reason but they are without the sufficient reason to believe they are getting defense out of these mad hours of talking and spending. The kind of a sales talk the people need is one of more frankness than leadership has yet afforded.

In light of what Woodrow Wilson encountered in his effort to win freedom of the seas, it is nothing short of childish to be trying to make a national fire of the Robin Moor incident.

Perhaps we do not know the reasons for the Presidential moves in closing the German consular offices, in which event frankness would help in this hour when there is so much reason to believe that the German representatives here have been guilty of nothing more than what British agents from Halifax on down have been guilty of, namely, propagandizing America. (Incidentally, it is with some rejoicing that we see the German propaganda here ended. It will leave the interventionists without chance to charge American opposition to involvement in the war to Nazi propaganda. And if we could be freed from the British propaganda we could get down to some real American thinking again.)

There is too much reason to believe that all of this bluster by Washington is only intended to build a psychology that will break down the determination with which the people of this country are opposing our further involvement in the war. At times one wonders how large may have been the promises made to Europe by spokesmen like Bullitt and Donovan. If there are commitments which the President feels binding he must be everlastingly reminded of the commitments he has made to the American people to stay out of this war. And it will be well to remember that the promises by Bullitt and Donovan, if promises were made, have been in every case kisses of death.

Before we let ourselves be moved any deeper into Europe's war, let us try to get values straight. Those values were splendidly defined by the patriots who warned against involvement in the wars and politics of Europe. What Britain would have us do today is definitely what Britain would not do for us if we were in her shoes. Indeed, British statesmen have made Britain's policy doubly clear.

Lord Palmerston has said: "England has no eternal enmities and no eternal friendships. She has only eternal interests." Not bad policy for our own pronouncement.

The following sounds for all the world like George Washington, but its real author is Winston Churchill. Hear him: "We must be safe from undue foreign pressure. We cannot confine the safety of our country to the passions or the panic of any foreign nation which may be facing some desperate crisis."

We need to readopt this advice for ourselves. And we need to be done with the foolery of foreign voices which would have us fighting for most uncertain causes. For instance, here was Lord Beaverbrook, in 1938, saying of Hitler:

"There is no man living whose promise given in regard to something of real moment I would sooner take. He is simple, unaffected, and obviously sincere. He is supremely intelligent."

And, on Armistice Day in 1938 we found Mr. Churchill saying:

"I have always said that if Great Britain were defeated in war I hoped we should find a Hitler to lead us back to our rightful position among the nations."

Beaverbrook and Churchill are the same men who today would have us fighting because this same Hitler is a madman, insincere, unintelligent, a man whose word is worth nothing.

Come, America, let's get back to earth while there is still time to save the things we cherish. If we are determined to commit suicide we can do it much more cheaply and cleanly by another plan. Poison can be had at less than 10 cents per dose to do the job on 130,000,000 people, entailing a total cost of only $13,000,000, if we must insist upon wiping ourselves out of the world.

This is the hour for real courage, the kind every American was born with, the kind that lets us stand up and fight every move that would take us nearer to war. Let's be ready for more incidents, ready to tell the President and the interventionists that these incidents must not involve the lives of the people of America so long as they remain incidents we appear to be inviting through our spokesmen.

Let there be an end to fear and fiction, acknowledgment that our defense line is where it has always been, not in Europe. And let us have a functioning by Americans that forces Government to be representative of views and wishes of the great majority.

It is the duty and right of Americans to speak out. No reflection attaches to one who will speak out; for, after all, this is no contest to determine the future of any banner or cause other than our own—no contest to ascertain what Americans love Britain most or hate Hitler most. It is alone a contest to bring a united front in support of America and her future.

Russia and the Four Freedoms

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD H. BURTON

OF OHIO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT A. TAFT, OF OHIO

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address by my colleague [Mr. TAFT], delivered over the Columbia Broadcasting System on June 25, as to Russia and the Four Freedoms.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Are we going to get in the war? And if so, when? Those are the questions which every American, certainly every American in Washington, is asking. I have often stated the reasons why I believe that it would be contrary to the future welfare and happiness of the people of this country for us to intervene in the war now proceeding between Germany and the British Empire; that it would mean war for many years to come, with all its terrible results. Those reasons are not shaken by the surprising war between Germany and Russia. I believe they are greatly strengthened.

There can be no doubt that a great majority of the American people are opposed to our going outside of this continent to make war on a nation which has not attacked us, no matter how wicked that nation is. But there is an active war party and I do not mean to identify that with either political party, which has urged one argument after another upon the people in a frank effort to change their convictions and develop an excitement and hysteria for war.

First it was said that we must go to war now for fear that Hitler will later overwhelm the world and conquer the United States. The force of this argument has steadily declined until today hardly a military or naval expert claims that Hitler can successfully attack the United States across the Atlantic Ocean. I notice that even the President is laying little stress on this argument today. There has been some question raised as to whether we were going to have all of our defenses ready in time to meet any possible attack. The Russian war certainly postpones for many months any attack which Hitler could possibly make; and makes even more certain a defense of the United States sufficient to discourage any military or naval attack.

As for foreign trade, I have often pointed out that the danger to our trade, which the President now emphasizes, is grossly exaggerated. I do not believe the American people will ever go to war against a European nation on the theory that some day it may be a successful competitor for foreign trade. If Germany controls Russia, it will reduce the Nazi interest in securing South American raw materials rather than increase it.

But fundamentally the effort to persuade the people of the United States to enter the war has been made on emotional and moral grounds. It has been an effort to build a war upon the American love of democracy and freedom and the American hatred of the things for which Hitler stands in Europe. I yield to no one either in my love for freedom or my hatred of Hitler. But there are two great objections to waging an aggressive war outside of a nation's territory for love or hate, or any other moral issue.

First, the method proposed, war, destroys the very morality which we seek to uphold. In his January address the President announced that we were going to establish a moral order throughout the world; freedom of speech and expression everywhere in the world; freedom to worship God everywhere in the world; freedom from want and freedom from fear everywhere in the world. No one can deny the desirability of spreading democratic principles and these four freedoms to every corner of the world; but it is obvious that the forcing of any special brand of freedom and democracy on a people by the brute force of war, whether they want it or not, is a denial of those very democratic principles which we are striving to advance. It is a revival of the slogan of the World War that we must make the world safe for democracy, which the World War certainly did not do. It is a belief in our divine appointment to reform the world. It is akin to the religious fervor which inspired the Holy Land crusades of the Middle Ages. It is exactly the reasoning by which the Spanish Inquisition enforced Christianity on infidels who preferred to believe in other gods.

The complete absurdity of going to war even to spread our highest ideals is certainly revealed by the present situation in Europe. In the alleged battle between the totalitarian states and the democracies, we now find Communist Russia transformed into a democracy. In some way the illusion was created in the newspapers and radio and movies by skillful propaganda that Greece and China and Brazil and other friendly nations were democracies, although they were governed without question by dictators. But how can anyone swallow the idea that Russia is battling for democratic principles? Yet the President on Monday announced that the United States would give all possible aid to Russia, the character and quantity of the aid to await only a disclosure of Russian needs. Because overnight Russia is transformed from an aggressor into a democracy, the Treasury has released $40,000,000 in Russian assets, although the assets of France are frozen tighter than a drum.

To spread the four freedoms throughout the world we will ship airplanes and tanks and guns to Communist Russia. But no country was more responsible for the present war and Germany's aggression than Russia itself. Except for the Russian pact with Germany there would have been no invasion of Poland. Then Russia proved to be as much of an aggressor as Germany. If through our aid Stalin is continued in power, do you suppose that he will spread the four freedoms through Finland and Estonia and Latvia and Lithuania? Do you suppose that anybody in Russia itself will ever hear of the four freedoms after the war? Apparently we are to follow bundles for Britain with packages for Petrograd. In the name of democracy we are to make a Communist alliance with the most ruthless dictator in the world. Could there be a greater travesty on the false propaganda fed to the American people that this is a great moral issue between ideologies? If Hitler wins, it is a victory for fascism. If Stalin wins it is a victory for communism. From the point of view of ideology there is no choice.

But the victory of communism in the world would be far more dangerous to the United States than the victory of fascism. There has never been the slightest danger that the people of this country would ever embrace bundism or nazi-ism. It is completely foreign to every idea we have learned since the nursery. But communism masquerades, often successfully, under the guise of democracy, though just as alien to our real principles as nazi-ism itself. It is a greater danger to the United States because it is a false philosophy which appeals to many. Fascism is a false philosophy which appeals to very few indeed.

On May 27 the President made a great emotional appeal to the people. He said, "Today the whole world is divided between slavery and human freedom—between pagan brutality and the Christian ideal." On May 27 Stalin represented human slavery and pagan brutality. On June 24 he represents human freedom and the Christian ideal. The President said further, "We will accept only a world consecrated to freedom of speech and expression—freedom of every person to worship God in his own way—freedom from want—and freedom from terrorism." Will that part of the world which Stalin conquers with our airplanes and our tanks be consecrated to freedom of speech and expression? Will it be consecrated to freedom of every person to worship God in his own way? Will it be consecrated to freedom from want and freedom from terrorism? Or, after a Russian victory with our aid, must we step in with our armies to impose the four freedoms on 200,000,000 people 10,000 miles away, who have never known either freedom from want or freedom from terrorism? Surely Stalin won't do it. Surely we must know by this time that Stalin's promises are as valueless as are those of Hitler himself.

The attempt to picture a world divided between two great ideologies, the attempt to create a great moral issue behind our supposed duty to spread the four freedoms everywhere in the world, have been utterly destroyed by the new Communist alliance. The shouters for war are left with but one cry, "We hate Hitler. Hitler must be destroyed." Hate is hardly the basis for a moral issue. From the utter confusion of the present situation in Europe the American people can only conclude that these quarrels are European quarrels, from which at all costs we must keep our country clear. Furthermore, should we attempt to carry through the moral principles implied in the four-freedoms theory, we would face war for years to come, for Germany can only be crushed by a land army, and a land army made up principally of Americans. But today we could not transport an Army to Europe if we would without tremendous losses from submarines and dive bombers. It is futile to bluster about the kind of freedoms we will impose everywhere in the world.

And yet the Russo-German war may perhaps be the solution of the present problems of the world. It might actually lead to peace. It seems to indicate that Hitler has given up the idea that he can conquer the British Isles by invasion. It seems to show that he believes the future of Germany rests on the Continent of Europe rather than on the seas. I sincerely hope that it may lead to some discussion of peace before the end of 1941, and before we ourselves are further involved in a European quarrel. The President should certainly explore the possibilities of such a peace, with as little publicity as possible. I have only contempt for those radio commentators who treat every suggestion of a peace which would have millions of lives as German propaganda. Whether Hitler will accept terms which can possibly be acceptable to England I do not know, but the United States should certainly not block the making of any peace which is acceptable to England. We must not force England to accept any terms which may be acceptable to Hitler, but neither do I believe that we should prevent their making peace on any terms which the English people feel is to their advantage. This is their war. They began it justifiably. They are the people who have been bombed, and whose cities have been destroyed. It is up to them to make the decision. But let them not make it with the idea that the United States is ever going to send a great expeditionary force to the Continent of Europe. The German-Russian war has made that policy ridiculous, if it was ever under consideration. I am glad to see from General Marshall's statement Monday morning that we are not contemplating any substantial enlargement of our present Army.

This country can be united on a policy of no intervention in Europe and aid to Britain. We can make that aid infinitely more effective if we abandon the rule of world benefactor; if we leave Balkan politics alone; if we avoid a Communist alliance; if we adhere to the simple policy of aiding Britain. Why do we want to aid Britain? Because by and large they do have the same ideals as we ourselves. Because they are our close relatives, from whom we derived fundamentally the whole theory of our government. Because the destruction of Britain and the British Empire would mean an unsettled world, with the greatest hazard to the peace and prosperity of the entire world. That is a wholly sufficient reason without any spreading of the four freedoms anywhere else in the world.

How can we aid Britain best? By the simple process of speeding up our manufacture of airplanes and tanks and war materials of every kind. That is our task in the war, and up to this time we have woefully failed in its accomplishment. The lease-lend bill was hailed as the great savior of England, and those of us who opposed its conferring of dictatorial powers on the President, including the power to give away our arms to Russia and every other country in the world, were practically accused of treachery because we insisted on debating the bill for 3 weeks. Yet in a period of almost 3 months the total transfer of defense articles from American supplies totaled only $75,000,000, whereas it was contemplated that from American Army and Navy supplies alone $1,300,000,000 worth was to be transferred to England. During the same period we spent on W. P. A. approximately $300,000,000. We must correct our utterly inefficient organization for defense. We must stop the strikes and go to work. Apparently we have wholly fallen down in our construction of pursuit planes, so that today the British don't want our pursuit planes and infinitely prefer their own. We have heard a lot of talk of convoys, but no one has denied the published figures that only 4 percent of the ships going from this country to England have been sunk. Even this figure is higher than the fact, because the bombing planes, which are so important to England, are flown over on their own power. There is no evidence that our entire Navy could substantially reduce the sinkings which do occur from submarines and from German planes and from the bombing of English ports after the arrival of merchant vessels. The whole outcry for convoys, the pushing of our patrols farther into the eastern Atlantic, the playing of great international politics, all seem designed to involve us in the war, with or without the consent of Congress, rather than to our real task of aiding Britain with every kind of war material, and particularly the airplanes which they must have to secure control of the air.

The Russian war has weakened every argument for intervention. The war party knows that the American people are overwhelmingly opposed to war, and so it is trying to urge the President into an aggressive war without consideration by Congress. I cannot be convinced that any President will involve 130,000,000 people in the horrors of a modern war without the approval of the Representatives of the people in Congress assembled. No war by a democratic country can possibly be successful unless it has the overwhelming support of the people, by whom and for whom that country always has been governed.

Work of Farm Security Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. NORRIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

LETTER FROM THE ADMINISTRATOR OF THE FARM SECURITY ADMINISTRATION

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the Administrator of the Farm Security Administration in the Agricultural Department in which the Administrator gives some statistics and presents an interesting picture of the operations of the Farm Security Administration, which, I am sure, will not only furnish desirable information to Senators but also will give an excellent understanding of what that Administration has done and is doing in the way of farm security.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
FARM SECURITY ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, June 7, 1941.

Hon. GEORGE W. NORRIS,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR NORRIS: Since the beginning of the present emergency, it has been generally recognized that the health, welfare, and morale of our people are vitally important to national defense. Providing for these needs among low-income farm families has been one of the essential contributions of the Farm Security Administration to the Nation's defense efforts during the past year.

We have just completed a special survey undertaken last winter to measure the progress being made by borrowers from the Farm Security Administration. It indicates the gains in terms of money, living standards, and capacity for self-support which have been made during 1940 by handicapped and low-income farm people all over the country. It occurred to me that you might be interested in seeing the figures for the State of Nebraska.

In Nebraska there were 11,086 active standard rehabilitation borrowers at the end of 1940. The survey showed that the average borrower earned a net income of $593 during the year, as compared with $387 in the year before he borrowed from Farm Security. In other words, the typical family increased its annual net income by 54 percent. This means that Farm Security borrowers in Nebraska have increased their total annual incomes by $2,292,917 since coming on the program. Naturally this growth in prosperity and purchasing power has been reflected on the books of merchants and other businessmen of the State.

We were pleased to find that borrowers in your State are rapidly repaying their rehabilitation loans. Already $3,659,674 has been repaid on loans totaling $15,091,599, although much of the money does not fall due for 4 or 5 years. Throughout the entire country rehabilitation loans totaling $420,865,050 had been made as of December 31, 1940, and $149,626,442 of this sum had been repaid. As you know, loan funds currently are advanced by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, instead of coming from direct appropriations.

In view of the fact that none of the borrowers from Farm Security was able to get adequate credit anywhere else and that many of them formerly were on relief, we feel that this repayment record is a tribute to the honesty and industry of these needy farm people. There is ample evidence that the great majority of them are getting back on their feet and becoming permanently self-supporting. In large measure, this progress is due to the advice and technical guidance in sound farm and home management which accompanies each Farm Security loan.

For example, we encourage our borrowers to get away from one-crop farming—particularly of surplus crops, such as cotton, tobacco, and wheat—and to raise as much as possible of their own food and feed for their livestock. During 1940 the average Farm Security family in your State produced $190 worth of goods for home consumption, as compared with $121 before they came into the F. S. A. program. This produce for home use included 372 gallons of milk per family, 393 pounds of meat, and 197 quarts of vegetables and fruit canned for the winter. This increased production of food did not, of course, add to the supply in the commercial markets, since virtually none of it was offered for sale. It simply meant a better diet, better health, and a rising standard of living for these families.

Often it has been necessary to work out an adjustment of the family's old debts before rehabilitation could be successful. Local farm-debt-adjustment committees have been set up for this purpose. They have no legal authority to compel adjustments, but by bringing the farmer and his creditors together for a friendly discussion they usually are able to arrange a scale-down of the obligations, reduced interest rates, or extension of the payment period. Such adjustments frequently save the farmer from foreclosure and, at the same time, enable the creditors to get substantial payments on what might otherwise have been bad debts.

This service is available to all farmers, whether or not they are rehabilitation borrowers. Altogether, debt reductions totaling $5,815,970 have been negotiated for individual farmers in Nebraska. This represents a scale-down of 25.9 percent. As a direct result of these adjustments, $277,802 in back taxes has been paid to local governmental agencies.

In addition, reductions totaling $282,386, or 45.6 percent, have been negotiated in the debts owed by irrigation districts and similar farm groups.

In making this special survey, our field employees reported that there are 7,806 families in Nebraska who are eligible and in need of rehabilitation loans, but have been unable to get them because of the limited funds available.

In addition to the rehabilitation program, Farm Security is carrying out the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, which provides a limited number of loans to competent tenants to enable them to buy family-type farms.

During the first 3 years of this program we made 151 such loans in your State, totaling $1,488,111. This year we expect to make about 110 Bankhead-Jones loans in Nebraska, amounting to approximately $1,033,556. Throughout the country, delinquencies of these loans have amounted so far to only 2.6 percent, or $23,658; and this has been more than offset by the fact that other borrowers have been able to make advance payments totaling $196,765, as the result of good crops and management.

I am hopeful that this rather detailed report may be useful to you; and if you would like to have any further facts about our program I shall, of course, be glad to supply them. Some time during the year I hope that you may find an opportunity to visit some of the borrowers from F. S. A. in your State and see for yourself the efforts they are making to get a new start as independent, taxpaying citizens.

Sincerely,

C. B. BALDWIN, Administrator.

Memorial Day Address

OF

HON. HUGH A. BUTLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

ADDRESS BY CHIEF JUSTICE SIMMONS, OF NEBRASKA

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have placed in the RECORD a very worthy and patriotic speech recently made by the chief justice of the Nebraska Supreme Court, Hon. Robert G. Simmons, formerly a Member of the House of Representatives.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Shall we, at this memorial time, devote our speaking to fulsome praise of the heroic deeds of our revered dead, or shall we honor them by a reexamination of the principles of government in which they believed and by a rededication of our lives and purposes to the maintenance of the institutions of freedom which they served? I prefer the latter course.

Relatively too much emphasis is being put upon the probability of the actual invasion of this country by the armed forces of foreign powers. That is not our most imminent danger. There is another kind of invasion that we do need to fear and against which we must actively guard.

For a number of years we have been invaded not by armed forces but by ideas and concepts of government not only foreign to our own but openly and violently opposed to the ideals of government upon which our American system is based.

Admittedly we should be prepared to defend against physical invasion. We should likewise be alert to repel openly and vigorously the existing invasion of principles of government that are more subtle, deadly, and destructive than any invasion of armed forces. If this invasion of ideals contrary to ours is successful, it will not be necessary for foreign powers to invade our shores with either armies, navies, or air forces. Their aims will have been accomplished.

The vital danger to democracy in America is not from the outside but from those persons within our country in whose hearts there is no longer the faith of those who built our institutions.

Shall we preserve not only the form but the substance of our institutions? This is a contest that we have here at home now and one in which we should vigorously engage now. It is to the important phase of this contest that I desire to direct your attention.

In public discussions we refer to the struggle, now engaging the world, as one between the dictatorships and the democracies. What is the distinction between these two great groups of nations? The dictatorships are somewhat easily described. Their forms of government are generally the same. They are not new except in name. They are throwbacks to the system of absolute monarchies, discarded centuries ago. Then, as now, force dominated; then, as now, rulers were supreme; then, as now, people had only the privileges that governing classes saw fit to permit them to exercise; then, as now, rulers contended that people existed to serve the state. The dictatorships are movements backward in the science of self-government.

What are the principles upon which the democracies are founded? What is the common denominator of the democracies? It is obvious that we must look beyond forms of government to find the answer.

We may say that the democracies represent the tolerant governments of the world, and the dictatorships the intolerant. The democracies represent those nations where governments permit and encourage a difference of views on political, economic, and social problems and methods; where racial differences and the different religious faiths and ideals of peoples are respected and protected. Certainly there is no tolerance of ideals, principles, races, or religions within the totalitarian systems. But that distinction is not sufficient.

The democracies exalt the individual as against the all-powerful state. But why should men have rights superior to the state? Why should not governments be all-powerful so far as the individual is concerned? What is the underlying ideal that distinguishes the philosophies of the two systems of government? We of the democracies answer that men have been endowed by the Creator with certain inalienable rights.

The fundamental difference between the two systems, democracies and dictatorships, is that the democracies are founded upon the ideal and belief that God has given to men on this earth rights that no government may properly invade and which all governments must respect. The dictatorships recognize no such rights and no such supreme authority.

The difference is between a political system based on the age-old faith of men in God and a political creed that does not recognize the hand of God in the affairs of men.

What has happened these last years during which we have watched peoples and nations move away from liberty and toward the dominance of government? Bishop Hunt, of Salt Lake City, has well given the answer. I quote: "The collapse of our civilization, which is now seriously threatened, is primarily the collapse of ideals. It is the loss of respect for Christian standards and principles. Conduct, itself, alike of men and nations is secondary * * * to the ideals by which it is motivated. Ideals come first; when they are lost, all is lost."

So long as human actions and relations are to be governed by a code of moral and spiritual standards, then just so long is religion a vital part of the political, economic, and social system of a nation.

We are not confronted with the problems of world leaders failing to live up to their ideals, but rather with the problem of world leaders who have discarded the ideals that have heretofore dominated civilized government. Why do the dictators violate treaties, scoff at their pledged word, resort to treason, and commit savage acts of pillage and slaughter against races and whole nations of peoples? The answer is that they are no longer controlled by the moral and spiritual standards by which those things have been heretofore instinctively judged to be wrong.

Rulers who do not believe in God, who regard as highly moral anything which they wish to do, those rulers cannot consider that they have transgressed the moral and spiritual codes and cannot understand why other nations and peoples reproach them and condemn their actions.

Why do the dictators attempt to suppress or dominate all religious ideals, thinking, and organizations? There must be two reasons: First, the dictator cannot tolerate a divided allegiance. Second, and more important, the dictator realizes that he must control the moral forces and the spiritual thinking and beliefs of the peoples whom he governs in order that he may dominate and direct those forces. To accomplish his purposes he must either control or wipe out the religious beliefs of his subject peoples. For that reason he attacks the age-old religions of the world.

Can we accept the proposal of the dictators that democracy no longer has a place in the government of men? Weigh well what it means if democratic institutions are to be cast aside. It does not mean merely that the form of democracy is gone. It means that the moral and spiritual concepts of human relations between man and man, and man and God are no longer to be respected and preserved by governments. Are the concepts of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man no longer to be the spiritual guides of our political organizations? If that ideal is no longer to control, then slavery to the State is the highest position to which man can possibly aspire.

If these ideals upon which our Government is founded are right, then, while we cannot foresee the steps which we must take, we can chart the direction which we must go and the purpose which we must have.

Our attention during the last few months has been focused upon the question of national defense. We are largely of one accord in our belief that we need, and must speedily acquire, a stronger navy, a larger army, and a greater air force. But those three things—great armies, strong navies, mighty air forces—will not preserve our institutions. Add to them, if you will, the ability to mobilize the entire manpower of this Nation and our great material resources—put them all together, large army, navy, air force, manpower, material resources—all of them together will not preserve institutions of free government in this country—for those things are instruments of power that, once they fail to function, cannot save us.

We must look beyond strong forces and material resources for the assurance of the maintenance of our institutions. This means not only that we must develop the strength of our military forces and be in a position to mobilize the vast resources of this country in the event of war; it means that we must have a rebuilding of the moral and religious forces from which strength of character comes.

The men of my profession delve day after day into the written law of the country. We refer to the common law, principles of equity, to statutes, and constitutions. These laws that have been accepted as the permanent basis of our system of justice do not rest upon their own foundation. They are not solely the "I say so" of constitution drafters, legislative bodies, or courts.

They rest upon the higher law. Any act of ours, either as individuals or as a nation, that fails to recognize that higher law, that tends to tear down the spiritual forces of this Nation, or that denies the Creator from whom those rights come, is an act which weakens and tears down our Government and its institutions. Undermine the religious basis of our Government and you undermine our whole social, political, and economic system. Take out of our laws, our constitutions, and our institutions all the precepts that are based upon religious principles and you will have remaining but a few shattered pieces of a once great system of laws and government. The strength of democracy is in its religious foundation. There was its origin and there it must look for its perpetuity.

We must come again to believe as a people in a God that means honor, decency, and justice between men and nations and once again establish a recognition of the God-given rights of men as the basis for human conduct. We must again come to believe that the principle of man's brotherhood is not a principle to be whispered in cloistered places but that it can and must be made into a reality and that it controls the conduct of our relations with each other as individuals and the relations of our Nation in dealing with the nations and peoples of the world. The brotherhood of man rests upon the fatherhood of God. But believing is not enough. We must put behind our belief the force of a public opinion that will once again make our ideals fully effective in matters of government.

The Nation has and will again change as the composite individual changes. If the individual weakens, if the home influence deteriorates, if community standards fail, the Nation will likewise weaken, deteriorate, fail. It is a matter of personal duty and personal responsibility. It calls for the recognition of our individual share of the blame and our individual obligation to help in the restoration of the spiritual and the moral as the directing forces in the Nation. It is stated in our Declaration that the Creator has endowed us with certain inalienable rights. It necessarily follows that we are likewise endowed with certain inalienable responsibilities.

Let us recognize also that the blood stream in the person that we now call an American comes from the best blood of practically every race in the world. It has been blended here into a new race called American. We will not restore the moral fabric nor maintain the spiritual forces of this country unless we recognize that there shall be no distinction among Americans because of race, color, or creed. The true test of an American is loyalty to our institutions and the principles upon which our Government is founded. This is a matter not of race, color, or creed, but is a matter of the spirit and mind, the heart and soul of the individual.

I realize that there is a marked difference as to methods of worship between the great Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish religious organizations. But we need not now be concerned with those methods of worship and the differences that have divided us. We are now concerned with rights of men. We must recognize that underlying the faith of Catholic, Protestant, and Jew is the all-important ideal of the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God. That is the unifying principle that is common to all. It is that ideal that the totalitarian governments desire to suppress. That being true, we should then have the wisdom and the courage to recognize that we have a common right to maintain, and a common ideal to promote and preserve. I am not urging the merger of our religious institutions nor that any one of them surrender its distinctive characteristics. I am urging that there is need for cooperation, real and earnest, to the end that rights sacred to each be not lost to all.

The right of every person to invoke divine assistance for his country, worship God in his own way, and by methods which to him are right, must be fully safeguarded by all of us. No other method is just nor safe.

So I, a Protestant, urge that we make common cause and unite our forces for the defense and maintenance of the common ideal that is the basis of our Government as well as of our religious faith.

To me, this is the fundamental task which we face in America. It is vital to us in this country—not only to ourselves but to our children's children. It does not concern America alone. We must recognize in this country, that, if the great Republic that is ours should fail to maintain its ideals—that is we fail—free government fails on this earth, and that our America is the sole hope of multiplied millions of people elsewhere in the world, their hope that somewhere, somehow, sometime, they too may be able to govern themselves.

Proposal to Feed Starving People of Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES J. DAVIS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

LETTER FROM FRED BRENCKMAN

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, in view of the great suffering now existing in the various parts of war-torn Europe, and in view of the great surpluses of food which are to be found in our own country, I ask that due consideration be given the efforts made by the National Committee on Food for the Small Democracies to provide a workable plan to save these people from starvation. Unquestionably, millions of our fellowmen are now threatened with starvation. The difficulties in the way of feeding them are well known to all who have studied the subject. However, we of America must not fail in this time of international crisis to retain within ourselves the spirit of goodwill and respect for the common need of defenseless men, women, and children.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter I have received from Mr. Fred Brenckman, of the National Grange, and I would ask for the printing of a radio address delivered by Mr. Raymond S. Richmond over stations of the National Broadcasting Co., on the Grange Hour, from Washington, D. C., on June 21, 1941, but the Senator from Oklahoma has already had Mr. Richmond's address printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NATIONAL GRANGE,
Washington, D. C., June 25, 1941.

DEAR MR. DAVIS: Enclosed herewith please find copy of a radio address made by Mr. Raymond S. Richmond, secretary of the National Committee on Food for the Small Democracies, over stations of the National Broadcasting Co. in connection with the regular monthly program of the National Grange, Saturday, June 21.

The Grange believes that every effort should be made to devise and put into operation a workable plan to save from starvation the peoples of the small democracies of Europe which have been overthrown by the brutal might of the German military machine. In our opinion, the outlines of the plan that has been evolved by the Committee on Food for the Small Democracies is sound and workable. It should be given a trial. There could be no greater reproach to our civilization than to have it said that we callously allowed millions of innocent and defenseless men, women, and children to starve without even making an effort to save them.

It should be kept in mind that the peoples of these small countries are not asking for charity. Their exiled governments have the necessary funds to pay for any food that may be sent them.

It seems to us that Mr. Richmond's address gives in brief but completely understandable form the essential factors relative to Senate Resolution 124 and House Resolution 245, which deal with the food question.

We hope that you may find time to read Mr. Richmond's fine address and that you will do all in your power to aid the cause for which he speaks.

Sincerely yours,
THE NATIONAL GRANGE,
FRED BRENCKMAN,
Washington Representative.

The Job of Senate Pages

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERICK VAN NUYS

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

ARTICLE BY ROBERT MARCH

Mr. VAN NUYS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very unique and interesting article prepared by Robert March, one of the Senate pages, entitled "The Senate Page Job—Its Unique Opportunities."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE PAGE JOB—UNIQUE OPPORTUNITY

(By Robert March)

Amid the myriad occupations engaging the thought and energies of the lads of this vast country, I believe the occupation of the select group of boys known as Senate pages is paramount so far as preparation for later life is concerned. I should like to introduce the reader to this group of boys—21 in all—engaged in carrying out the wishes of the 96 Members of the Senate of the United States. Obviously, the most that any occupation can do is to expose the individual to the opportunities incident to the execution of its duties. It is entirely up to the individual boy to take advantage of these opportunities, and thus gain the impetus that the page job can give toward development of better citizens. Therefore, what I have to say will apply only to the type of boy who is far-seeing enough to improve these opportunities—a type which happily comprises the majority of the Senate pages. Having been a Senate page for the past 4 years, I seem to have arrived at the point where I have a yearning to inflict upon some hapless reader my views on the subject.

The occupation of page is an ancient and honorable one, which has descended to us from far back along the misty corridor of history—from the time when monarchs began hiring young boys to transmit their messages from ear to ear. Among these young fellows who have been elevated from the ranks of other boys of their age, a certain pardonable pride has continued to be manifested in bearing and action.

A boy may become a Senate page upon arriving at the age of from 12 to 16 years, when training and responsibility are of the most value in developing his character. Just as he is beginning to comprehend the immensity and complex nature of such momentous issues as government, social problems, and life in general, he becomes a page and commences to absorb the varied knowledge that a page acquires in his ever-changing and always interesting duties.

His daily job necessitates his being actually present during all the debates in that august body, where he hears all the important questions of the day discussed from every point of view. Various subjects which he has undoubtedly heard his parents and their friends discussing are brought forcefully to his attention, and he acquires a sense of perspective regarding the relationships of the three branches of government. A deep respect for law is instilled in him as he hears it interpreted in language which is not too difficult for an intelligent boy to understand. He realizes that the true purpose and aim of all laws and legislators is actually to promote harmony, to make the life of the individual more secure and happy, and to promote the general welfare. He learns that the Constitution, instead of being merely a well-worded ideal, is a practical working basis which constantly guides the Senators and Representatives in their work of governing the greatest country on the face of the earth. Another point is the first-hand knowledge which he gains of the intricacies of parliamentary law.

Sitting on the steps at the base of the rostrum where the Vice President presides, the page observes the operations of the Senate with increasing interest as his time of service lengthens and his knowledge consequently broadens. No humorous situation arising from a Senator's ambiguous statement or the enforcement of a parliamentary rule escapes the alert minds of the pages as they sit in a row, all dressed in black with neat white collars, like so many penguins, conversing quietly together as they await the Senators' slightest whims. A boy serving in this capacity has a wonderful opportunity to cultivate the friendship of important officials, and to establish contacts which oftentimes are invaluable to him in later life when he needs recommendations of a friend important enough to command the attention of an employer. He also learns to appreciate the value of friendship with his fellow workers. Since the nature of the pages' duties require that they associate very closely most of the time, they learn the advantages of cooperation and gain appreciation of the better qualities of character in other lads of their age. As they scurry about the Senate Chamber in the morning preparing the Senators' desks for the day's session, they realize that they must work together to accomplish their job in as short a time as possible. If one of their number is absent because of sickness, the rest must cooperate and include the duties of the absent boy among their own. Thus, they are prepared to accept the responsibilities of citizenship when they arrive at the proper age.

From the time that the page first enters the hushed carpeted Chamber of the Senate till he takes leave of his fellow pages on the expiration of his appointment, the necessity of maintaining the honor and reputation of the pages is impressed upon him. Constant striving to do his work perfectly and to merit the approval of those in charge does much to develop his perseverance and industry. He becomes accustomed to obeying orders without question, though in a different manner from that of military camps. Rather than obey orders literally, with no thought as to their effect, he is taught to use his intelligence in carrying out his instructions. He endeavors to save as much time as possible by doing things in the most efficient manner. All this necessitates the exercise of judgment, thereby helping to create in the page a proper sense of values. This is of great importance to a boy at this period in his life. If he can learn to discriminate between trivial incidents and those which may affect his standing as a page, if he can analyze and retain the facts he gathers on the floor of the Senate, he is indeed better equipped for life than he would have been had he not had this opportunity. All the while he is scurrying around the famous Hall which has echoed the oratory of so many famous statesmen, his whole manner and attitude are undergoing a change. For instance, he is learning to place a high value on public property. Since he is often detailed to protect the property of the Senate, he comes to regard with disgust the ravages of the souvenir hunters who have no thought but for their own pleasure.

Many, if not most, of the Senate pages come from far distant parts of this great land to take up their duties in Washington. They leave home at the age when the value of money is just being brought to their attention. From their life back home, during the course of which their needs were taken care of by their parents and they probably had very little need of money, they are plunged into a new life in the Nation's Capital. From the carefree life of the ordinary boy with no more than a few cents in his pocket, the page makes the transition to the life of a wage earner making over a hundred dollars a month—$4 a day. From this fact arises, perhaps, one of the most debated questions concerning the advantages or disadvantages of being a page. It is said that this sudden increase in available money is detrimental to the page's welfare, in that he loses his appreciation of the importance of money as a tool in the complex modern life. It is argued that the page obtains his money too easily; that his idea of the relationship between the effort put into an occupation and the remuneration received suffers; and that he would not thereafter be satisfied with any of the ordinary jobs that he might merit outside of the Senate. This may be true of a few pages of less mature minds, but certainly it does not apply to the majority. Most of the pages are busy laying aside as much money as possible for college, after which they will be better equipped for future vocations. Many boys have found their jobs as Senate pages of invaluable aid in assuring them of success in later life. Some of them have become Senators themselves, or administrative officials, or have become well-known lawyers such as one gentleman in Wall Street who writes a card every year to "the youngest page" and one to "the oldest page."

Another question frequently considered is that of the page's education. Practically every page has been singled out on the street because of his distinctive uniform and asked by some interested gentleman or lady how he obtains his education. If you could but visit the United States Capitol, you would learn to your complete satisfaction the facts about the education of pages. They are required to rouse themselves from sleep early enough to enable them to get to school at 15 minutes past 7 o'clock every morning. In the winter it is a very trying experience for the young boy, with his desire for variety and diversion, to open his eyes on the bleak world at that time of morning and suddenly realize that another day just like the one preceding is about to begin. At that time of morning a peculiar distortion seems to affect the page's outlook as he wonders why he undergoes the trials and tribulations of a page. But as he overcomes this brief period of pessimism, and goes about the operations incident to getting to school on time, his outlook begins to change for the better, and another link in the chain of his character is forged. He realizes that he must get to school on time because his school time is precious and not to be wasted. Upon arriving at the Capitol he proceeds to the suite of rooms designated as the Capitol Page School. Here he must obtain most of his education from books—those age-old conveyors of knowledge. Instead of having every fact and theory thoroughly discussed and explained and served to him on a "silver platter," he must glean his knowledge for himself from the inanimate combination of printer's ink and paper. It is quite necessary for him to be able to weigh matters carefully in his mind, and to sort out the important facts and principles from those which are not so important. Unconsciously, an ability to form opinions based not on prejudice but on careful observation and analysis of facts is developed. Having very little time left after the demands of school and work are satisfied, the page comes to place a high value on spare time. He acquires the ability to fit his school work into any spare moments he has in the evening, and thereby maintain a high scholastic standing. The page works hard and plays hard.

During the long winter months the page scarcely sees the light of day. He arrives at the Capitol just as the tops of the buildings are turning in the east from gray to pink, and he bursts forth in the evening just as the sun is disappearing below the horizon in the opposite direction. During the summer, while the perspiring townsfolk grumble about the horrible heat, the page sits and dreams about the wind-swept trees bathed in golden sunlight, with broad expanses of lawn upon which one might stretch and forget the world. Tourists about to enter the Capitol, who happen to encounter one of the pages on his way to lunch, must wonder at the way he halts on the threshold of the out-of-doors as though fascinated by the scene before him. However, rather than lament the fact that he is compelled to spend his time indoors, the page's versatile nature prompts him to find recreation in his work. In his youthful enthusiasm, his daily duties seem more interesting, and he is able to relax while working. This ability to enjoy his work, if gained while young, will be a tremendous asset to brighten the long hours of work in later life.

At this juncture one may wonder just what sort of a group of lads the Senate pages are after they have been duly exposed to the influences of their occupation. Of course, you may be skeptical and may persist in regarding the system as unjustifiable, as do many who have obtained no first-hand knowledge of the facts. You would probably be immensely reassured, however, could you but visit the Senate and observe for yourself the quiet, orderly manner in which this group carries out its instructions. Instead of a horde of egotistical, ill-mannered young barbarians, one finds as intelligent, friendly, and mature a group as will be found anywhere in the country. This fact speaks well for the wholesome influence of the page job; and since these boys represent the best class of boys in America—the boys who will be its future leaders—one is assured of the bright destiny of our country.

Gasless Sundays

EDITORIAL FROM THE CARROLL COUNTY (N. H.) INDEPENDENT

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the June 13 issue of the Carroll County Independent, published at Center Ossipee, N. H., entitled "Gasless Sundays." It is an editorial dealing with the serious effect that gasless Sundays will have upon the recreation industry of my section of the country.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Carroll County (N. H.) Independent of June 13, 1941]

GASLESS SUNDAYS

Folks in New Hampshire and New England are not taking too kindly to the idea of gasless Sundays. This is not through any lack of patriotism or lack of desire to cooperate with the Government in its short-of-war effort.

It is simply a feeling that New Hampshire folks are being called upon to sacrifice a part of their livelihood before any other people in the Nation are called upon to do so.

Now here in New Hampshire recreation is the State's second largest industry. The major portion of the income from the recreation industry is received during the summer months. And over half of that summer income comes in over the week end. Thousands and thousands of people drive to New Hampshire late Friday afternoon or on Saturday, spend the week end, and return to their city homes late on Sunday. Gasless Sundays would stop all this business. Furthermore, thousands of families, because the head of the household could not pay them a visit each week end, would not come to the State at all to hire a cottage for the season, but would spend the summer at their city homes.

Looking back on the gasless Sundays of the first World War, it is remembered that hardly a car moved on the highway. People did not gas up on Saturday in order to drive on Sunday. The gasless Sunday was established to conserve gasoline by stopping pleasure riding on Sunday, and people lived up to the spirit of the edict.

It is anticipated that gasless Sundays in New England would mean just that. A few cars would be on the road carrying elderly people to church. Doctors, undertakers, firemen, reporters, policemen, and clergymen would use their cars if necessary. Otherwise no traffic would move.

This would practically wreck New Hampshire's recreation business.

Now, the people of New England and the people of New Hampshire have stood adversity in the past and they are willing to face it again, provided they are convinced that the sacrifice is necessary and that other folks are in the same boat with them.

It is admitted that there is plenty of gasoline and fuel oil in the United States. It is simply a question of transporting it to New England. Because many tankers have been assigned to English use there are not enough to haul gasoline and fuel oil from the South to New England ports.

Folks in New Hampshire would be perfectly willing to have gasless Sundays provided that the Canadians were having gasless Sundays also, thus proving their good faith in the matter of war effort. We would be perfectly willing to have gasless Sundays, or an occasional gasless Sunday, provided that folks in other sections of the Nation would also have gasless Sundays and release for New England's use tank cars, tankers, and gas transport trucks.

New England folks would be better resigned to gasless Sundays and lower temperatures for oil-heated homes, if the Government would shut down W. P. A. projects and C. C. C. camps and put the men thus released to work chopping wood to furnish heat here in New Hampshire. With millions of cords of fuel rotting in the woods, it seems a shame that it should continue to go to waste while men are busy on made-work projects.

LETTER FROM NEIL SABIN

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I take it that one Neil Sabin is a draftee in the service of his country at the present time. I ask unanimous consent that his letter, published in the Nashville Tennesseean, be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANSWER REQUESTED

To the Editor: The four of us sat in the tent door and talked as the sunset faded over behind the flagpole. We were asking questions and discussing problems which were looking us in the face. Those of us in here and the rest of you people out there. Even the boys in the camps are beginning to wonder about the war, about its outcome and our entry into it. Suddenly it seemed that war was on top of us and as we discussed the war we realized the concern that everyone had in it, not just the soldiers but the mothers, fathers, the ministers and merchants, playboys and plowboys.

Isn't there time yet to stay out of this thing? We're not actually fighting yet; can't we pull up short of the final plunge? We couldn't decide. That morning we'd seen a newspaper headline, "America was destined to enter the war." We decided about that and quickly. It was pure unadulterated hokum and shouldn't be allowed. While we're still a democracy let's not be such fatalists.

If we go into this war let's do it with our eyes open. Not driven in like a horse with destiny as a blind bridle. We all like to be considered as peace lovers. Americans do, but have you seen anything to beat the way these peace lovers are clamoring for blood or the way they're yelling for higher wages and striking when they don't get them? We aren't cowards; we're as brave as the last generation, I think, but we want a few questions answered before we're sent 3,000 miles away to risk our lives for strikers.

First of all, we agreed, we'd like to know for what and for whom we're going to fight. If we're going to fight for England again we want our English cousins to agree not to call us suckers and fools for entering the war as they did last time. It hurts our ego and makes us pause to wonder about their sense of gratitude. For the last 20 years we've been schooled and drilled on the effects of propaganda in the last war so don't expect us to turn our coats overnight and go joyfully forth to get a bayonet in the belly just because someone waves the flag and says we're ready. We want some thinking done first.

We'd like to know how we'll be, as Americans, when it's over. We might be making poppies or pushing them up but if we aren't will we be better off? If we win will we annex some new territory or settle the problems of Europe? Rather won't we be inheriting the age-old hatreds, intrigues, and squabbles which have existed as long as Europe has? Admittedly we aren't after territory; we aren't in it for the money then. The other alternative was tried back in '17 and '18. Remember how it turned out? If we restored the old balance of power to Europe we would be curing her of a cold only to give her a fever.

If we must go to war, then give us some answers to our questions. Give us some bread and butter reasons. If it be necessary for us to go and if you so decide after you've given the matter your gravest consideration, then let's do it up brown. Let's dally no more with strikes which cause our Army to go without arms. Let's stop strikes and start our own propaganda in the enemy country as they have in ours. Build up a mechanized army such as is needed to match the enemy's, not an immense array of partially trained and partially equipped men.

Before we go over with such an army let's be sure. Be sure that this is the only course we can follow to guarantee our freedom. Never in the history of the United States has there been greater need for clear thinking by the whole people. Where do we stand in the clear cold light of reason as we turn the situation over and over in our minds? Have you done that? You owe it to yourself and to us. What's to be gained and are we sure of gaining anything? What's to be lost? Reason it out, people. Sit down with your balance sheet, with your debits here and your credits there. You do that with other problems. This is one of the biggest problems you will ever face. If you can balance your son's life, his mind, or his eyesight against the gain, if you can balance your heartaches, and if you're able to say "Never again" without crying; able to balance the loss of freedom and increase in prices and taxes against the gain; if you can do that much and get an even break; if the sheet balances at all, then let's unite under the assurance that we're doing the only thing to be done.

This much you owe us though—to give this question of war entry your gravest consideration. Tell us what we're fighting for and for whom. Give us some war aims or get England to formulate some. Give us some new slogans to replace the old worn out ones we have now. If we're to go, make us believe we're settling something. Tell us we'll have something to bank on, something to build on and live for when we're out of this mess.

Give us the answers, people.

POEM BY HORACE C. CARLISLE

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a eulogy, written by Horace C. Carlisle, of the late Samuel E. Hudson, a publisher and literary light well known throughout New England.

There being no objection, the poem was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAMUEL E. HUDSON

Samuel E. Hudson, humanity's friend,
Great guiding light of the Woonsocket Call,
Has brought his labors on earth to an end,
Deeply bemoaned by the great and the small;

Throughout New England he'll sadly be missed,
Throughout Rhode Island he'll be missed far more,
Throughout Woonsocket, the people insist
That they've lost none whose death they so deplore.

Samuel E. Hudson, a man among men,
For sacred honor religiously stood;
Master he was of his own tongue and pen,
As he went daily about doing good.
Faith, hope, and charity, graces divine,
Until God called him from earth to depart,
In a far better world than this, to shine,
Dwelt in communion in his happy heart.

Samuel E. Hudson has fought the good fight,
And has triumphantly, peacefully won;
For in the law of love was his delight,
And his prayer daily was, "Thy will be done."

So, "It is finished," he, too, might have cried,
As he was breathing his last parting breath;
He has been called home, to ever abide,
Where there's no more pain, or sorrow, or death.

ARTICLE BY GORHAM MUNSON

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, in the March issue of the University Review, published by the University of Kansas City, there appeared an article entitled "War and Finance," by Mr. Gorham Munson, one of the outstanding thinkers, writers, and leaders on monetary matters in the United States.

Not alone because the article discusses legislation introduced by myself, but also because it is, in my opinion, a work of challenging interest, I have asked that it be printed in the RECORD. The article follows:

[From the University Review of March 1941]

WAR AND FINANCE

(By Gorham Munson)

Within a few hours after England declared war on August 4, 1914, the gold standard broke down. Prior to that date there was in England, except for checks and Bank of England notes, no paper money in general use. The ordinary citizen for the most part used copper, silver, and gold coins, and the well-to-do carried the now obsolete sovereign purses, especially designed for gold coins. After 1918 a generation grew up that has never jingled a gold coin in its pocket, and many have never even seen a gold coin.

On Saturday, July 25, 1914, Sir Frederick Atterbury, Controller of H. M. Stationery Office, received two callers who came in the name of the Chancelor of the Exchequer. One of these callers was Sir John Bradbury. The callers wanted—10 days be it noted before England declared war—to get paper money made. These notes became popularly known as Bradburys. The print order was given to Waterlow & Sons, and the following Tuesday, one week before the declaration of war, printing of the "Bradburys" started.

The bank holiday, due on August 3, was extended by proclamation through August 6. On August 5 the whole British banking system was insolvent. Its cash assets were only 1/6d in the pound of its liabilities; the gold reserves of the Bank of England had fallen to £9,960,640. The gold standard was revealed as fraudulent.

On August 6 the Government went to the rescue of the banking system. It passed the Currency and Bank Note Act and authorized the issue of paper money. It advanced the new money to the banks up to 20 percent of their liabilities—and then turned around and proceeded to borrow from the banks to the tune of £8,000,000,000 during the war period.

Taxes were able only to cover one-sixth of the expenditure of that period and the national debt rose from six hundred and sixty millions sterling in 1914 to almost eight thousand millions sterling in 1919, the rise representing the expenditure which it was deemed impracticable to recover in current taxation. Five-sixths of England's war expenditures was therefore financed by credit grants from the banks. The discovery was made that a world war could be financed to unprecedented lengths by borrowing from the banks supplemented by taxes.

In 1914 economists variously predicted that the war could not last for 6 weeks or 6 months or 2 years because the belligerents would run out of money. They did not dream that paper money would be found as good as gold; nor did they appreciate what bookkeeping could do. After the war the Cunliffe commission enlightened them on the technique of creating war credits, and post-war textbooks on banking began to admit that, as Reginald McKenna, banking authority, states it, "Every bank loan creates a deposit and the repayment of that loan destroys the deposit." "Every bank purchase of securities," he added, "creates a deposit and the sale of those securities destroys the deposit." Nowadays the intelligent section of the community understands that banks create money (credit) to lend, and that is one of the important pieces of knowledge gained from World War I. It is also accepted today that the orthodox way to pay for a major war is by taxes and government borrowings from the banks.

World War II, however, vastly more expensive than its predecessor, is battering down this orthodox conception which, as we have seen, wasn't orthodox in 1914. The imperative of war is making huger demands upon a financial system whose principles derive from medieval goldsmiths and whose outlook derives from Adam Smith, and a struggle is developing between those who think primarily in terms of men and supplies and those who are addicted to numbers and abstractions.

John Maynard Keynes' premise is that the Nation's real credit is rightfully owned by the private banking system and that, therefore, in 1914 when the people of Great Britain rescued their financial system it was quite proper for the banks to proceed to make the people of Great Britain loans upon the people's own credit and to charge them interest to boot.

"In the early days of the war"—

Mr. Keynes said in the New Republic for July 29, 1940—

"I proposed a financial plan for Great Britain. It was based on certain premises which should be obvious and are certain beyond dispute. War effort on the scale required in Great Britain must swell the wages bill, for employment has increased, longer hours are being worked at high overtime rates, and the wage rates themselves are rising. On the other hand, it is evident that there can be no similar increase in the amount of goods available for private consumption, since the whole object of the employment is to produce for war. On the contrary, an adequate war effort will require some diversion of the production effort which provided previously for private consumption. Thus a larger purchasing power will face a smaller volume of purchasable goods. If nothing is done about it, the sure consequence must be a rise in price until the smaller volume of goods sells for an amount of money equal to the larger volume of purchasing power.

"If by some general plan or agreement, consumers spend only a part of their aggregate money incomes, they will be able between them to buy just about as much as if they spent all their incomes, while the unspent balance will still be theirs to spend after the war when productive power can again be released to provide consumers' goods.

"In detail the plan took the form of proposals for deferred pay on a graduated scale by which a suitable proportion of everybody's income was withheld by the Treasury either as taxes or as a blocked savings deposit which would not be available until after the war. In the case of the richer classes the greater part of their contribution was to be withheld permanently as a tax; in the case of the working classes the greater part or the whole was to be withheld temporarily as compulsory saving and returned to them after the war."

Meanwhile the British Treasury would expend the savings to prosecute the war. There has been some speculation about the method of returning the compulsory savings or deferred pay which the Government would spend to carry on the war. Would the Government tax the taxpayer to pay him back the deposits he was compelled to lend? Would the banks be ordered to create credit for the return of the deposits and give this credit debt-free to the compulsory savers? Mr. Keynes suggests that a capital levy would do the trick. But would it? The owners of capital would have to sell or mortgage their property in order to have cash to pay the tax; only the banks, who can create credit, would be able to be purchasers, and this would mean, as it meant in 1919–21, the further large transfer of private property into the hands of the banks. Mr. Keynes did not advocate his plan for America. "The United States is," in Mr. Keynes' own words, "still a long way off the special situation for which my British plan was devised." The reason is the colossal industrial and agricultural capacity of the United States which causes Mr. Keynes to conclude that "your war preparation, so far from requiring a sacrifice, will be the stimulus, which neither the victory nor the defeat of the New Deal could give you, to greater individual consumption and a higher standard of life. You can still invest more and spend more."

NAZI FINANCE

The German system, with the gestapo alert to prevent bidding down of prices of Government securities and with a club behind the suggestions to business firms to invest their bank balances in Government securities, out-Keynes Keynes with totalitarian efficiency.

Germany has established a thoroughgoing control of the earnings, savings, and investments of her citizens. She has not had to resort to increased note circulation and has thus far obviated the danger of inflation. She places limitations on what the population can buy, and Schmidt significantly says that there is no place for surplus money to go except into Government securities. Like other nations, Germany finds that tax income is inadequate to finance all her war needs, and loans are essential; but there is a difference in the "silent" investment in Government securities.

There are two incipiently revolutionary elements in the Nazi financial system. Vehemently rejecting the gold-standard theory, Hitler has proclaimed that "work is our gold," that physical production is the cover for German money, and if this thought, namely that money should be related to physical supply of goods and services, is followed through, one reaches revolutionary conclusions about monetary science. The Nazis incidentally have not thought as far along these lines as have some advanced economic thinkers in England. They are, however, quite clear that, in principle, national bookkeeping is radically different from private bookkeeping. This means that the state can make the rules (customs) of a national monetary system, and national accounts are derived from a monetary system created by the state. On the other hand, individual and corporation accounts must take the national monetary system for granted, trade in its tokens, and abide by its customs or rules. The Nazis have made a few new rules designed to increase the credit-power of the state, not nearly as revolutionary as certain new rules propounded in heretical British thinking on finance designed to increase the credit-power, not of the state, but of the individual citizen.

The Nazis face up to the problem of preventing an undue expansion of bank deposits resulting from financing the Government's deficits, devising a way of getting deposits out of the banking system and getting savings back into the stream of commerce. The Government would sell securities to the Reichsbank thereby creating a new bank deposit to be used by the Government to purchase armaments from munitions manufacturers. This meant the transfer of the deposit from the Government's account to the manufacturers' accounts. The manufacturers would then find themselves, as a result of profitable operations, in a stronger cash position and would receive "suggestions" that their excess cash be used to buy blocks of Government securities from the Reichsbank, thus removing and extinguishing the bank deposit originally created in the Reichsbank by its purchase of Government securities.

Nazi finance is a debt-generation system far more orthodox than heretical, and it is a misnomer to call it a financial revolution. Its new rules appear in the way in which Government debt is expanded. The Government sells its securities to the banks in order to get Government checking accounts upon which to draw for armaments. Industrialists who profit by the armaments orders and accumulate excess cash (bank balances), invest it in Government securities already held by the banks. Thus, deposits created by the securities are removed from the banking system, and savings are invested and find their way back into the commercial stream. This "dynamic use of Government securities," this "silent financing" is a smart trick (backed by force).

A DEMOCRATIC FINANCIAL INVENTION

Congressman JERRY VOORHIS, of California, has developed a special interest in the study of money, and there are probably only two or three other Members of the House who have read as widely as he in this field. Mr. VOORHIS has in his proposed war-finance legislation drawn most of his leading ideas from the social-credit scheme of Maj. C. H. Douglas, cleverly adapted to the American problem of national defense in two bills, H. R. 1396 and H. R. 2851, introduced in the current Seventy-seventh Congress. H. R. 1396 is designed to meet the present situation of rearmament. H. R. 2851 is intended to be effective upon declaration of war.

Mr. VOORHIS rejects the cornerstone of Keynesian and Nazi war finance of Government loans from the banking system, giving as security the real credit of the people on the assumption that banks own this real credit. Mr. VOORHIS says flatly that a government should be the source of its own money and not the borrower of it, recalling the precedent of Lincoln in financing part of the cost of the Civil War with money (the famous greenbacks) issued directly by the United States. His argument for this new cornerstone for national wartime finance he presented on August 3, 1939, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD Appendix. So the Voorhis plan begins with the issuance by the United States Treasury of unborrowed "printing press" money, greenback currency, debt-free legal tender. The United States currency notes proposed by Mr. VOORHIS would carry a special clause limiting their use, not as legal tender for all debts, but as a cash reserve for bank loans. They would carry a 100-percent reserve clause; the banks could lend only an equivalent amount of dollars for the dollars of the special greenback currency deposited in them. Thus Mr. VOORHIS neatly prevents the new notes from forming excess bank reserves and thereby opening the door to inflation.

The purpose for which the new currency would be issued is to meet appropriations by Congress for the defense orders of the Army and Navy. We would arm ourselves and we would fight, if necessary, on money issued free of debt, backed by—to quote from H. R. 2851—"the vital assets, the natural resources, the physical plant, and the cultural heritage of the Nation."

At what rate should the new money be issued? And how shall it be called back? These are the crucial questions, and the answers given by Mr. VOORHIS are beyond dispute scientific in that they relate to physical quantities susceptible to measurement. The new money shall be issued at the rate of production of war goods; as the defense articles come into being, so does the money which represents them. The new money shall be recalled to the Treasury at the approximate rate at which the war goods are (a) delivered to the military and naval establishments of the United States as provided in H. R. 1396, or (b) at the anticipated rate of their consumption in warfare according to H. R. 2851. The generalized principle is that money should be canceled at the rate of consumption of article produced.

The means adopted for getting back from the community the money distributed in respect of new armament production is a tax schedule adjusted to the rate of delivery or destruction of the armaments. This pay-as-you-go tax schedule would naturally be a stiff one, but it would meet and defeat any inflationary tendency not otherwise controlled by the price-fixing methods normally employed by governments in war situations.

The final touches put by Mr. VOORHIS upon his bills reveal how inventiveness along democratic lines in finance works, as contrasted with the ingenuity of the strategists of totalitarian finance. In H. R. 1396—popularly referred to as the Voorhis guns-and-butter bill—the money taxed back by the Treasury is paid into a national-debt reduction account used to meet all payments of interest and principle of the direct obligations of the Government as they mature. By this remarkable stroke the people of the United States in making their armament effort would actually be paying off their national debt. The national debt would be converted into a permanent non-interest-bearing noninflatable currency, the immediate effect of which would be a consistent reduction of interest charges on the national budget.

In H. R. 2851 the final touch is that at the conclusion of the war the unexpended balance in the National Defense Credit Account would be distributed as a citizens' victory bonus. All citizens of the age of 21 or over would receive pro rata monthly payments for 12 months, a surer way of obviating the post-war slump than Mr. Keynes' problematical return of deferred pay.

It should be emphasized that the Voorhis plan is not an improvision. Mr. Keynes' compulsory-savings plan is, and Nazi finance is certainly a kit of improvised tricks. Behind the Voorhis plan are 22 years of credit research and considerable body of literature expounding the principles of national debt-free money, the ratio of production and consumption as the governing factor in prices, and the national dividend to which the citizens' victory bonus is akin. The Voorhis plan can be clothed in an argument rich in practical data and theoretical justifications. It would absolutely prevent such impeding of our defense effort as both the French and British suffered from deference to financial conservatism. The Voorhis plan is as superior to Nazi finance for building a war machine as Nazi mechanized warfare proved itself in May 1940 superior to the first World War conception of the French General Staff.

Annual Commencement of Houghton College and Seminary, Houghton, N. Y.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEWEY SHORT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, why should we wait until a man is dead before saying kind things about him? Why not pay him some tribute while he is still living and can appreciate it? Why not pronounce an encomium while he is still alive and vital and all his family can take both comfort and courage to carry on?

On Monday morning, June 9, 1941, our very able and distinguished colleague from New York, DANIEL ALDEN REED, gave a remarkable address at the annual commencement of Houghton College and Seminary at Houghton, N. Y., which is not only a challenge to the youth of America today but which is also a message of encouragement and hope to a disillusioned and bitter generation. His excellent speech is so full of elevated thoughts and is expressed in such eloquent language that even the most cynical among us should be convinced not only of its truth but so moved by its inspirational idealism that we will carry on and go forward in a broken, bruised, and bleeding world.

After Congressman REED finished his address to a wonderfully fine group of Christian young men and women of this institution of learning that trains mind, body, and soul, he was presented by Dean Ray W. Hazlett to President Stephen W. Paine who conferred upon him the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws:

Dean HAZLETT. Mr. President, we would be the most sanguine of optimists if we should fondly believe that any faint echo of what we say here this particular day in June in the year of our Lord 1941 will surmount the tumult or shatter the silence of 10 decades hence. And we would be the most self-infatuated of egotists, were we wistfully or willfully to imagine that any record of our present participation, or even of our presence on this planet, will be handed down to a posterity separated from us by 1,000 aphelions and perihelions in time and space—if indeed there remains then a recognizably human posterity that has survived the disintegrating forces of hate and destruction that surround us and threaten to engulf our civilization.

Nevertheless, we still believe that there are regenerative influences that will resist the corrosion of the centuries and the mutation of millenniums. I have already mentioned personality in the area of Christian scholarship; I would now like to add a second permeating principle—namely, that of personality in the area of Christian statesmanship. There is no essential difference between these complementary and reciprocal categories. Christian love and life service is the common cohesive principle of a happy, enduring society and a sound and stable government. In fact, the teachings of Jesus Christ contain the ideal democracy, and His life comprehends the essence of the democratic spirit. As the baccalaureate speaker of yesterday so forcefully expressed it, the Kingdom of God is to be found in the hearts of the humblest and the poorest and the weakest, as well as of the greatest and the wisest and the strongest—a simple, unostentatious kingdom waiting to be released in the lives of each of us as a positive aseptic principle and principle of good wherever we are, and as an antiseptic force to destroy hate and unselfishness, and to abolish evil and human misery wherever they are found. Truly, he who would be the greatest in this kingdom must be the servant of all.

The whole career of our distinguished speaker of the morning is a living exemplification of both Christian scholarship and Christian statesmanship in a democracy. Educated at our great neighboring university at Cornell—partly, we may assume, because Wheaton then seemed to lie too far away on the western prairies, and partly because Houghton was hidden among the encircling hills of the Genesee Valley, and besides was not qualified to grant college degrees in 1899—his service has been characterized by altruism rather than aggrandizement, by a love of people rather than of abstract humanity, and by devotion to the dictates of duty and conscience rather than to the demands of expediency and popular caprice. Content to start the practice of law in his home city of Dunkirk, he was soon appointed to a position of trust and honor in the legal excise department of his own State, and shortly thereafter became an eminent jurist who presented his cases with equity and eloquence before the highest tribunals of the Nation. His ever-widening sphere of influence became international in its scope when in 1918 he was appointed to head a special mission to France as the representative of the Government of the United States. Upon his return in 1919 he was elected from the Forty-third District of New York State to the Sixty-sixth Congress—an office which he has filled with the best interests of his satisfied constituency at heart to this present hour. His legislative acumen as a member of the all-important Ways and Means Committee is nationally appreciated and applauded.

I consider it a rare privilege and a very great honor to present this exponent of loyal, intelligent citizenship in action and service, this exemplar of the civic righteousness that exalteth a nation, of the constitutional rights and democratic liberties which our forefathers fought for and dedicated with their blood, this exegeter of the highest type of American education and Christian statesmanship—the Honorable DANIEL A. REED for the degree of Doctor of Laws.

President PAINE. DANIEL A. REED, we understand that in your mail you are frequently addressed as the Honorable DANIEL A. REED. This, no doubt, is a short way of calling you Honorable Mr. REED. Your friends at Houghton deem you worthy of this adjective. Through your years of legal practice, through your years as our Representative in Congress we feel that you have guarded well your good name, and that your diligent labors in the Legislative Halls of the Nation make you more worthy than ever of the title "Honorable." Today Houghton College wishes to join those who honor you for your faithful stewardship.

And now, under the authority of the regents of the State of New York, and of the trustees and faculty of Houghton College, I confer upon you the degree of Doctor of Laws, honoris causa, in token of which I present you with this diploma, and cause you to be invested with the proper academic costume.

Mr. Speaker, this is a fitting tribute to one of our great Americans who is admired for his intellect, respected for his integrity, and loved for his character by all who know him. As Emerson once said: "What you are speaks so loud that I cannot hear what you say." All of us who know DAN REED—his students while he was coach at Cornell University, his most intimate friends and neighbors, his colleagues in the House of Representatives—rejoice that this signal honor has been wisely and graciously bestowed upon him. He is worthy of it.

For nearly a quarter of a century DAN REED has been a Member of the Congress of the United States, serving for many years on the powerful Ways and Means Committee, loyal to his friends, devoted to his duties, and always placing the interests of his own country first. Never has he wavered or faltered in keeping his oath to uphold, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States. Modest, diligent, unassuming, calm, deliberate, kind, accommodating, and helpful to all classes and kinds of men; with a penetrating insight, sagacious discernment, and a soul filled with sympathy and affection for all who toil and suffer, DAN REED has won for himself an abiding and eternal place of affection in the hearts of his fellowmen. I am sure that all the Members of the House of Representatives, Republicans and Democrats alike, join with me in congratulating him upon this well-deserved honor that has been bestowed upon him by such a fine Christain college and in wishing for him and his good family life's richest blessings.

Under the leave granted me to extend my remarks, I include the following address delivered by Congressman REED before the graduates of the various schools of Houghton College on June 9, 1941. It speaks for itself more beautifully and convincingly than I could in any words describe it:

ADDRESS BY HON. DANIEL ALDEN REED BEFORE THE GRADUATES OF HOUGHTON COLLEGE, AT HOUGHTON, N. Y., JUNE 9, 1941

I am delighted and highly honored to be with you on this happy occasion. I am grateful to President Stephen W. Paine and to the trustees and the faculty for the invitation to again visit this beautiful educational institution. To stand before an audience of young men and women, such as I now see before me, is always an inspiration. It gives me faith and hope for the future of our Republic.

Infinite pains and great sacrifices have been made by others to prepare you young men and women to go forth from here to enrich the social, civic, and spiritual life of the Nation. I am sure that there are fathers and mothers in this audience who have sacrificed much that their son or daughter might be equipped to live a more useful and a nobler life. Perhaps I can illustrate the point by a story:

A young man entered one of our universities, and at the end of 4 years won the highest honors for excellent scholarship. The evening for his graduation came. A gold medal was to be presented to him. Seated in the rear of the great hall was a little woman, plainly but neatly dressed. It had been a hard struggle for her to assist her son financially during his 4-year course. The night had arrived, however, when she was to see her son receive high honors. A gold medal was to be presented to her son. The presentation was made. The son left the stage, walked to the back row of chairs where his mother was seated and, in the presence of a great audience, he pinned the medal on her coat. The boy knew that it was she who by her toil and sacrifice had made it possible for him to win his scholastic victory.

I would impress upon you that there are few privileges that any of us enjoy the source of which cannot be traced to the sacrifices made by others. The benefits of the present are largely a heritage from those who have sacrificed for us in the past.

What has been the high purpose of the training you have received during your course here? I believe it can be summarized in the words of Daniel Webster, who once said:

"If we work upon marble, it will perish; if we work upon brass, time will efface it; if we rear temples, they will crumble to the dust. But if we work on men's immortal minds, if we imbue them with high principles, with a just fear of God and love for their fellow men, we shall engrave on these tablets something which no time can efface and which will brighten to all eternity."

I believe that the faculty of Houghton College has engraved on your minds the highest principles of righteousness, a just fear of God, and love for your fellow men. Let neither time nor circumstances efface these fundamental ideals from your mind and heart. Then, too, there is another test you might apply to determine in your own mind the full measure of your education. I believe it was Isocrates who said:

"Whom, then, do I call educated? First, those who control circumstances instead of being mastered by them; those who meet all occasions manfully and act in accordance with intelligent thinking; those who are honorable in all their dealings, who treat good-naturedly persons and things that are disagreeable; and, furthermore, those who hold their pleasures under control and are not overcome by misfortune; finally, those who are not spoiled by success."

These thoughts and principles relating to your education are a great heritage from the past, and it is upon these that the best in civilization has been achieved.

I am interested in you personally. I am anxious to see you succeed. But, naturally, I desire to have you use your influence, as educated citizens of a free country, to preserve, protect, and defend the principles which have made your country great. The Constitution under which you live has come to you as a great heritage. It comes to you in trust to use, then to pass on unimpaired as your bequest in trust to the next generation.

A young college man was heard to say: "There is much to say for nazi-ism, because it has a philosophy, while our Government has none."

It is evident from this young man's remark that he had little, if any, acquaintance with our Government or its background. I cannot urge too strongly at this crucial time that every young man and woman give careful study to his own Government and the philosophy upon which it rests. Succinctly stated, it is, in the words of the immortal Lincoln, "A Government of the people, by the people, and for the people."

It is a grand and glorious thing to feel that you are a sovereign citizen in your own right.

That you live under a Government conducted by you through agents of your own choice who can exercise only such powers as you, as a sovereign citizen, have bestowed upon them.

Our original Constitution was mostly derived from the history and from the experience of the American Colonies and States. Most of its provisions are purely American in origin. There are many provisions of the Federal Constitution which were lifted almost verbatim from the State constitutions. The important thing for each of you to remember is that each officer of the Government can exercise legally only such powers as are granted to him or such powers as may be implied from those expressly given.

I would impress upon you that in every sense of the word the Constitution under which you live is the expression of the sovereign will of a sovereign people. You will often hear it said that the Constitution was drawn by men whose property interests were then at stake; that they were not interested in human rights. Beware of the purpose of such propaganda, for it states only a half truth, which by itself creates prejudice in the minds of the thoughtless. The fact is that we are not living under the Constitution as it was drawn. There were men who insisted upon a Bill of Rights, the adoption of which had to be assured before the States would agree to ratify the Constitution. The preservation of the individual liberties, guaranteed to each of you in the Bill of Rights, is a heritage of liberty which, if you are to remain free and sovereign citizens, you must be ever on the alert to preserve and protect. What are some of these liberties?

The Bill of Rights, which is a heritage for the protection of your freedom from governmental tyranny, is of vital consequence in this day of world chaos and madness. Among your liberties are:

Religious freedom.

Freedom of speech and of the press.

Security from unreasonable search and seizures as it relates to your persons, houses, and papers.

The right of jury trial.

The right of habeas corpus.

From bills of attainder or any ex post facto law.

From any involuntary servitude.

The right of peaceable assembly and the right to petition the Government for redress of grievances.

These are only a few of some 24 personal liberties guaranteed to you as free sovereign citizens.

There is one department of the Federal Government, the chief function of which is to protect from invasion the liberties of the people. The Supreme Court of the United States is your Court—the people's Court. It stands guard to repel any tyrannical usurpation of power on the part of the Executive or of the Congress. The danger to a free people from tampering with the Court was well expressed more than a century ago. William Tudor warned:

"Whenever any set of men shall entertain designs against the Constitution, either to overwhelm it in the anarchy of simple democracy or to found on its ruins a usurpation of monarchial power, they will commence their operations by open or insidious attacks to weaken or overthrow the judiciary."

You must realize, if you would remain free sovereign citizens, that you must resist with all your influence any attempt to weaken or destroy the independence of the courts.

I wish you might have been present at the unveiling of a marvelous painting in the rotunda of the Capitol at Washington. The artist, Howard Chandler Christy, with superb skill has produced the scene of the signing of the Federal Constitution. The characters seem to be life-size and lifelike. Among them, seated not far from George Washington, is the venerable Dr. Benjamin Franklin, and near him sits young Alexander Hamilton. They are conversing. Hamilton is saying to Dr. Franklin: "What have we here?" To which the Doctor replies: "We have a Republic if we know enough to keep it."

The task before us is to preserve and protect our heritage. Let us remember these words:

"That which raises a country, that which strengthens a country, and that which dignifies a country—that which spreads her power, creates her moral influence, and makes her respected and submitted to, bends the hearts of millions, and bows down the pride of nations to her—the instrument of obedience, the fountain of supremacy, the true throne, crown and scepter * * * is character."

So long as you and others like you can maintain the ideals, traditions, and fundamental principles upon which our Republic rests, you will find no lack of opportunities to serve and to succeed. But you young men and women may feel that, even equipped as you are mentally, physically, and morally to commence active life, there may be lurking in your mind that there are others more fortunate to meet the competition of these times. Do not yield to any such inferiority complex. Let me very briefly present a picture for your consideration.

In the fall of 1917, during the darkest days of the World War, I was in France. While in Paris an elderly French professor of the old University of Grignon invited me to visit that institution. I was reluctant to accept because I felt that most of the young French students were at the front, that there would be little to see at the university, except the buildings and the campus. Much to my surprise, I found the classrooms filled, not with physically sound young men but with the maimed, blind, legless, armless, and the physically handicapped injured soldiers. I saw elderly men who had been blind for years, guiding young men to the chapel to listen to inspiring music. These old men were impressing upon the minds of the young men, recently blinded at the front, that life could be beautiful and that they could be happy and useful in their community once they were trained for some new vocation. Not only the blind but others who had been torn by shot and shell were being taught some vocation suitable to overcome their respective physical disabilities.

This humanitarian service made a deep impression upon my mind and heart. Here were men being rehabilitated not only physically to engage eventually in some gainful occupation, but to be restored spiritually.

I came back to this country in 1918. I was elected that fall to Congress. As a member of the Committee on Education, and later as its chairman, I fought for appropriations to carry on this work of rehabilitation, first for our veterans and then for all physically handicapped persons. What has been the result? There have been 120,000 physically handicapped persons retrained and placed in gainful occupations. If these unfortunate persons had been permitted to become public charges, the annual cost would amount to $60,000,000, but, as a result of the expenditure of a total of $36,000,000, these persons are now self-supporting. One large industrial plant employs over 11,000 such retrained men and women.

I want you who are physically fit, well educated, to face the world determined to succeed. Let no handicaps stop you.

Furthermore, my good friends and fellow graduates, you are destined to live in an age when there will be thousands of opportunities available to you which were not existent a generation ago. Science is far out on the horizon, beckoning millions of young men and women to enter into a new inheritance. War, cruel, barbarous, and devastating as it is, will end. The laboratory and the Patent Office will turn the benefits of research into the activities of peace. The chemurgic age is here. You will live to see agriculture come into its own. We hear much about the sorry plight of the farmer, but for the farmers of tomorrow a new, brighter, more interesting, and more prosperous day is dawning. Chemurgy is now turning the waste material of the dairy into beads, buttons, belts, and other useful products.

The time is not far distant when instead of taking farm land out of production, millions of acres now abandoned will be required to supply industry with the raw material for the manufacture of an infinite variety of useful products.

You young people are stepping out into a new world of hope and opportunity. While you are the legatees of the labor and research of others, the bequest you educated young men and women make to future generations will, I believe, surpass by far that which others have bequeathed to you.

Finally, let me remind you of the great responsibility that is yours. Remember that:

"There is no act of man which is not the beginning of a chain of consequences so long that no human providence is high enough to give us a prospect to the end."

National Youth Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD A. KELLY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 6, 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. EDWARD A. KELLY, OF ILLINOIS

Mr. KELLY of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, the following is an address delivered by me on May 17, 1941, at the dedication of the National Youth Administration Experience School at Chicago Heights, Ill.:

Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, leaders of industry and education, ladies and gentlemen, in coming here tonight to participate in the dedication of this building that will house the National Youth Administration Experience School, on the south end of Cook County, I shall endeavor to carry on my part in this program in a creditable manner.

As a Member of the United States Congress for the past 11 years it has been my privilege to voice my opinions and support in its behalf.

In creating the National Youth Administration, as a Federal Security Agency, to secure for the youth in this Nation a proper and better course for them to follow, many people ask the question why was it necessary for the Federal Government to undertake such a task and the answer is that during the height of the depression and the years following, with the tremendous avalanche of unemployment facing this Nation, there was no discrimination as to ages, and the youth as well as their elders faced the future with but little hopes that they could serve in some capacity beneficial to mankind.

So, with a new phenomenon facing this country and recognizing the serious nature of the problem of youth unemployment and its undesirable implications for a healthy society, Congress created the National Youth Administration to attempt at least a partial remedy for what was becoming an alarming situation.

This new agency almost immediately upon creation found itself faced with a twofold function. Not only was it necessary to alleviate present distress but at the same time it was necessary to make an effort to determine the basic causes of youth unemployment, its extent and nature, and to conceive and promote plans for an effective and permanent solution. There are people sitting here on this platform who you will hear from that can give to you a more vivid picture than I of the necessity of this project.

These problems and their solutions became the problems of every man elected to public office; upon them rested the responsibilities to their communities. I have had the pleasure of serving in Congress the city of Chicago Heights, Ill., during my tenure of office. You of Chicago Heights have had some fine chief executives. The late Judge Hood, for whom I always had a very deep admiration; the Honorable Daniel Bergin, that upon an occasion as early as 1934 foresaw the future depletion of our youth unless something along this nature materialized; and the present mayor, from whom you will hear a little later who will address you upon the subject The Tragic Waste of Youth Power.

Not only was it necessary to alleviate the present distress and to make an effort to determine the basic causes of youth unemployment, it required exhaustive studies undertaken by the N. Y. A. as well as other Government and private agencies.

Vocational guidance a century ago consisted for the most part of advice given by relatives and friends. This, coupled with the academic training given in school, was believed to constitute aid for the individual in selecting one of a limited number of vocations usually open to him. Family tradition, restricted mobility, and an economy of nonindustrial nature effectively served to limit one's occupational choices. With the advent of a large-scale manufacture, increasing specialization of industry made it very difficult, if not impossible, for the young person to make, with the customary aid, a sound choice of occupation.

Agencies willing or able to provide vocational guidance were relatively rare. Sampling various kinds of work by drifting from job to job represented the only method used. Vocational maladjustment, with its waste in cost of training, inefficient work, personal dissatisfaction, and high turn-over, was an inevitable concomitant of such method.

Although the adverse effect of vocational maladjustment on emotional life and the prevalence of social unrest was apparent, cultural lag was retarding the acceptance and growth of vocational guidance facilities. Conditions were slowly improving, but the available facilities could only help a small percentage of those in need of guidance.

In a great many cases, also, it was found that the doors of employment were shut to youth because they lacked the required "work experience." In such cases they were faced with the dilemma of not being able to obtain work because they had no experience and not being able to obtain experience because they could not obtain jobs. Work had to be provided if this impasse was to be avoided.

Continued rebuffs were resulting in disintegration of personality, lowering of morale, and destruction of values.

In order to get authentic information of the distress that was facing our youth, those drilled in educational institutions patriotically gave their services to this Nation with information and also themselves to try and solve these problems, while they hide away in the background, unnoticed in many cases, a grateful Nation and those who lived and labored with these problems will never forget the full measure of their devotion.

Some years back—in fact, on the last day of December 1937—I was called to a manufacturers' meeting held in the city of Harvey, Ill., and discussed problems in general with those assembled. One of the problems that I called attention to was what are we going to do with our young generation. I specifically called attention to these men that I thought they should give at least 2 days' work per week in order that these boys and girls might have some knowledge of skilled work in case the wheels of industry were geared up. Some agreed, others did not, but it is, as always, the opinions of men that make it possible for democracy to work, and I am proud to know that industry is cooperating 100 percent with the National Youth Administration.

In all our troubles, domestic and foreign, and the solving of our problems women have played a major part. Women especially have contributed more than their share in building up the National Youth Administration, because it is the women who have to bear the brunt of suffering when a crisis envelops a nation. It is with their encouragement that inspires man to carry on. One of the finest contributions I have ever read about the courage of women is the inscription on the monument dedicated to the pioneer women of America at Ponca City, Okla., depicting the lives of all American women.

In conclusion I wish to quote the words of the President of the United States in his message to Congress asking for their consideration for this noble project, in which he said: "Democracy is not a static thing. It is an everlasting march, for when our children grow up they, too, will have problems to solve. It is for us, however, manfully to set ourselves to the task of preparations for them, so as to some degree the difficulties they must overcome may weigh less heavily upon them. I am confident that the American people, understanding these problems, and having put their shoulders to the wheel, will build a better America for the children yet to come."

Eternal Vigilance Will Preserve the American Way of Life

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LESLIE C. ARENDS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following address delivered by the Honorable JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., Republican leader in the House of Representatives and Chairman of the Republican National Committee. This very timely and able address was delivered in my district June 23, 1941, before the McLean County, Ill., Women's Republican Club, Bloomington, Ill. The address follows:

Madam Chairman, ladies of the McLean County Women's Republican Club, and fellow citizens, it is always a very great pleasure for me to visit the State of Illinois. It is an even greater pleasure to attend the annual banquet of the McLean County Women's Republican Club. The women of America have contributed much to good government, and they will contribute much more. The Republican women have been a tower of strength to the Republican Party. The pleasure of being here is augmented by the fact that I can be with my good friend, Representative ARENDS, who, as you undoubtedly are aware, is one of the outstanding Representatives of the State of Illinois. He is also one of the sound, sane, solid, dependable Members of the United States Congress as well. Starting at the foot of the Military Affairs Committee, he has risen in seniority until he is our third ranking member. This committee, as you know, has carried a tremendous burden in the last 2 years. The Seventeenth District of Illinois is fortunate in times like these to have a Representative like Mr. ARENDS in the House. His work as a legislator has been of great value to the Nation and to his party. I sincerely hope you will keep him in Congress for many years to come.

We find ourselves here tonight midway between Flag Day, which is past, and the Fourth of July, which is to come. Those two events have vast significance in this year of 1941.

It is going to tax the courage, patriotism, self-reliance, energy, and ingenuity of the American people to make certain the flag, to which we all paid a special homage on the 14th of this month, shall continue to be the symbol of enlightenment, individual liberty, free constitutional government, free press, free religious and political beliefs, in short, the symbol of our American way of government and our American way of life.

It is going to require not only great vigilance, but a consecrated devotion to country, to liberty, and a profound faith in Almighty God to perpetuate that real independence which we celebrate on each Fouth of July.

It is going to tax the patience, perseverance, and determination of the American people to maintain and to perpetuate the biparty system of government which has been evolved in this Nation over the years as the best form of free constitutional government in the world.

Many grave new stresses and strains are pressing upon us to swerve us from a continuation of our American way of government and of life. Some of these pressures are brought about by design. Some are brought about by force of circumstances. All of them must be watched if we are to keep the torch of liberty aflame on the continent of North America while the rest of the world is engulfed in the conflicts of war.

Tremendous tasks and gigantic responsibilities confronts us. We have in 8 years accumulated the most stupendous national debt ever piled up in any country in the world. On top of that colossal debt we must now pile another even greater debt, because we must build, and build quickly, a national defense which will be impregnable against any assault which could come from any source at any time in the future. That defense must be built as efficiently, as quickly, as economically as possible. We must make ourselves strong enough in long-range airplanes of the necessary military types, in tanks, in ships, in guns, and munitions to help maintain peace and liberty in the world without having to engage in armed conflict.

We want peace, but we can have peace only by being prepared for war. In this critical hour we cannot afford the luxury of strikes which will retard the defense of America.

When boys are being drafted at $21 a month, the people demand they have the guns, the ships, and the planes to equip them for their efforts. We must not fail the boys who are laying their jobs, their futures, and their lives upon the altar of security for their country.

We have a tremendous advantage—for which God be thanked—in our geographical location on the globe. We are removed from quarreling Europe by 3,000 miles of stormy Atlantic Ocean. We are removed from the conflicts of the Far East by the thousands of miles of Pacific seas. Nevertheless, we must build our national defense with the greatest expediency, efficiency, and economy possible. We must begin to cut down, and to cut down drastically, on the nondefense expenditures. Taxes necessitated by all these expenditures are going to be enormously heavy. While we are doing these things, we must be very vigilant against being persuaded by a highly organized propaganda to give up one by one our liberties in this country when such sacrifices are not necessary.

We must beware of the power and the danger of political propaganda. It has been by the power of organized propaganda that the liberties, the freedom, the property, and the very ideals, cultural and spiritual, have been filched from the peoples of many other nations. It has been by the power of such propaganda that peoples once proud, cultured, and with a bright and shining history of past achievement have succumbed to the tyranny of dictatorships in other parts of the world.

The threat to our free institutions from propaganda is very real. We see the present administration spending nearly $100,000,000 a year for propaganda purposes. The air, the press, the movies, and the mails carry a flood of appealing arguments.

It's a tremendous influence which can be put into motion by the forces of the administration. We can see how difficult it is for the opposing side to be heard.

The one hope is an alert and intelligent citizenry.

Eternal vigilance is not only the price of liberty—today it is the price of peace as well.

As we move nearer and nearer to war, we move more and more toward the consolidation of power in the Federal Government against which we have been warned by every statesman from George Washington down to the present day.

The American people must be constantly on guard to save their rights and liberties. This was strikingly revealed by the demand of the administration for the so-called seizure bill.

That bill, as originally requested, would have given more power to the Executive than was asked to fight and win the first World War. The administration wanted the power to take the watch out of your pocket; or the small savings account you have accumulated through years of thrift and toil. It sought the power to seize your newspaper, your business, your home, or your farm at any price the President should fix, and to sell it to whomsoever he desired at whatever price he pleased. It wanted the power to thus take your property to sell, destroy, or to hold and operate for all time.

If this bill passed the Congress as demanded by the administration, America would have found itself with a first class dictatorship in operation here at home.

The mighty voice of the Nation was raised in opposition to this proposal. Now it is being urged in a modified form, although the President already has plenty of power to break any jam in the defense production. The incident clearly shows how dependent the people of America are on an alert and courageous Republican Party.

There was no need or excuse for this demand for superconstitutional powers. I pledge you here and now we will keep faith with the people and fight to protect their rights and privileges.

I wish to speak plainly to you here tonight. I wish I could speak as plainly to every man and woman in the United States. I want to say to you, the ideals of our forefathers, our free constitutional government, our Bill of Rights, our American way of life, will be preserved and perpetuated by the vigilance, the common sense, the patriotism, and the love of liberty of our own people here at home.

We are standing tonight, my fellow citizens, on the threshold of a great decision. Are we going to admit that constitutional Republic set up by our forefathers is only a fair-weather Government, and, to meet present world conditions, we must abandon our form of government and our way of life for the same kind of totalitarianism we are opposing? Or are we going to stand firm on the ground that grants of powers to the executive branch of the Government shall have reasonable time limits placed upon them and shall expire with the ending of an emergency? Either we shall decide our way of government and of life are not as effective under modern conditions as the way of despotism, of absolutism, or of communism, or we are going to stand fast on the American way of doing things and demonstrate the superiority of that way.

In deciding these questions we may be deciding whether or not our people shall, for generations to come, live under the totalitarian power of the Federal Government until perhaps they may become so accustomed—so conditioned—to servitude under an all-powerful Central Government that freedom such as we now know will be but a dim memory and a futile hope.

There comes to my mind as I speak to you here tonight a profound question touching the whole of human life and experience—touching the whole of human society and human government—which the Man of Nazareth propounded when he asked:

"What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

Well may we ask ourselves tonight, "What shall it profit us—or the rest of the world—if, in trying to preserve liberty for others, we shall lose our own liberty here at home?"

In these hectic days we must not overlook the significance of what is happening in our Federal courts. Six years ago the people won a famous victory in preventing the packing of the Supreme Court. Happy over their victory to protect the American form of government, they lapsed into a renewed sense of security. But time marched relentlessly on.

Now we find the Supreme Court and most of the other Federal courts have been thoroughly packed.

There is no longer any effort to maintain a balanced court of political philosophy or economics, as has been the American conception in the past. Only men of a specific philosophy are honored with judicial appointments. This must be of grave concern to all the thinking people of this country.

When the New Deal administration came into power in 1933 there were five Republicans and four Democrats on the Supreme Court bench. Now there are seven Democrats and two Republicans.

In the 9 years of the New Deal administration not a single Republican has been appointed to the Supreme Court. That is in contrast to the appointment of two Democrats by previous Republican Presidents. If Republicans have been given any recognition in the lower Federal courts, such instances have escaped me.

It is true, a Republican and a great jurist—Justice Stone—was elevated to the Chief Justiceship. We all hailed that as a good appointment; but the whole record is one which rightfully gives the American people much concern.

It indicates very forcibly the one hope of those who want a balanced government must be realized through the election of a Republican House in 1942.

As sinister events tread on one another's heels, and as the outlook becomes darker and darker, we must, in making our decisions, reflect long and deeply upon the possible consequences of such decisions as we shall make. We must not give up liberty in America. We must keep uppermost in our minds the preservation and the perpetuation of free government and free enterprise; of free press and free speech; of religious and political liberty in this Nation. If the way of free, constitutional government does not prove adequate to meet the situation which confronts us today, it will not be the fault of our plan of government or our plan of life; it will be because we have become so soft and because we have been beguiled so far from the ideals of our forefathers that we lack the courage to uphold liberty and freedom and culture in this Nation. I, for one, shall never believe the American people have lost their courage or their self-reliance until I see it happen.

We do have those among us who are hostile to our ideals. For 8 years there has been too much coddling of the Communists. They have been entertained and dined by high officials. They have been allowed—indeed, encouraged—to flourish in our schools, our labor organizations, and in the Government itself.

It was revealed 2 years ago that more than 3,000 men and women with communistic affiliations are holding posts with the Government—some in positions of extreme importance.

Everybody has known of the infiltration of Communists into a few of our labor organizations.

The administration long failed to act in the face of this growing menace. As the great national crisis became more acute the short-sightedness of the course became obvious, and efforts are quite properly being made now to clean up the subversive elements in labor organizations. For the good of the country and the good of labor itself this clean-up must be brought about.

I would suggest the Government could proceed with its job with better grace if it cleaned out its own ranks. Any man or woman who seeks to destroy the American form of government and the American way of life must be separated from the Government pay roll and rendered harmless to the national defense.

While these problems of war and of defense engage our attention, we must not forget the grave domestic problems which remain to be solved. Those internal problems have been obscured by the excitement over war and the hasty activities of building the national defense, but they have not been solved, even in a small degree. Quite to the contrary, many of these domestic problems are being aggravated by events which are transpiring. We must be on our guard lest these problems, hidden now under the mists of propaganda, and the clouds of fear, and the smoke of preparation, shall suddenly loom up like ugly peaks out of the clouds to wreck our Nation.

We must be alert to the dangers which may confront us while war continues. We must also be alert to what may be even greater dangers which will confront us in the economic chaos, sure to follow the war, when the battling nations have been bled white and have become financially exhausted.

We must, at all hazards, my fellow citizens, maintain the biparty system of government in this country. We must maintain the right to question, and the right constructively to criticize whatever methods are employed, whatever policies are pursued in the prosecution of our own affairs. Let us not forget that even in England constructive criticism has not been suppressed.

Now, this may seem a dark picture. It is a dark picture. For long years we have taken all of the freedom, and the liberties, and the privileges embraced in the Bill of Rights as matters of course. We are now suddenly confronted with the necessity to fight spiritually, culturally, politically, and socially to maintain and perpetuate those liberties for ourselves, and our children, and our children's children.

But, dark as the picture may seem, there is a bright side. We have the greatest capacity for the production of necessities and luxuries of peace or the implements of war of any nation in the world. Our capacity to produce exceeds that of all the nations of Europe combined. We have the most enlightened people in the world. Our wage earners, with good leadership, will be found to be the most patriotic, intelligent, and capable workmen in the world.

I am confident the sons and the daughters of those pioneers who came to the uncharted shores of North America, and by their courage, self-reliance, energy, and thrift carved out of the plains and the forests of this continent the great, rich, enlightened and powerful Nation which is ours today—the sons and daughters of those pioneers, I say—will meet the trials and the tests which confront us, and they will keep burning brightly the torch of liberty here in the United States. The lamps of freedom will not be extinguished. They will continue to burn here in our own beloved land as a beacon of hope to those peoples who have been subjugated, whose liberties have been wrested from them, whose rights have been trampled upon, and whose countries have been devastated by the ruthless depredations of godless dictators.

These lamps of freedom will be kept burning by the election of a Republican House of Representatives in 1942. We must have a Republican House to stand guard; to see to it that the enormous powers which have been given to the executive branch of the Government are properly used and then promptly returned to the Congress and the people when the emergency is ended.

Liberty will again reign in those places in the world where it has been temporarily extinguished.

The American people have the intelligence, the capacity, the patriotism, the industrial plant, the natural resources, the geographical position, and the will to preserve the American way of free government and the American way of free life. They will do it.

In this critical hour America demands unselfish and patriotic leadership. It must be a leadership which will subordinate poltical aims and aspirations to the vital job of making America safe. It must be a leadership big enough to forget old prejudices and bitterness and make us a united country. It must be a leadership which will not permit anyone or anything to interfere with marshaling 100 percent production in our struggles to arm America.

We have the money; we have the resources; we have the manpower to keep ourselves an unconquerable people. All we need is the spirit and the determination to utilize the priceless advantages we possess.

We must throw out the Communists, the Fascists, all "fifth columnists." We must make sure no Trojan horses are hidden anywhere in America. We must put the "palace guards" who would remake America back into their realm of theories while practical men save the Nation. We must squelch the wreckers and selfish exploiters who have too long taken the country on a perilous "joy ride."

We must be all out for a united America—an America true to its philosophy and ideals; an America in which the people shall continue to rule; an America determined to remain free and to work out its destiny in its own way.

With such a true American spirit we can have a united country, and in this unity we will have the strength and the courage to overcome any obstacle or any foe.

What Happens to a War Order Marked "Rush"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT J. ENGEL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

ARTICLE BY WALTER TROHAN

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Walter Trohan in the Chicago Tribune entitled "What Happens to a War Order Marked 'Rush' ":

[From the Chicago Tribune of June 14, 1941]

WHAT HAPPENS TO A WAR ORDER MARKED "RUSH!"—A TOUR THROUGH MAZES OF RED TAPE

(By Walter Trohan)

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 13.—The Tribune today presents the story of a single British "rush order" for war supplies. The story presents an amazing picture of what goes on behind the scenes in American arms production and the drive to speed aid to Britain.

The reporter tracked the jungles of British and American red tape on the trail of a contract for a vital item of military equipment. The quarry was tracked down when the trail was nearly 4 months old.

It is estimated that another 3 months will have elapsed before the material reaches the front at which it is needed. By that time the need for the material may have long since disappeared, but that is the risk that red tape brings.

THE STORY STARTS

Here is the story:

First week of March 1941: Colonel A., with the sun-baked forces of Gen. Sir Archibald Wavell on the Libyan front, was impressed with the performance of an American combat vehicle. The vehicle was of a type which American industry is ready and equipped to turn out in quantity. The colonel persuaded his superiors that 250 of these combat vehicles were needed to stem the advance of Axis Powers. His request was given quick clearance by General Wavell and a requisition was cabled to London.

March 7 to April 10: The requisition made the round of British bureaucracy. More than 70 signatures were required before the order was given final approval. In that period it was examined by dozens of major and minor bureau heads and passed through several ministries. Several cables were exchanged between Cairo and London on minor specifications. Dozens of copies were made of the order.

LONDON CABLES WASHINGTON

April 11: London cabled British purchasing agents in Washington to ask that the 250 units be procured under the lend-lease program, which had been passed since Colonel A. made his original request.

April 11 to April 17: The order went the round of British purchasing offices here before it reached the proper hands. More signatures were necessary before the request could be transmitted to the American Government.

April 17: Two British businessmen, dollar-a-year men attached to the British purchasing mission office, walked into the War Department office of Colonel XYZ, who is in charge of procurement of the item being sought. The American colonel, in sympathy with the need of the British colonel, who by that time had been waiting 1 month for the needed material, promised every aid. The American colonel, a reservist called to active service because of special aptitude, reported in the strictest confidence that he could have called up several pals in the manufacturing business and have had them turn out the needed 250 items by "a week from next Wednesday." However, the operation of the Lend Lease Act requires that he first secure a directive. Only the President of the United States can authorize expenditures under the Lend Lease Act.

MAKING THE ROUNDS

April 18: Started on round of War Department.

April 19: Saturday and half day in the Government. Nothing done on order in question.

April 20: Sunday full holiday.

April 21: Order continued round of War Department.

April 22: Order moved across the street to Federal Reserve Building to desk of Lend Lease Administrator Harry Hopkins. Full day required for the trip.

April 22 to April 29: Order glided around spirals of red tape in Hopkins' office. Snagged several times. One day required to send order few blocks to White House.

April 30: Order in White House for President's signature. Mr. Roosevelt busy writing speech urging Nation to buy defense stamps and bonds so that armament production can be speeded.

May 1: President calls for creation of a 2,000,000-ton shipping pool to speed shipment of war supplies to Britain. Order remains unsigned.

CONFERENCE ON SPEED

May 2: President lunches with Lord Halifax, British Ambassador, and Malcolm MacDonald, Canadian high commissioner, to consider means of speeding shipment of supplies to Britain. Order unsigned.

May 3: President leaves for week-end in Virginia retreat, leaving order behind.

May 4: President busy delivering speech at Staunton, Va., birthplace of Woodrow Wilson, asserting America is ready to fight for the kind of faith which actuated the World War President.

May 5: Order still unsigned. President ill.

May 6: In a speech which had the blessing of the President, Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson said that Britain is beaten unless aid is rushed to her. The President met with his war cabinet to consider ways and means of creating the most powerful bombing fleet in world for Britain. Order still in White House.

May 7: President voted power to seize foreign ships as means of aiding Britain. Order unsigned.

PRESIDENT IS BUSY

May 8 to May 12: President believed busy writing major speech for delivery before Pan American Union, which was to carry forward his aid-to-Britain program. Speech canceled because of President's illness. Order unsigned.

May 12 to May 26: Order still in White House.

May 27: President Roosevelt in radio address to Nation proclaims unlimited emergency in calling on Nation to make all-out effort to bring victory to British cause. No action on order.

May 28: President rests from speech effort. No action on order.

May 29 to June 3: President leaves for week end at Hyde Park, N. Y. Leaves order behind.

June 4: Colonel XYZ hears order was signed by President. However, he is unable to act on verbal order. Must await actual document.

June 5 and June 6: Order en route to Colonel XYZ.

June 7: Order reached Colonel XYZ. Because of his sympathy for British fellow officer, who has now been waiting 3 months, the American officer takes the order personally over to the Office of Production Management, where 12 signatures are required before the contract can be cleared. Secures 2 signatures.

ANOTHER SPEECH MAKER

June 8: Key O. P. M. official out of town delivering a radio speech calling for prompt action to aid Britain. Day lost.

June 9: Secures five signatures.

June 10: Secures all the remaining signatures. If Colonel XYZ had not personally carried this order to the O. P. M. offices himself it would have spent 3 weeks to a month shuttling around the various offices.

June 11: Bids are asked on the contract. Here the story ends for the present, but Colonel A is still a long way both in time and distance from the combat vehicles he asked the first week in March.

Next week contracts will be signed. More signatures. The material will be turned out in 2 weeks. Inspection will necessitate more signatures. Shipping by freight will require more signatures. Still more will be needed to get the items aboard a vessel bound for their destination.

By late August, with the best of luck, Colonel A, of His Majesty's North African forces, may see the first of the vehicles he ordered—if he is still alive and if there is a British North Africa.

Strikes in Defense Industries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JARED Y. SANDERS, JR.
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to call attention to the testimony given yesterday by Hon. Donald M. Nelson, Purchasing Director for the Office of Production Management, before the House Appropriations Subcommittee. In his testimony Mr. Nelson is quoted as stating that the Office of Production Management "very definitely" takes into consideration labor difficulties and interferences in placing orders and locating new manufacturing facilities.

In connection with this testimony, I desire to call attention to the very fine record of the workers in my home State of Louisiana. We have had only one strike to date affecting any national-defense unit or program in the entire State of Louisiana, and that was settled in a few days. Alien influences, who have no doubt contributed to labor unrest in other sections, are practically nonexistent in the State of Louisiana. The surplus labor is available and anxious to be employed. The spirit of the people there cannot be surpassed in any section anywhere. In addition to which there continues to exist the urgent necessity for decentralizing our defense industries, and to date but an infinitesimal portion of defense industries have been located in Louisiana.

The Louisiana State Federation of Labor has gone on record publicly as being opposed to strikes in defense industries during the national emergency. The resolution, which was adopted at a regular meeting of the executive council of the Louisiana State Federation of Labor on May 11, 1941, well expresses the sentiments of our workers, and reads as follows:

Resolution urging the Louisiana State Federation of Labor affiliated unions to ban strikes during national-defense emergency

Whereas we are now passing through a great national emergency and are engaged in a national effort to increase productions; and

Whereas there now exists a demand for service and sacrifice if necessary; and

Whereas labor is willing to give service and make sacrifices in order to protect the American form of government and our democratic institutions; and

Whereas it is our purpose to guard carefully and protect well the legislative and economic interests of the workingmen and women of this country: Therefore be it

Resolved by the executive council of the Louisiana State Federation of Labor, That it does hereby urge all unions affiliated with the Louisiana State Federation of Labor to adhere to a strict nonstrike policy during the national-defense emergency; however, be it further

Resolved, That the Louisiana State Federation of Labor does oppose the enactment of antistrike, antiunion, and compulsory labor legislation; and be it further

Resolved, That the Louisiana State Federation of Labor do hereby further pledge itself in its devotion to our country, to our unions, to the principles of liberty, freedom, and democracy during the days which lie just ahead, and also repeat our patriotic determination to protect and preserve America and its cherished institutions at any cost.

I have this morning written to Mr. Nelson, commending him for his stand, and calling his attention to this and other advantages to be found in Louisiana.

The letter to Mr. Nelson is as follows:

JUNE 26, 1941.

HON. DONALD M. NELSON,
Purchasing Director, Office of Production Management,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. NELSON: According to the daily press, you are quoted as having testified before the House Appropriations Subcommittee yesterday to the effect that the Office of Production Management "very definitely" takes into consideration labor difficulties and interferences in placing orders and locating new manufacturing facilities.

I am very glad to see your Department taking this position. In this connection, I desire to call your attention to the very excellent labor record of the workers in my home State of Louisiana. To date, we have had only one strike affecting any national-defense unit or program in the entire State of Louisiana, and that was settled in a few days. There is no doubt that some of the strikes in defense industries in other sections of the country have been called, in part at least, through alien influences. Alien influence in Louisiana is very small. The surplus labor is there and anxious to be employed. The spirit of the people cannot be surpassed in any section anywhere.

The Louisiana State Federation of Labor has gone on record publicly as being opposed to strikes in defense industries during the national emergency.

In addition to the attitude of our people, we have a climate unsurpassed in the United States, permitting work outdoors as well as indoors the year around. Fine harbors and three ports, including my home city of Baton Rouge, are to be found in Louisiana and all located in the heart of tremendous reservoirs of natural gas and oil. Power and fuel are there in practically unlimited quantities. Splendid highways cross our State in every direction.

Despite these many natural advantages, almost no defense industries have been located in Louisiana. All of these advantages above cited, together with the urgent need for decentralizing our defense industries, join in urging that you give full consideration to the locaton of defense industries in Louisiana.

I assure you that you will find every Member of the Louisiana delegation, all of the officials of the State from the Governor down, capital and labor, employer and employee alike, ready and willing to cooperate with you and give you all of the information and other assistance possible to enable you to determine defense industries that might be advantageously located in our section.

Very sincerely yours,

J. Y. SANDERS, Jr.,
Member of Congress.

Reduction of Duty on Tungsten Ore and Concentrates

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES F. O'CONNOR
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

STATEMENT BY HON. JAMES F. O'CONNOR, OF MONTANA

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement which I made to the Committee for Reciprocity Information:

In 1939 the Jardine Mining Co., a new venture, produced for the use of American industry 20 tons of concentrates of this much-needed material, averaging 68.2 percent WO_3. In 1940 this mine doubled its production by shipping 42 tons of approximately 70 percent concentrates. This is a high form of tungsten concentrates very much desired by our high speed tool steel industry which ordinarily has to get along as best it may with tungsten concentrates averaging from 40 to 60 percent WO_3.

In the proposed foreign trade agreement with the Republic of Argentina, announced by the State Department May 13 of this year, tungsten ore and concentrates are listed as one of the commodities subject to negotiation for reduction in duty. The import duty on this commodity amounts to 50 cents per pound of tungsten contained in the ore or concentrates. The history of our tungsten production after the last war shows clearly the absolute necessity for tariff protection. Had it not been for this protection there would have been no tungsten mines in operation at the beginning of this present emergency. In normal times tungsten comes in from China at very low prices because Chinese labor receives less than $50 per year whereas American labor engaged in the production of tungsten ore and concentrates receives on an average from $1,250 per year upward.

At the present time there is exploration and prospecting work being carried on in the State of Montana which has already shown additional valuable deposits of tungsten ore to be available. The Jardine Mining Co., in Park County, Mont., has increased its production very materially to meet the present shortage. Any reduction in the import duty on tungsten ore and concentrates will not result in the importation from Argentina for the present emergency of a single additional pound over and above the shipments which will come in without any reduction in duty. However, a reduction in this duty at this time will discourage exploration, prospecting, and development as it did in 1919, 1920, and 1921. Men engaged in exploration, development, and production of tungsten ore will cease development work when they realize that at the end of this emergency the Chinese and other foreign ore will flood in here and cause the loss of their investment of time, work, and money.

While the tungsten-producing industry of Montana is perhaps not as large as that of other States it is entirely probable that it will be increased greatly in the present emergency for the use of our national-defense industries. It is important to my State in that it furnishes a living to many more when development now under contemplation for production is carried out. Under the circumstances I urge that for the benefit of the people of Montana and the Nation in the present serious emergency that "tungsten ore and concentrates" be immediately stricken from the list of commodities subject to negotiation for reduction in duty under the proposed foreign-trade agreement with the Republic of Argentina.

Grants-in-Aid to the States for General Relief

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

STATEMENT BY THE NEW YORK STATE BOARD OF SOCIAL WELFARE

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following statement from the New York State Board of Social Welfare:

STATE OF NEW YORK,
DEPARTMENT OF SOCIAL WELFARE,
Albany, June 18, 1941.

To: Representative MARTIN J. KENNEDY, of the State of New York.

From: The New State Board of Social Welfare.

The New York State board of social welfare endorses the recent recommendation of the Social Security Board that the Federal Government establish a program of grants-in-aid to the States for general relief, and urges your support of this program.

In asking your support, we wish to stress the fact that New York State has taken leadership in assuming responsibility for the care of dependent persons. You will recall that in the depression of the last decade New York was the first State to make public, State-wide provision for the unemployed, setting up the temporary emergency relief administration in October 1931. Later, when the persistence of mass unemployment in the face of industrial recovery made it apparent that the problem was not a temporary one, New York replaced the emergency agency with permanent machinery within the State department of social welfare to coordinate general relief with assistance to the aged, to the blind, and to dependent children. Thus, since July 1, 1937, this State has had a single agency to direct and supervise the administration of all four programs of public assistance.

How great the needs have been, and how heavily their burden has fallen upon State and local government may be seen from the following figures which cover only assistance granted, excluding costs of administration:

Fiscal year ended	Expenditures for public assistance
	Amount	Percent local	Percent State	Percent Federal
June 30, 1938	$171,836,579	52.7	37.6	9.7
June 30, 1939	181,085,804	51.8	37.9	10.3
June 30, 1940	174,914,894	50.7	37.2	12.1

Of the public-assistance totals given above, general (home) relief financed entirely by State and local government accounted for the following expenditures:

Fiscal year ended—	Home relief
June 30, 1938	$127,334,625
June 30, 1939	128,010,839
June 30, 1940	118,349,093

To finance such heavy relief expenditures imposes a severe strain upon local and State resources. In May 1941 general relief was being provided for 225,000 cases, including some 650,000 persons, to whose needs the Federal Government made no contribution, although among these cases there were approximately 50,000 families with at least one member who would be eligible for W. P. A. placement if suitable projects were available. It is estimated that families having no employable members represent nearly half of the current case load.

In the opinion of the Board the following considerations point clearly to the need for Federal grants-in-aid for general relief, with reimbursement of 50 percent of the cost of such assistance and its administration in States having acceptable programs operating in all political subdivisions:

1. The Federal Government should recognize need wherever it exists without regard to employability, age, or special disability. The provisions of the Social Security Act covering assistance to the aged, to the blind, and to dependent children have furnished notable leadership to all the States in establishing programs for these special classes of dependents and in meeting minimum standards of relief. A similar provision for general relief would complete the circle of Federal responsibility for the needy. Federal aid for general relief would tend to equalize the disproportionate burden now borne by the minority of States that, like New York, have consistently pursued a policy of giving adequate relief to all needy persons, whether or not they meet the technical qualifications of eligibility for the federally aided programs.

2. Federal grants-in-aid for general relief would constitute an important step toward the eventual fusion of the four separate programs—old-age assistance, assistance to the blind, aid to dependent children, general relief—into one coordinated whole. This should make major administrative economies possible, especially in personnel.

3. If W. P. A. is to be continued in the future, Federal grants-in-aid for general relief would counterbalance some of the inequitable features of the operation of that program. At the outset, it was generally understood that W. P. A. would provide for all needy adult employables, leaving the care of unemployables to the States, but this goal has never been realized. Moreover, operation of W. P. A. on a greater scale in some States than in others, sudden reduction of quotas, and changes in policy—such as the dropping of aliens from W. P. A. and the adoption of the 18-month limitation on continuous employment—have resulted in leaving large numbers of the unemployed either entirely without aid or in forcing States and local communities to assume heavy and unexpected relief burdens. The past experience of New York State has been that with each W. P. A. lay-off a large percentage of those dismissed reapply for general relief. The State has often had to make drastic changes in relief policy and program to take up the slack left by unforeseen action on the part of the W. P. A.

4. The W. P. A. program has been greatly reduced in the past 2 years, another cut is proposed at the present time, and further curtailment appears inevitable as the pace of industry increases. The final result may be the entire elimination of W. P. A. and the withdrawal of the Federal Government from direct operation of a work-relief program. In that event, some equivalent contribution to the States must be made by the Federal Government if a chaotic situation is to be avoided. Grants-in-aid would lend flexibility to State-local operations by allowing coordination of local work relief with home relief within the framework of the general relief program.

5. We believe that Federal assistance offers the only solution of the problem of the dependent migrant. Movement of families across State lines in search of economic betterment inevitably results in a byproduct of indigency when jobs fail to materialize or prove to be of short duration. A critical situation has developed in many parts of the country in recent years, and national defense is now intensifying the problem through the stimulus given to the migration of labor. More dependency is in prospect when industry slows down on completion of the Nation's armament. Since the so-called migrant problem is interstate in origin, growing out of the demands of the national economy for a mobile labor supply, the solution is properly a national concern.

It is highly significant that the Select Committee to Investigate the Interstate Migration of Destitute Citizens, House of Representatives (the TOLAN committee), while attempting to confine itself to its congressional mandate to study migrancy, was forced to the realization that this question cannot be separated from that of general relief as a whole. The committee accordingly recommended in its report that Congress study whether Federal aid should not be extended to cover all needy residents, settled and nonsettled alike.

The New York State Department of Social Welfare is making an extensive study of the whole question of settlement and the relief of destitute migrants. A Federal program of grants-in-aid for general relief would pave the way for eventual abolition of the diverse State laws regarding settlement and residence, would tend to equalize among the States the burden of caring for needy migrant workers and their families, and would ameliorate the condition of a group to whom relief is often denied merely because of a technical barrier—lack of legal settlement.

The New York State Board of Social Welfare is convinced of the necessity of Federal grants on a matching basis, not merely for the nonsettled but for all needy persons for whom Federal work programs are not suitable or available and who are not eligible for the present federally aided categories. This is a much sounder solution than any program aimed at the assistance of migrants alone, since the latter would set up a favored group for whom relief would be much more adequate, in many States, than for the local settled cases.

6. Although national defense, by giving employment to vast numbers of workers, is cutting the need of relief on the one hand, it is creating new relief problems along other lines, quite apart from those arising from the increased migration of labor. Men volunteering for military service often leave families with insufficient income for their support, and some public provision must be made. The selective-service draft also causes some dependency, even though deferment is generally given to those whose induction might be expected to create hardship at home. Another concomitant of national defense is the rise of living costs, already making itself felt in higher rents and higher prices for fuel and for certain foods. This obviously increases the cost of maintaining relief recipients.

7. We regard the provision of adequate relief throughout the country as a necessary element in the upbuilding of national morale and as a foundation for health, welfare, and other related activities. It is our firm belief that Federal participation in financing general relief, along with Federal leadership in establishing reasonably uniform standards of care and administration in all States, is the best method of consolidating social gains and insuring a rounded program which includes all classes of dependents.

Respectfully submitted.

All Sections of Our Military Service Are Full of O–9's

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 25, 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article:

[From the Washington Times-Herald]

ALL SECTIONS OF OUR MILITARY SERVICE ARE FULL OF "O–9'S"

Germany sank an American ship carrying contraband of war as such contraband is defined by both Germany and England.

President Roosevelt declares that this sinking was an act of piracy. Perhaps he is right.

The difference between war and piracy is but a slender and unstable hairline.

But if the sinking of the Robin Moor by the Germans was piracy, the sinking of the American submarine O–9 by our own Government is lunacy.

The O–9 was 23 years old, and was recognized as out of date and dangerous.

She had been laid up and out of use for several years. She had lately been recommissioned.

The O–9 was built to withstand at best the water pressure of 200 feet.

She went down to 440 feet.

The O–9 lies at the bottom of the sea, not far from where the Squalus sank.

Thirty-three men were rescued from the Squalus.

Twenty-six died unrescued.

The O–9 is an older and worse ship than the Squalus was.

There were 34 fine young American boys sunk on the O–9.

It is certain that none survive.

No sound has come from the O–9.

Divers making the "deepest working dives ever made in the world" found the O–9 crumpled by the enormous water pressure lying on the ocean bed.

There she will forever lie, as the Navy has officially abandoned all attempts to salvage the ship.

The O–9 could only live 24 hours without resurfacing, and she has been down more than 4 days.

The venerable death trap was doomed—doomed from the moment it was recommissioned.

Francis P. Golden, whose son was a member of the O–9's ill-fated crew, said his son told him 2 weeks ago that in a 2-foot submersing test the O–9 was found to have 19 leaks, "and that water poured into her right away."

Ota Eagleton, of Del Norte, Colo., whose son Charles was a signalman of the O–9, reported that his son wrote him last week that the antiquated craft "behaved badly" in test runs and that "everything was wrong with her."

Senator WILEY, of Wisconsin, a member of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee, said yesterday:

"I want to know why this out-of-date submarine had to be placed in active commission. I do not know what policy of the Government made it necessary."

Surely, Senator, a cowed Congress does not expect to be officially informed.

Representative BATES, of Massachusetts, of the House Naval Affairs Committee, declared Sunday:

"If we have any incompetence running around in military circles, we should find out now and not later."

Gentlemen of the Congress, you have found out now and you will find out later many times more disastrously if you proceed on your blind course of plunging this Nation into war equipped, or unequipped, with outmoded instruments of war.

The fate of the 34 devoted young Americans on board the O–9 death trap is but a solemn warning.

They have been consigned to their ocean grave.

Services have been held over the sunken ship which is their untimely tomb.

Some will say such are the fortunes of war.

But no.

Such are the fortunes of folly.

Such are the results of haste, waste, and incompetence.

Such are the effects of sending our good equipment abroad and not sufficiently supplying our armed forces generally with modern machinery—of trying to make modern war with antiquated arms.

Let us recognize facts if we are going to prevent more catastrophies and unnecessary loss of life on a far, far greater scale.

What happened to the devoted crew of the O–9 will be multiplied a thousand times if our country goes to war with antiquated machinery.

Hundreds of thousands of fine young lives will be sacrificed in battle, and not only in battle but in unsuitable camps and unsanitary hospitals.

In the war of 1917 more Americans died from neglect and disease than in battle.

In a new war, hastily entered into, the proportion of death from unsatisfactory camps and hospitals might not be as great, but the death in battle would be enormous if our country, with outdated equipment of the O–9 character in all military departments, had to compete with the perfectly modern mechanized equipment of other better-prepared nations.

Manpower alone does not win wars.

Japan, with less than 100,000,000 people in all its dominions, takes successive bites out of China, whose population probably exceeds 400,000,000.

Modern war equipment, modern war methods are essential to success.

Our Army now is in very much worse condition than our Navy.

Congressman Ross A. COLLINS, of Mississippi, named by the Reader's Digest "the outstanding military expert in Congress," writing in the Digest says:

"The bulk of our new Army will be infantry, cavalry, field artillery, etc.

"Most of the men will travel on foot.

"Of our 33 divisions, only 1 is fully motorized—that is, equipped with motor vehicles to transport men—and only 2 are armored and mechanized panzer divisions."

And, furthermore, Mr. COLLINS says:

"We haven't now and can't get for months or years enough modern and essential material (machinery of war) to train and equip a mass army.

Mr. COLLINS, in addition, states that the "lessons from the Battle of France have been before us for a year.

"We know that the mechanical might of only 12 panzer divisions, aided by a few thousand airplane pilots, inflicted staggering losses and swiftly shattered France's old-style mass army."

Mr. COLLINS quotes a Nazi officer who writes in the New York World-Telegram, and says:

"We considered the panzer force a weapon whose powerful fire in combination with its protective armor, speed, and mobility is superior to all others.

"We attacked en masse and rushed on in an avalanche.

"Without our panzer units the rapid destruction of the enemy would have been impossible."

Our American airplane forces are in as bad condition as our field forces.

We labor under a lamentable insufficiency of modern planes while our best product is sent abroad.

Moreover, we are handicapped by antiquated methods in management.

Says Mr. COLLINS:

"Young officers who are eager for change and improvement offend red-tape conservatives above them and drop out or are dropped out as was Gen. Billy Mitchell, prophetic post-war advocate of a united air service.

"For every good reason of European experience and of common sense the President should establish a separate air department at once to be directed by men who know aviation."

But the aged Secretary Stimson, who reputedly goes to sleep at Cabinet meetings and is something of a human O–9 himself, declares against a separate air department in spite of European war experience.

The antiquated O–9 submarine whose disastrous sinking has stirred the Nation, is but a type, a symbol of the outmoded equipment and method persistent in all departments of our military menage.

All sections of our military service are full of O–9's.

If we go to war with them, like the unfortunate crew of the submarine, we may be sunk.

Mr. COLLINS, in concluding his fine article, appeals to the fathers and mothers of America and says:

"Their own sons will be taken away from them and many of them will be needlessly sacrificed unless we are adequately prepared to fight with the weapons of today instead of an inadequate supply of the weapons of yesterday."

Gentlemen of the Congress of the United States, learn the lesson of the O–9 and keep our Nation out of war until at least we are prepared for war.

Federal Assistance to Agriculture

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT C. BONNER

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 20, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. HERBERT C. BONNER, OF NORTH CAROLINA

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I include the following address delivered by me at Williamston, N. C., before members of the Martin County Farm Bureau and other farmers in Martin County and eastern North Carolina.

In addition to my address on agriculture, I stated, "We have stood by and watched the rape of Europe and checked off one democracy after the other. We are seeing the next to the last big democracy fight for its life and very existence, and if it fails, Heaven help us."

I stated that I had voted for the continued flow of arms and ammunition to Britain; that while favoring the organization of labor, I disfavored strikes retarding our preparation for national defense. I stated that it was mandatory upon our Government to supply the young manhood of our country which we have drafted from the high and low, the rich and poor, the proper implements of war to defend themselves, as well as to defend us; and therefore it was mandatory upon Congress to prohibit further strikes in our national-defense plants, and that I would vote for such legislation.

With the enactment of tariff legislation some 150 years ago, the Congress of the United States began a series of legislative actions for the benefit of various groups in society. Since that time the tariff has been broadened and raised on numerous occasions. National and State legislatures have enacted child-labor laws, maximum-hour laws governing working conditions, compensation laws for labor, and our present important statutes covering minimum wages and maximum hours. All these laws affecting labor were designed for the benefit of those people who work for others—to improve the condition of the laboring man, and to stop or prevent the exploitation of labor. In fact, much of our earlier legislation has been designed to benefit some specific group in the Nation—the immigration laws were primarily for the protection of labor, just as the tariff was to give special benefits to industry.

Labor has not been the only group to benefit from Federal or State legislation, however. Business interests have also been long recognized and protected by our legislative bodies. The corporation laws enabled business and industry to control prices through the limiting of production; a practice which industry and business have followed for years. The interstate commerce laws were for the protection and benefit of certain groups, and we could go on naming a number of other laws that have been enacted for other groups.

It has been only recently that the Congress of the United States has taken cognizance of the disadvantageous position of agriculture because of the privileges extended to other groups.

John C. Calhoun recognized the effect of a tariff on agriculture when he stated 113 years ago:

"So partial are the effects of this (protective) system, that its burdens are exclusively on one side and its benefits on the other. It imposes on the agricultural interest of the South, including the Southwest, the burden not only of sustaining the system itself, but that also of the Government.

"* * * We are the serfs of the system out of whose labor is raised, not only the money paid into the Treasury, but the funds out of which are drawn out rich rewards of the manufacturer and his associates in interest. Their encouragement is our discouragement."

For a hundred years after Calhoun made this statement there was an almost continuous increase in the tariff rates, which placed farmers of the South at an increasing disadvantage with most other groups in the Nation. When the world trade and other economic conditions were changed so drastically following the World War, the cumulative effects of our long-time tariff policy began to be felt in earnest by American farmers.

It was not until 1933, when the present Democratic administration came in, that laws were passed to give direct assistance to farmers and to accord them some of the benefits through national legislation that many other groups had enjoyed for a long time.

It is true that prior to the farm programs of this administration some national legislation had been passed to benefit farmers. These included setting up the National Extension Service, Vocational Education Service, and the Farm Credit Administration, and the Federal Farm Board. As worth while as these efforts were, none of them dealt directly and extensively with the problems of farmers, or fully recognized the handicaps farmers were facing. However, by 1933, the predicament of the American farmer had become so acute that something had to be done, and Congress that year passed the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

Each year since Congress has amended and modified the act in order to improve it, thereby making it better serve farmers. Often we have had to follow the trial-and-error method because we did not have much experience prior to 1933, but Congress has courageously faced the situation, and has not hesitated to change the legislation in order to improve it. No doubt, it will be modified and improved from time to time in the future. While phases of farm legislation have been changed, the objectives have been constant since 1933, and the first objective has been, and still is, to achieve and maintain equality for agriculture with other groups in our national economy.

To obtain this objective the programs have attempted to bring about a balance in the supply of agricultural commodities in line with the demand; to insure adequate supplies at all times, so that consumers as well as producers would be protected; and to conserve our soil resources not only for this generation but for generations to come. By this method we hope to make this Nation a better place in which to live, and to leave our children's children a more fertile land from which to get a better living. Another objective of the farm legislation has been to conserve and use our water resources and to prevent soil erosion—if we can stop the soil erosion we will have much less to worry about in the human erosion on the farm.

We have worked toward these objectives by giving to farmers, through national legislation, the machinery whereby they could, through the democratic procedure of a referendum, control the quantity of an agricultural commodity going on the market. This is merely giving to agriculture a privilege which industry has practiced for years—the privilege of controlling the quantity of their product going on the market.

Under the agricultural programs payments have been made to farmers to divert land from soil-depleting surplus cash crops to soil-conserving crops and uses. Farmers of the Nation and of the South have exploited their land for years not through choice but through necessity. The soil is the farmer's source of his income, regardless of how meager that income may be, and he has had no desire to deplete his soil. He has been seriously concerned about the erosion on his own farm, yet even with most of his cropland devoted to cash crops, his income from farming in the past has been inadequate. It has not been large enough to provide him with a standard of living even approaching that of the average American. As for cash expenditures necessary in preventing erosion and building the soil, these were entirely out of the question for most southern farmers with the incomes which have been received from farm marketings.

A depleted, eroded soil would mean eventually a poverty-stricken people—American farmers living on the plane of the hungry people of the Orient. We cannot have a people strong, healthy, vigorous, aggressive, and able to defend democracy if we do not produce the food and fiber necessary to sustain such a people.

The farm program has made it possible for agriculture to be better prepared for defense than any other group in our Nation. Farmers have not only built up reserves in the soil but they have also built up reserves of corn, wheat, cotton, and other foods and fibers so that this Nation cannot only defend itself but can supply products for the defense of other democracies. They can do this with the satisfying knowledge that we have adequate food and fiber left for all our own needs. No bottleneck has developed in the supplies of agricultural commodities. In fact, there are adequate reserves of grain and fiber, much of which the Government has taken title to under the loan program at prices below current levels.

In addition to the loan stocks which farmers can withdraw for sale, the Government has title to over 6,000,000 bales of cotton, over 150,000,000 bushels of wheat, and more than 200,000,000 bushels of corn, any part of which is immediately available to the Government should it be needed in our defense effort. In the face of strikes and other industrial difficulties which now constitute a large portion of our daily news, it might be interesting to note that, at average prices for these important commodities this last year, returns for labor of farmers who produce these commodities to feed and clothe the Nation have averaged less than 10 cents per hour. This wage was not all cash income. For example, out of the 10 cents an hour a southeastern cotton farmer received for producing cotton, only 3.7 cents an hour was in cash and the remainder was in the form of fuel, food, and housing, which he obtained from the farm as a part of his living.

If the price of cotton had increased since 1909 in the same proportion that wages have increased in this period, cotton would be over 30 cents per pound today. Not only have wages advanced considerably even since the boom year of 1929, but the cost of living of nonagricultural persons has declined. At the present time both total factory pay rolls and weekly earnings per worker are above the 1929 levels, but the cost of living of these groups, measured by cost of food, clothing, and rent, ranges from 12 to 25 percent lower than in 1929. When compared with returns farmers are receiving, one would hardly think agriculture is still a part of the national family.

When you realize what a very small cash income a farmer receives for his labor, it is no wonder that they cannot buy the goods of labor and industry, and cannot buy the services of business and professional people. Because of this, it is not only farmers, but the people of the South generally who have suffered from the low farm-purchasing power.

Despite all the handicaps, the farmer has contributed to national defense with the reserves which are now available to this country and the democracies of the world. He has done it without asking for an amortization of his establishment; he has done it without asking for "cost plus" on his production; he has done it without having a guaranty of minimum wages and maximum hours. Farmers are now and will continue to fulfill one of our greatest needs in national defense. They are patriotically producing the food and fiber without which we could never be a strong nation.

As a result of the spending for defense of the democracies, wages have been increasing, the cost of services has been increasing, the price of machinery and equipment has been increasing, in fact the price of everything a farmer buys has been increasing, yet up to 8 months ago there was no comparable increase in the price of farm commodities. As a result the farmer was finding himself each month in a relatively more unfavorable situation as compared with the other groups in the country, with the cost of the things he buys going up and the prices of the things he sells not going up.

Congress recognized this fact, and recently passed an 85-percent-of-parity loan on cotton, wheat, tobacco, corn, and rice. Eighty-five percent of parity merely means that the farmer can borrow an amount on these commodities which will enable him to buy 85 percent as much of the things he needs as he could buy with the same quantity of these products in the period 1909-14. This means that the farmer's wage for producing cotton, for example, will be increased from 10 cents an hour to about 16 cents an hour, which is about one-half of the minimum wage in industry, and the farmers are receiving no time and a half for overtime. While 85-percent-of-parity loans will improve the farmer's situation over what it was a year ago, he still will not be on a basis of equality with industry, business, and labor.

With the talk of higher prices for farm products, perhaps a word should be said about consumers. Under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, Congress has charged the Department of Agriculture not only with improving farm income, but with safeguarding the interests of consumers. This part has not been forgotten, but the consumer angle has received much publicity in recent months, and much of this publicity is based on erroneous thinking. In the first place, it has already been pointed out that factory pay rolls and industrial workers' incomes are now substantially above the level of 1929, while the price index for foods and all commodities, or cost of things bought, is substantially below the 1929 level. This, of course, results in a greater purchasing power for nonfarm people than they had in the boom year 1929. On the other hand, income from farm marketings is some 20 percent below the 1929 level. Until there is a closer relationship between these two figures, it does not seem to me that all of the concern should be felt for consumers.

It might also be well to remember that at the present price levels there is only about 8 cents worth of cotton in a $2 cotton shirt, and only 1.2 cents worth of wheat in a loaf of bread. If prices are increased to 85 percent of parity this should raise the cost of a shirt by only a few pennies, and the price of a loaf of bread by less than half a cent. Farmers are usually interested in learning that the clerk who handles the shirt in the store gets more out of the selling price for his labor than the farmer who raised the cotton contained in the shirt. And each time you send a shirt to the laundry, the laundryman gets more for his work than the farmer received for producing the cotton it contains.

In thinking of consumers of cotton goods, there are many factors besides the price of cotton which affect final selling prices of cotton goods. Broadly speaking, the wholesale price of cloth is made up of two items of cost, the price of cotton and the mill margin or manufacturing cost. When the defense program started last June, wholesale prices of 17 cloths averaged about 21 cents a pound, about half of which represented cost of cotton, the other half being the margin for the mills. Now cloth prices are up to 51 cents, but the two factors making up this cost are no longer anywhere near equal. In this period of less than a year, cotton prices advanced about half a cent, while the mill margin has almost doubled. If mill margins had remained unchanged, cotton prices could now be about 20 cents a pound and the effect on consumers of cotton goods would be the same.

I have selected cotton to use as an example, but by the same yardstick I could have pictured the identical condition with tobacco and peanuts.

For example:

PEANUTS

If you purchase a 5-cent bag of peanuts on the street, the farmer has received approximately only three-tenths of 1 cent for the peanuts in that bag. That is, if peanuts are bringing as much as 4 cents per pound.

TOBACCO

When you pay 15 cents for a package of cigarettes, the farmer has received for the tobacco in the cigarettes approximately 1 to 1¼ cents. Averaging the market price of the tobacco purchased by the manufacturer at approximately 20 cents per pound.

The surplus problem we have today is a problem that we cannot solve as individuals. However, farmers have the machinery to act collectively through a national farm program. They have the means to act together for their own interests at the same time they are working to produce the things most needed in this all-out effort for defense.

Food will help win this war as it did the last war and as it has all other wars. Not only must our armed forces be adequately fed, but all the workers of industry and the entire civilian population must be well fed if we are to be able to put forth the efforts necessary to really help the democracies. Total war means we must have healthy, courageous, and calm people who are able at all times to exert themselves to the limit, and we can do this only when our people are getting an adequate diet. Farmers have and will continue to provide the Nation with all these basic necessities.

During the past 17 years I have assisted in all legislation for farmers.

Since becoming a Member of Congress I have worked and voted for farm legislation. I fought to restore to North Carolina its just and proper peanut legislation. I fought to have tobacco named as one of the agricultural commodities in the lend-lease bill.

I voted for 85-percent parity loans on cotton, wheat, rice, corn, and tobacco, and crop insurance.

I will continue to work and vote for all good farm legislation.

Proposed Trade Agreements

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS CASE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 25, 1941

STATEMENT OF HON. FRANCIS CASE OF SOUTH DAKOTA BEFORE COMMITTEE ON RECIPROCITY INFORMATION

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted by the House, I offer for the RECORD a transcript of the exchange of statements and my testimony when I appeared before the Committee on Reciprocity Information conducting hearings with respect to the proposed trade agreements with Argentina and Uruguay, yesterday, June 24, 1941:

Mr. CASE. Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee. before I go into the little statement I prepared, I was rather interested in the observation the chairman made with respect to excise taxes. I wonder if he would care to say whether the committee feels that the authority under the trade agreements in dealing with excise taxes extends to the reduction of excise taxes which may have been enacted by Congress since the Tariff Act of 1930, and since the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act of 1934, as well as to any that might have been in effect at the time the Trade Agreement Act was enacted?

Chairman RYDER. So far, the trade-agreement authorities have proceeded on the assumption that the excise taxes are in the nature of duties; as, of course, they are. They are collected like duties and otherwise. I think the first agreement with Canada in 1936 produced that kind of tax on lumber, and since then the Trade Agreement Act has been amended twice.

Now, as to whether any excise tax was imposed since the Trade Agreement Act was passed or not, I do not recall. I do not think any has been, but I am not certain.

Mr. CASE. The reason I asked the question was because of the logic of the principle involved. You may remember that there was some alarm on Capitol Hill about 3 years ago, when it was understood that there was some suggestion in certain quarters; the theory was held that the Trade Agreements Act gave authority to reduce the tariff duties of 1930 by 50 percent, and then in a subsequent agreement to use that as a new base and to reduce it further.

Chairman RYDER. No; that never has been advocated. No one has ever advocated that so far as I know.

Mr. CASE. I understand that that was true, because at the time there was some furore about it, and the Secretary of State stated in a letter to me that that was not contemplated.

In other words, that interpretation would seem to indicate that it was understood that the Trade Agreements Act authority rested upon the base of the 1930 status. Now then, if the opinion is held——

Chairman RYDER (interposing). You mean the 1934 status, at the time of the adoption of the Trade Agreements Act?

Mr. CASE. Yes; the duties in effect under the 1930 Tariff Act. Of course, there may have been some changes under the flexible provisions between 1930 and 1934, I presume.

Chairman RYDER. And most of the excise taxes were between 1930 and 1934.

Mr. CASE. Yes. But if it is regarded that the base was the duty in effect at the time of the enactment of the Trade Agreements Act, then it would seem to me that in applying that principle with regard to excise taxes it also should be regarded as being based upon the excise taxes in effect as of 1934, and that if Congress should subsequently enact excise taxes, they would not be subject to consideration.

Chairman RYDER. I do not know that that last point has ever been directly passed upon in this committee, Mr. Case, or that the committee is competent to pass on it.

Mr. CASE. It seems to me that consistency would prevent the Trade Agreements Act from disturbing excise taxes passed since the enactment of the Trade Agreements Act.

Well, Mr. Chairman, the responsibility of your committee, as well as of mine, is to the people of the United States. We have developed a standard of living in this country which has been pegged and cross-pegged by a complex system of railroad rates, wage-and-hour laws, fair-trade rules, commodity loans and tariffs, to say nothing of the vast structure of commercial loans, real-estate mortgages and bond issues based upon them. And I am sure that you are as earnest as I in your desire to support and maintain the economics of the country on which what we call the American way of life depends. It is my privilege, then, to place before you a few observations on how that American standard of living is involved in the proposed trade-agreement negotiations with Uruguay and the Argentine.

My remarks will not go into the details of rates which I leave to the experts scheduled for appearance, but will be directed to the fields of interest for the people of South Dakota whom I have the honor to represent.

Probably no trade-agreement agenda ever covered so many items of direct concern to the Western States as do the items listed for consideration in the notices on these hearings. In the field of metals, you are proposing to consider the reduction of rates in the most marginal industries: Beryllium, mica, tungsten in refined or ground states, and, apparently, it is proposed to go even further and freeze or bind the present free entry for crude beryl and beryllium ores against the establishment of any duty in the future.

In the field of livestock products, apparently, it is proposed to consider a blow against the entire range of interests from birds to cattle and from hoofs and horns to hair and hides. Needless to say, the people of the West who are aware of what is proposed are tremendously aroused. By special-delivery letter, air mail, yesterday I received a copy of resolutions just adopted at the annual convention of the South Dakota Stock Growers Association, which included this paragraph:

"Whereas it has been announced that trade agreements will be negotiated with Argentina and Uruguay; and

"Whereas there are included among the items for tariff reductions canned beef, hides, and numerous byproducts of the cattle industry, although the duties on many of these products are now too low: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we protest any further reductions in these duties as being entirely unwarranted."

The resolutions further point out that the insurance of a stable and adequate supply of meat foods for the country is the natural and important contribution which the livestock industry makes in times of national emergency, and it is strongly urged that nothing be done to destroy that stability and capacity.

Your announcement lists a great many grades of wool as being subject to consideration. In that connection, I wish to bring to you a bit of testimony that developed in recent hearings of the House Appropriations Subcommittee for the War Department.

General Corbin, of the Quartermaster's Department, was testifying on the purchase of woolens for army clothing and blankets. He had stated that it was Army policy, under the Buy American Act, to buy domestic wool. He said, "If the price offered is kept within our price range." I asked him then: "What do you mean by within range?" The general replied: "We have considered 5 percent."

I then asked what that 5 percent was supposed to cover, whether it was to maintain a ratio to the general commodity level; in other words, whether it was a parity price or whether it was designed to allow for differences in cost of production, fair labor standards laws, high taxes, fixed railroad rates, etc. General Corbin replied: "We consider that the tariff on wool takes care of most of those problems."

I mention that because I do not want you to escape the responsibility that the Army as well as the rest of the country places upon you to see that the tariff is maintained at such a level as will allow a proper differential to protect the American standard of living, as buttressed by these various price-fixing devices that we have adopted in this country to maintain economic standards in various lines of activity.

It will be remembered that the Buy American Act, in policy, was supposed to permit a differential of 25 percent for the purchase of domestic products in order to give American producers a chance at supplying the market their tax dollars paid for. Under the testimony that 5 percent only is the differential permitted in practice, and the further testimony that the War Department depends on the tariff to protect the difference in costs between domestic and foreign fixed costs and standards of living, I lay upon your committee, Mr. Chairman, the earnest plea that you do not let the livestock producers of this country down.

Now, the livestock situation has been covered in detail by some of my colleagues, and I see listed for appearance such authorities as Mr. F. E. Mollin, secretary of the American National, who preceded me this morning; Mr. F. R. Marshall, of the National Wool Growers; Mr. J. B. Wilson, of the Wyoming Wool Growers; and others, so I shall not dwell further upon the subject.

I wish to speak briefly, however, upon the mineral field that you propose to invade. It is the field of the marginal industries—mica, beryl, and tungsten. These are some of the minerals for which the United States is most eager at this time, and it is a matter of amazement to me that you propose to throw a wet blanket on the possible development of such industries at this time.

Senator MURDOCK, in his discussion, spoke of manganese, and he also spoke of the situation with regard to aluminum, and drawing from those lessons that should be considered when you are proposing to invade other fields of the metals or mineral industries; and that recalled to my mind the experience or the object lesson that we have had in manganese. In 1929, and as recently as 1929, a tremendous manganese field was discovered in South Dakota. A company expended between $300,000 and $400,000 on the exploration of that field following the enactment of the 1930 Tariff Act, which set up some duties on manganese.

In 1934, when the Trade Agreements Act was passed, it was followed shortly by the Brazilian trade agreement, which cut the tariff duties on manganese in half, and it cut them in half, as I understand it, upon the belief that we had no large manganese reserves in the country. This company, which had developed a process which was a practical and economic process for the processing of this manganese ore based upon its expenditure of $300,000 to $400,000 over a period from 1930 to 1934, had raised its finances for the erection of a $500,000 plant to start the processing of that manganese. The Brazilian trade agreement wrecked the plans of that company, and they were never able again to pick up.

Now, I know that when I brought this question up 3 or 4 years ago I was told, "Well, that was because your reserves were not large enough, and we felt justified in making a reduction because in the period from 1920 on, when there was some encouragement given for manganese following the World War, no great development was done." But that overlooks the basic fact that this deposit was not recognized until 1929, and even then it was not fully explored until this company had had an opportunity to do some exploration work.

More recently, under the $2,000,000 fund which the Senator has already mentioned, the Bureau of Mines has engaged in an exploratory survey, and they have stated in their initial reports that so far from being limited even to the 102,000,000 tons of metallic manganese in 8 townships that were cited in the United States Geological Survey Report of 1929, it appears that there are probably 6 times that quantity of manganese reserves there; and in a report which I have seen, by Mr. Hedges, of the Bureau of Mines, he states that there is enough ore suitably placed for open-pit mining, exposed, that does not have to be stripped, to serve all the domestic needs of this country for more than 50 years, and that unsupported by any importations—unsupported by any supplementary production from any other fields in the country—and that the total reserves there are such that it is beyond calculation. He uses the term, "It is like comparing the gold in sea water in their ultimate test."

Now, I lay upon this committee a very serious burden because I am saying to you that the Brazilian trade agreement stopped the development of that field at a time when a private company had expended $400,000 and was prepared then to finance a plant for the development of the largest reserve in the country that, if it had been developed and were in production, would have solved today one of the most fundamental problems that we face in this national emergency.

The Congress has been called upon to pass hundreds of millions of dollars to build cargo ships in an attempt to bring manganese in from other countries, and yet the figures that were cited before the O. P. M. Committee just a short time ago indicated that we have been receiving no shipping from the countries on which we have relied to supply at least two-thirds of the total amount of manganese that we need in this country, and with that object lesson before you, with a realization that the Brazilian trade agreement nipped in the bud the development of a manganese deposit that would have solved our domestic problems, I say to you that you ought to proceed very cautiously when you propose to invade the field of these marginal minerals and metals, such as mica, beryl, and tungsten.

The gentleman from Idaho has referred to the discovery that the Bureau of Mines has made in tungsten in some of the western States. A discovery of sheelite deposits which offer a source of tungsten was one of the most important developments that have come out of this strategic-minerals investigation.

In Circular No. 6821 the United States Bureau of Mines, reviewing the importance of tungsten, says: "It is one of the pivotal war minerals, since the comparative efficiency of tungsten-alloy cutting tools is 3 to 5 times that of carbon steels. In the final analysis the problem resolves to the question of the insurance premium the country is willing to pay to reduce the risk of being wholly dependent on foreign countries for tungsten needs in time of national emergency."

Between 1898 and 1936 the tungsten production of mines in the Black Hills of South Dakota is estimated at $1,279,797, but the greater part of this, $1,106,740 of it—better than 90 percent of it—was produced in the 4 war years, 1915 to 1918, under the stimulus of war prices. My contention is that instead of considering a reduction in the tariff at this time the policy of the Government should be to increase the protection given in the hopes of getting a domestic industry started, letting them have the benefit of wartime prices to absorb some of the shock of establishing a new industry, and then giving them the assurance of protection in normal times so that the next time an emergency comes along the mines will have been opened, the ores blocked out, the mills in shape to run.

I know that someone will shrug his shoulders and say, "But if we need tungsten now, shouldn't we lower the tariff so that we can get it?" And to that I want to say, with as much definiteness as I can, "That is a dangerous theory. It is not the price that keeps us from getting tungsten from abroad. It is shipping, and our emergency arises from the fact that we have not developed domestic production to which we can turn."

In concluding, Mr. Chairman, as earnestly as I can, I want to say to you that you have in your hands the welfare of this Nation as no other body. You decree economic life and death to individuals, to firms, and in these important fields, to the Nation itself. My plea is that you do not destroy the capacity of our people to satisfy our needs in these deficiency metals. And, with respect to livestock products, may I say that it is folly for anyone to suppose that the United States can absorb the production of the South American countries and maintain a market for its own large production. Surely you gentlemen agree with me on that, and I appeal to you to maintain the domestic welfare of the United States in these days of strange doctrines.

Chairman RYDER. I want to thank you for that very excellent statement, and also for the statement by the other Congressmen who have appeared this morning. I want to assure you that they will be given very thorough consideration.

Gas for Japan's War Planes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE OREGONIAN, PORTLAND, OREG.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial appearing in the Oregonian of June 7, 1941, entitled, "Gas for Japan's War Planes."

The editorial follows:

[From the Oregonian, Portland, Oreg., of June 7, 1941]

GAS FOR JAPAN'S WAR PLANES

During the first 3 months of 1940 there were no restrictions on export of gasoline to Japan and other countries outside the Western Hemisphere. The embargo on export of aviation gasoline, the commodity presumed to be essential to effective operation of war planes, was ordered on July 31. Yet a dispatch from Washington tells us that in the first 3 months of this year Japan imported from this country five times as much gasoline as it imported in the corresponding 3 months of a year ago, when there were no restrictions.

The gasoline thus going in much greater quantity to Japan may be assumed not to be aviation gasoline. It includes, however, much high-grade gasoline, which, by the addition of antiknock ingredients, can be converted into aviation gasoline. And the concurrent export from this country of $110,000 worth of antiknock preparations to Japan reveals that conversion of the fuel into aviation fuel is its true destination.

Our sympathies are strongly with China in the war now going on in the Orient. Our material interests also lie in the success of Chinese resistance to the Japanese "new order." We give practical aid to China in the form of loans, and sell Japan the fuel necessary to bomb the Chinese Armies from the air. Moreover, our own relations with Japan are precarious, and the thought that persists among us on the Pacific coast is that these delicate relations may be broken, and that the airplane fuel that we sold to Japan may propel planes which will bomb our cities.

The same dispatch tells us that the administration is fully cognizant of the situation and is permitting export to Japan of strategic materials for the time being "for very good reasons." Two reasons are cited. They are not "very good reasons." One is "appeasement." The other, that it is America's policy to lull Japan into a sense of false security and corresponding neglect of reserve stock building, so that when and if we do stop shipments, the embargo will be an effective one. The spokesman for these two doctrines was no doubt dissembling. And it may well be that officially to set forth the true reasons would be ill-advised.

It is a fair supposition that the watchful waiting strategists are for the time being in the ascendancy in Washington with respect to policies in the Orient. Word has hitherto come forth that there are two schools of opinion on this branch of foreign policy. One is that Japan understands only direct action or force, is in no position to make reprisal, and if it took the headlong chance, would be made short work of. The other argument, the one that seemingly predominates, is that Japan is poised in the south China Sea for attempted seizure of Malaya and the East Indies, and if we embargo essential war materials, would strike recklessly and effectively enough to cut off for a long time our access to strategic materials obtainable only in the Far East in quantities sufficient for our own defense program.

The United States is dependent in whole or major part on the Asiatic southeast for 5 of the 14 commodities listed by the Army and Navy as strategic materials. The 5 are rubber, tin, tungsten, Manila fiber, and quinine. We have been depending on that region for 88 percent of our rubber and 80 percent of our tin. Moves have been taken to build up stocks in these materials and develop new sources of supplies and substitutes.

The situation resolves itself into a question of whether our own vulnerability with respect to strategic materials has been overcome, and whether Japan's vulnerability as a naval power is correctly estimated. That a showdown approaches is implied by Japan's new pressure on the Netherlands East Indies for release to Japan of quantities of petroleum, rubber, and tin. Japan fears a drying up of the imports from America. The three commodities are essentials to successful warfare or defense, but so are automobiles and automobile parts, and machinery and scrap metals, these last not to be obtained by Japan anywhere in the world at present unless it be from the United States.

The squeeze of a complete embargo on export of war materials to Japan would seemingly strangle Japan in short order notwithstanding statistical comparisons of Japan's naval strength with that part of ours which could be spared for operations in the Pacific. The Government may know what it is doing when gasoline is permitted to go to Japan in growing volume, but the people do not think so. Last fall a Gallup poll showed 90 percent of those participating to be in favor of a complete embargo.

Proposed Reduction in the Tariff on Beef

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. O'CONNOR

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

STATEMENT OF HON. JAMES F. O'CONNOR, OF MONTANA

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement made by me to the Committee for Reciprocity Information:

Under the Constitution the President may make treaties with other countries with the advice and consent of the Senate. Treaties or proposed trade agreements which are known as reciprocal trade agreements in which one nation trades the right to send to another nation surplus industrial or agricultural products on a lowered tariff basis. The main surplus product of Argentina and Uruguay is beef. The Government is proposing in the Argentine and Uruguay trade treaty to reduce the tariff on beef and in return therefor these two countries will lower the tariff on our manufactured products such as our motorcars, refrigerators, and such other articles which we manufacture and which they do not. Beef producing is the principal occupation of many of our Western and Southwestern States. Please remember that it is our own people, the persons who have the property that the tax collector can find, are the ones to whom we look for taxes. We should not sell down the river our livestock producer to the end that the manufacturer of such products as I have mentioned will profit at their expense. That is the result of the proposed trade agreements so far as the beef producer is concerned.

I further wish to call the attention of the members of this committee to the fact that the cattlemen were squeezed out by the banks following the debacle of 1929, and many of them either had to go out of business or just survive from that time until the fall of 1933 by the skin of their teeth. We in Montana sold good beef over the scales at as low as 2 and 3 cents per pound for the years 1930, 1931, 1932, and 1933, and, of course, suffered losses every year during that period of time. Our debts piled up with accumulated interests as well and taxes were unpaid.

Beginning in the fall of 1933, a gradual improvement took place in the cattle industry, and since that time, owing to the increase in the prices of beef, the byproducts, etc., the cattlemen are now just getting in reasonable financial condition to carry on. However, we have been for the last 2 or 3 years and now confronted with an increase in our taxes and cost of materials for whatever we have to buy to keep up our ranches as well as a sharp advance which has to be met in wages. I deplore any action that this committee would take which would result in forcing our cattlemen to compete with those of other countries where the cost of operation and standard of living is much lower; where wages are much lower and climatic conditions require much less preparation and expenses in connection with production of food supplies for our livestock and where taxes are much lower. We in Montana must provide feed for cattle for 5 to 6 months out of the year and pay on an average from forty to seventy dollars per month for competent ranch help, also board and lodging, whereas the wages paid in the countries mentioned are negligible as compared with ours. I appeal to the committee to bear in mind the fact that, after all, it is on our American masses, and particularly the farmer and stock grower, who cannot hand their taxes on to the other fellow in the price they get for their products will fall the burden of meeting the major part of our increased tax bill. I am, therefore, opposed to any reduction of tariff on beef and beef products from those countries.

I believe that the American market should be reserved for the American producers up to their ability to supply the market's needs, as that is the commitment both major political parties gave to the farmer and stock grower in this country in their platforms in the recent campaign. We can do no less than keep those pledges. I might add that we now have on hand large surpluses of byproducts of beef which are depressing on our markets. Also at this point please remember the huge investment of our meat-producing class of people, which amounts to over $4,000,000,000. This does not include dairy cattle. It is well also to remember that 70 percent of our total national farm income comes from our livestock and dairy products.

I also wish to call to your attention that the Government is spending huge sums of money for national defense along the two coasts, but the Middle West like my own State is barren of any share in such industries, as we have no defense industries. Consequently we have no mushroom prosperity in my State.

I do not want to see our good-neighbor policy expanded to the point where it will sweep our Western States clean of the livestock industry and compel cattlemen to leave their own country and go to South America to make a living. If such a policy is carried out, that is what will happen to many of our stock growers, and a great industry will be destroyed, resulting in more unemployment and poverty.

The Tax Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

LETTER FROM HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY, OF NEW YORK, TO COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter, which I sent to the Committee on Ways and Means with regard to the pending tax bill:

JUNE 26, 1941.

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
House of Representatives:

After years of experience with the tax laws, we should now be able to eradicate hardships caused by a not too realistic application of our revenue statutes and at the same time not impair the necessary revenues of the Government. I wish to call your attention to a few items that the committee might well consider as a basis for helpful amendments.

1. Education: While the head of a family has a deduction of $400 for dependents under 18, it is not until a child reaches the age of 18 that he presents a most serious expense problem and that has to do with his final education. Tuition and upkeep at colleges are expensive and it is good public policy for the Government to encourage heads of families to provide for the college education of their children. Therefore, I believe that a deduction of $400 should be allowed to the parent paying for the education of a child over 18 years of age in a recognized college or professional school.

2. Medical: Medical expenses are so very often a tremendous hardship on the head of a family that I believe the amount spent for necessary medical treatment should be allowed as a deduction from income taxes.

3. Legal expenses: Very often persons are forced to defend themselves in the courts without any hope of a money judgment or the payment of their legal expenses. Necessary and reasonable legal expenses, I believe, should be allowed as a deduction against income taxes.

4. Prepayment of taxes: The Government is endeavoring to educate the public to a prepayment of taxes. I think it would be far more advisable to allow a discount because of prepayment. It would make it worth while for taxpayers to anticipate the next year's taxes by immediate payment and the Government would not be required to borrow against taxes.

5. Deduction of taxes from income: The greatest hardship involved in the income-tax law is the fact that year after year taxpayers pay taxes on money that was used in the prior year for the payment of taxes. Very often taxpayers have to pay in 1 year's taxes more money than they actually earned the prior year, all of which might have been devoted to the payment of taxes. Surely the committee can either work out some general scheme of allowance of taxes from income or at least work out some realistic method for the payment of taxes so the taxes themselves will not destroy taxpayers who are, after all, the producers of the Government's revenue.

I am making these proposals in the interest both of the Government and of the taxpayer, and I trust that the Committee on Ways and Means will adopt them. I do not wish to offer amendments from the floor of the House on these points because I realize how intricate the legislative tax structure is and I prefer that the experts of the Ways and Means Committee consider these suggestions of mine in executive session and offer them as committee amendments.

Very truly yours,

MARTIN J. KENNEDY,
Eighteenth District, New York.

Is President Roosevelt a Communist?

HON. GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

ARTICLE BY WESTBROOK PEGLER

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article, by Westbrook Pegler, from the Chicago Daily News of June 21, 1941:

[From the Chicago Daily News of June 21, 1941]

F. D. R. AND THE REDS—RECORD VERY BAD, PEGLER DECLARES

(By Westbrook Pegler)

NEW YORK, June 21.—Don't ask me why President Roosevelt and Mrs. Roosevelt gave such strong aid and comfort to the Communists in the so-called labor movement and in the political ramifications of that movement until the time when Stalin gave Hitler the signal to start the war.

I don't know, and nobody has voiced anything better than an opinion. But I know they did do this and that it is largely the fault of the President, first, and then of Mrs. Roosevelt, that today Communists can tie up factories whose produce is urgently needed to defend the United States against Stalin's partner in conquest.

The Communists were repudiated by President Roosevelt in last year's Presidential campaign, and it was then undertaken to show that they had switched their support to Wendell Willkie, of all people, a Wall Street lawyer as Harold Ickes called him, forgetting, perhaps, that Mr. Roosevelt, too, had been a Wall Street lawyer and that Mr. Roosevelt had heartily endorsed the last previous Wall Street lawyer selected by the Democratic Party—John W. Davis of the House of J. P. Morgan.

MAY HAVE VOTED WILLKIE

The Communists poll so little strength it is impossible to say whom they voted for last year, and it may well be that they did vote for Willkie, knowing that this would have no bearing on the result—whatever the result. The Communists denounced President Roosevelt on only one issue—the issue of war against their ally, Adolf Hitler. But that did not wipe out the long record of sympathetic treatment which they had received from two Roosevelt administrations—particularly in the Labor Relations Board, whose chairman, J. Warren Madden, finally became so offensive that it was necessary to boot him upstairs to a soft job for life, at $12,000 a year, as judge of the court of claims.

Under Mr. Madden the Labor Relations Board was a cell of Communistic thought and sympathy, which did not merely protect the workers' right to bargain but used its power to drive thousands of them into unions, preferably those of the C. I. O., in which the Communists were concentrating their efforts. The Wagner Act gives the Board no authority to make free men and women join unions, but the Board, under Mr. Madden, coerced them anyway, by sympathizing with the unions, notably those of the C. I. O.

TESTIMONY ON THE C. I. O.

As to whether the C. I. O. is hospitable to Communists, there is no need to inquire beyond the unrefuted testimony taken by the Dies committee and the recent issuance of a C. I. O. charter to the Trotsky revolutionary organization in Minneapolis, formerly known as Local 544 of the A. F. of L. Teamsters. Led by three brothers—Miles, Vincent, and Grant Dunn—this local has long been notorious as a violent political organization under the cover of an A. F. of L. charter.

Dan Tobin, the president of the A. F. of L. teamsters, now admits belatedly that it has "a wide reputation for strikes and disorders" and contains guerrilla terrorist units consisting of squads of five men, known as defense guards. Tobin undoubtedly has known all this for a long time, but he finally tried to disinfect or delouse the local of its anti-American elements, whereupon 544 withdrew from the A. F. of L. and was welcomed into the structural workers of the C. I. O. for its revolutionary and disruptive strength. It is not a structural union, and the C. I. O. union which embraced it is not a teamsters' union.

Tobin cannot erase the damned spot placed on the record of his own teamsters' organization, because the violent, alien character of this Minneapolis terroristic group has been notorious for years but, nevertheless, was allowed to exploit its A. F. of L. charter in the interests of Trotskyism until the national emergency made action necessary. However, Tobin and his teamsters now have given evidence of patriotic purpose, whereas the C. I. O. was quick to grant a charter to the Trotsky group.

RECORD ON ROOSEVELT

The record of President Roosevelt on communism contains the lamentable fact that he used the power of his office to disparage and hamper the Dies committee in its very trying and painful work of exposing Communistic conspirators. And it cannot be forgotten that Mrs. Roosevelt ostentatiously attended a hearing on the committee, at which her protegés of the Communistic Youth Congress were under examination, and not only gave open indication of her sympathy for the young Muscovites against this committee of Congress but, to make certain that her intent could not be misunderstood, invited a number of the youths to the White House.

The whole record of Mr. and Mrs. Roosevelt and of the administration toward communism is very bad, and it will take some positive confession of error to convince the wary that there has actually been a change of heart, if change there has been.

Farm Security Administration Work

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OVERTON BROOKS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, often we legislate here without receiving an intermediate constructive report from our efforts. When such a report comes to us and it reflects the wisdom of our efforts, we are naturally proud of the good work. There recently came to me a letter containing a comprehensive report of the work of the Farm Security Administration; and while the House of Representatives is not now considering agricultural legislation, I think that all of us would do well to pause a few moments and consider this report:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
FARM SECURITY ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, May 27, 1941.

Hon. OVERTON BROOKS,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BROOKS: Since the beginning of the present emergency it has been generally recognized that the health, welfare, and morale of our people are vitally important to national defense. Providing for these needs among low-income farm families has been one of the essential contributions of the Farm Security Administration to the Nation's defense efforts during the past year.

We have just completed a special survey undertaken last winter to measure the progress being made by borrowers from the Farm Security Administration. It indicates the gains in terms of money, living standards, and capacity for self-support which have been made during 1940 by handicapped and low-income farm people all over the country. It occurred to me that you might be interested in seeing the figures for your district.

In the Fourth District of Louisiana there were 1,760 active standard rehabilitation borrowers at the end of 1940. The survey showed that the average borrower earned a net income of $523 during the year, as compared with $303 in the year before he borrowed from Farm Security. In other words, the typical family increased its annual net income by 73 percent.

Also significant are the gains which these people made in net worth, since that is one of the best measures of permanent improvement in living standards. Borrowers in your district increased their average net worth—over and above all debts, including their obligations to the Government—from $393 before they came into the Farm Security program to $563 at the close of the 1940 crop year. This is a gain of 43 percent.

These figures mean that Farm Security borrowers in the Fourth District have added a total of $298,443 to the wealth of their communities, and have increased their total annual incomes by $387,763. Naturally this growth in prosperity and purchasing power has been reflected on the books of merchants and other businessmen of the district.

We were pleased to find that borrowers in your district are rapidly repaying their rehabilitation loans. Already $561,361 has been repaid on loans totaling $1,123,129, although much of the money does not fall due for 4 or 5 years. Throughout the entire country, rehabilitation loans totaling $420,865,050 had been made as of December 31, 1940, and $149,626,442 of this sum had been repaid. As you know, loan funds currently are advanced by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, instead of coming from direct appropriations.

In view of the fact that none of the borrowers from Farm Security was able to get adequate credit anywhere else and that many of them formerly were on relief, we feel that this repayment record is a tribute to the honesty and industry of these needy farm people. There is ample evidence that the great majority of them are getting back on their feet and becoming permanently self-supporting. In large measure, this progress is due to the advice and technical guidance in sound farm and home management which accompanies each Farm Security loan.

For example, we encourage our borrowers to get away from one-crop farming—particularly of surplus crops such as cotton, tobacco, and wheat—and to raise as much as possible of their own food and feed for their livestock. During 1940 the average Farm Security family in your district produced $300 worth of goods for home consumption, as compared with $156 before they came into the F. S. A. program. This produce for home use included 372 gallons of milk per family, 344 pounds of meat and 260 quarts of vegetables and fruit canned for the winter. This increased production of food did not, of course, add to the supply in the commercial markets, since virtually none of it was offered for sale. It simply meant a better diet, better health, and a rising standard of living for these families.

Often it has been necessary to work out an adjustment of the family's old debts before rehabilitation could be successful. Local farm debt adjustment committees have been set up for this purpose. They have no legal authority to compel adjustments, but by bringing the farmer and his creditors together for a friendly discussion they usually are able to arrange a scale-down of the obligations, reduced interest rates, or extension of the payment period. Such adjustments frequently save the farmer from foreclosure, and at the same time enable the creditors to get substantial payments on what might otherwise have been bad debts.

This service is available to all farmers, whether or not they are rehabilitation borrowers. Altogether, debt reductions totaling $83,001 have been negotiated for the farmers in your district. This represents a scale-down of 11.4 percent. As a direct result of these adjustments, $10,580 in back taxes has been paid to local governmental agencies.

In making this special survey our field employees reported that there are 4,550 families in your district who are eligible and in need of rehabilitation loans, but have been unable to get them because of the limited funds available.

In addition to the rehabilitation program Farm Security is carrying out the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, which provides a limited number of loans to competent tenants to enable them to buy family-type farms.

During the first 3 years of this program we made 75 such loans in your district, totaling $376,894. This year we expect to make about 31 Bankhead-Jones loans in the Fourth District, amounting to approximately $158,525. Throughout the country delinquencies of these loans have amounted so far to only 2.6 percent, or $23,658; and this has been more than offset by the fact that other borrowers have been able to make advance payments totaling $196,765 as the result of good crops and management.

I am hopeful that this rather detailed report may be useful to you, and if you would like to have any further facts about our program I shall, of course, be glad to supply them. Sometime during the year I hope that you may find an opportunity to visit some of the borrowers from F. S. A. in your district and see for yourself the efforts they are making to get a new start as independent, tax-paying citizens.

Sincerely,

C. B. BALDWIN,
Administrator.

Mr. Speaker, while the matter dealt with in the letter from C. B. Baldwin, Administrator, is largely confined to northwest Louisiana, I am sure that a similar situation prevails in other parts of the country. It is important to realize that the work being done by the Farm Security Administration is primarily that of aiding our farmers who really need help by making it possible to rehabilitate themselves. A little suggestion here and there, a little word of encouragement, and a little appropriate advice and counsel go a long way with these poor farmers whose heart is in their work and whose work is in the soil. By this method we build useful citizens and bring back to our farmers new hope and enthusiasm for their work.

The figures given in this report show that new wealth has been brought to homes heretofore impoverished. They show that old communities by these methods may be brought back to a condition of reasonable fortunes; and that farming may still be made a gainful occupation to the humblest of our people.

I commend the Farm Security Administration on this report. I encourage this agency to exert more effort and more interest along the lines indicated and thereby bring to our farmers more uniformity of success and a more equal distribution of the wealth of the Nation.

National Defense Taxation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY SAUTHOFF
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

LETTER FROM MILO K. SWANTON, WISCONSIN COUNCIL OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

WISCONSIN COUNCIL OF AGRICULTURE,
Madison, Wis., June 9, 1941.

Hon. HARRY SAUTHOFF,
Member of Congress, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN SAUTHOFF: Opposition to a proposed new source of Federal revenue for defense was suggested in a recent meeting of the executive committee of the Wisconsin Council of Agriculture. I am sure it will be of interest to you to know that after much discussion it became the unanimous opinion of the farm representatives present that the time had come when all good Americans should cease the inconsistency of crying for defense appropriations on one hand, while on the other hand opposing every effort to raise such funds as might affect them personally.

The executive committee of the Wisconsin Council of Agriculture disposed of the question by passing the following resolution which calls attention to the handicapped position of the farmer and which makes a plea for equality in levying national-defense taxes:

"Whereas today the farmers of this country are called upon to make great sacrifices, working long hours without sufficient help and facing economic inequalities; and

"Whereas to meet the tremendous expenses caused by the present national crisis, various forms of taxation are now under consideration: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That in providing defense revenues, such defense taxation be graduated on a basis, equitable among all economic groups, so as not to further widen the great disparity already existing between agriculture, industry, and labor."

Sincerely yours,

MILO K. SWANTON,
Executive Secretary.

German-Americans Are Loyal Patriotic Citizens

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

ADDRESS OF THE HONORABLE WILLIAM HUDLETT, MEMBER OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF OHIO, AT A RECENT GATHERING OF GERMAN-AMERICAN CITIZENS IN CLEVELAND, OHIO, JUNE 22, 1941

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address delivered by the Honorable William Hudlett, member of the General Assembly of Ohio from Cuyahoga County, and a leader in German-American activities in the State. Mr. Hudlett's speech in plain understandable words expresses the patriotism and loyalty of the citizens of the United States who are of German extraction.

In these days of hysteria without just cause our German-American friends are assailed by pseudo patriots as Nazis, "bundites," "fifth columnists," and so forth. This is not a new form of attack. It was with us prior to and during the last World War. Only those who would nurture intolerance and bigotry would assail the patriotism of any citizen, regardless of race or religion, unless that individual actually expressed himself in terms of disloyalty to the free institutions of America.

The address follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, in the name of "Die Deutsche Zentrale" I welcome each and every one of you most sincerely. Today we are here to celebrate "Heimatsfest." In other words we came out here to our farm to mingle and meet with old friends and, of course, to make new friends. We are here in this most beautiful spot which we can call our own to enjoy the invigorating air, the beautiful sceneries, and to relax, with our families, away from our daily routine of work and worries.

Unfortunately this farm is not patronized as much as it might be. The membership of the Deutsche Zentrale, in comparison with the German-American citizen population, is, strange as it may seem, very small and very often discouraging to those who work so hard to keep this farm in operation.

Let all of us who are here today be one united family. Let's all be happy that we are here in the United States of America, the greatest land on the face of the earth. Let's be happy because we have the privilege of congregating here as a free people, as citizens of this fine land, and let us be happy that we can enjoy all the privileges and opportunities which no other country has to offer.

I know that most of you were born and raised on the other side of the Atlantic Ocean. I know also that you have many and beautiful memories of your childhood days, when, with your mother and father, sisters, and brothers, you enjoyed the early days of your life; when you went to school and then to work; when you took your girl friend out for the first time or when the ladies made their first date. You went together to fine places—and I know that you all remember so well that it did not cost very much, either. As a matter of fact, it could not cost very much, because not many had the means. And yet what beautiful memories.

And finally you came to America. You remember the first glimpse of the Statue of Liberty—the symbol of freedom. Then your first step on American soil. You were very happy. I know, by my own experience. I know that most of you felt right then and there that a great and wonderful change took place; and with a new lease on life, with new hope for a better future for yourself and families you found and made for yourself a new home.

Your Uncle welcomed you with open arms. He took good care of you from the first minute on when you landed. He made you feel at home, he provided for you, he gave you a job and security. Your Uncle is also my Uncle. He's everybody's Uncle; yes, ladies and gentlemen, Uncle Sam is the greatest uncle anywhere.

And then what? Uncle Sam, with open arms, invited you to become a citizen. Yes, he did. And what did you do? You accepted, immediately, and how. You became a citizen of the United States. How did you feel then? Of course, you felt great. You felt great, because I know. When the man gave you your final papers you were the happiest person alive. That was then, and, this very day. The same papers are just as good—yes, even better, because today we realize the importance and the value of our citizenship.

Waving a flag or saying "I am a citizen of the United States" does not make you a good citizen. There's more to it. Not a single day goes by without a chance for you not only to show but to prove that you are a good citizen. Now is the time, as never before, that all of us—yes, I mean all of us—should stand shoulder to shoulder as citizens of this great United States and do our share and our duties.

This is a democracy, and under a solemn oath you swore allegiance to this democracy. Do you want anyone to question your loyalty? Of course not. Then do not at any time give anybody a chance. You as a single person have the right to resent doubts. And we, as a large body, have a duty, a very important duty, to perform.

We American citizens of German origin resent very strenuously constant and unfounded attacks against us.

For many years (I remember 30 of them) great political leaders attended to our affairs and told us what fine people we were. They told us of the great part we took in building this country, that our pioneers, in forming this land, took one of the greatest parts in it. They praised the German-Americans as one of the finest races.

Ladies and gentlemen, what are we today? Nazis, "fifth columnists," enemies to our country. The men who praised you before were wrong—or those who make these charges today are wrong. You did not change and you will not change. I know you too well for that. Our Government can depend on your loyalty. Let's not boast of what others did many years ago. Let's all do our part today.

Let us help financially, support our President, stand united, support the Constitution of the United States. Let's all defend our freedom, buy Government bonds, take an active part in all of our governmental affairs, study politics, go to the polls to exercise our franchise, and above all, defend our rights and our honor.

We have no place in this country for men and women who under the protection of citizenship papers worship any other country or its leader. We don't want them here. I know that you don't want them here.

We are proud to be American citizens. We are good and loyal citizens.

In the presence of our flag, therefore, let's all stand and rededicate our loyalty by repeating our pledge:

"I pledge allegiance to the flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands. One nation indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

Recognize the Obligation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OVERTON BROOKS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

ARTICLE FROM LOUISIANA WEEKLY NEWSPAPER

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith an editorial recently appearing in one of the weekly newspaper of the State of Louisiana under the title of "Longevity Pay for Postal Employees."

LONGEVITY PAY FOR POSTAL EMPLOYEES

Congress has been considering the longevity-pay-system bill for some time, but it has been dragging along and securing scant attention. There has been no salary increase for postal employees since 1925. The entrance grade salary for letter carriers and clerks is $1,700 per annum, with annual promotions of $100 until the maximum grade of $2,100 is reached. The custodial employees average $1,200 per year.

The proposed longevity pay applies to postal employees. After 10 years of service they would receive $100 per annum increase, and for every 5-year period thereafter an additional $100 per annum until 30 years of continual service is rendered, when the maximum of $2,600 is reached. Under present conditions prevailing in the country, unless this longevity legislation is enacted, postal employees will be attracted to other work, and the Government and the public will lose the benefit of their trained service. There are comparatively few promotions available to a carrier or clerk, and at the present time when he has reached the $2,100 grade at the end of 5 years of service he is through as far as further salary increases are concerned, for even though 40 years are spent in the service there will be no increase in salary. No matter how efficient the employees may be, the peak in salary has been reached.

This longevity legislation was first proposed in 1928 and action on it is now long overdue. The bill was set aside when the depression emergency started and Congress had to devote its entire attention to the acute emergencies resulting from the depression.

It is very fine to have the American people say, as often as it is said, that "our Postal Service is the best in the world," and let it go at that, but, after all, the employees are entitled to just a little more than praise. Give the post-office employee something substantial, something with which he can be a credit to his employer and a credit to the American people, something with which he might give to his wife and family the fruits of his devotion, faithfulness, and loyalty.

Perhaps nowhere in the Government is the necessity for efficiency and fine morale stressed as in the Army and Navy, and in those Departments the principle of longevity pay has long been recognized and accepted as in accord with elementary justice and as an important factor in the promotion of the service in those vital branches of our National Government. The principle which has proven its success in those Departments might well be put into effect in the Post Office Department, where at all times, but especially in emergencies, the operation of the Government, the business of the Nation, and the personal relations of the citizens depend on the efficiency, faithfulness, and skill of postal employees.

Considered from every angle, the Congress should pass the longevity-pay bill and thus recognize the years of faithful service rendered by the postal employees of the country. No doubt, the bill will be approved when it has clear sailing. The delay should not be suffered for any great length of time in the future.

An American Peace Offensive

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. VORYS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. JOHN M. VORYS, OF OHIO, FOR INSTITUTE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I was invited to address the fifteenth annual session of the Institute of Public Affairs on the campus of the University of Virginia at Charlottesville last Tuesday evening, June 24. The general topic of the institute this year was "The United States, the War, and the Future." The topic for Tuesday was "The Obligations of the United States as a World Power." In my address in the evening I suggested that the obligation of this country as a world power was to lead the world to peace as soon as possible.

Believing that my suggestions may be of interest to my colleagues in Congress, I extend herewith, under leave given me by the House, the address I made before the institute:

AN AMERICAN PEACE OFFENSIVE

I speak tonight in the spirit of Thomas Jefferson, who said: "Equal and exact justice to all men, of whatever state or persuasion, religious or political; peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations—entangling alliances with none."

The obligation of the United States as a world power is to lead the world to a just and satisfactory peace as soon as possible. We cannot do this tomorrow, or next day, but the time to discuss this is tonight.

First, let me qualify myself to take part in a discussion of foreign affairs in the temperate dignified language of contemporary diplomacy—Hitler and Stalin are pirates, bloodthirsty gangsters, guttersnipes, criminal scum. I hate Hitler and Stalin. So what? Neither of them is going to accommodate me by letting me bomb them personally or by fighting it out man to man. It is now considered clever to say—let them tear each other to pieces, like two Kilkenny cats—but they won't do it. Instead, millions of Russian and German boys who probably don't want to die are dying, and who probably aren't really mad at anybody are killing each other.

I cannot prophesy how or when the Russo-German campaign will be decided; I leave that to the strategists of the institute. We all know this, however: We do not want this campaign, or this war, to end with Russia triumphant, dominating the world, or with Hitler triumphant, dominating the world. We look forward to a world order of peace and justice not dominated by any single power, not even Britain, in which America will do its part—a leading part but not a dominating part.

This means that we are for a peace that shall not be dictated by any single power. This means that our foreign policy, our obligation to the world and to ourselves, involves more than having Hitler beaten by someone. "Beat Hitler" is a popular slogan, but it is not a foreign policy.

We overpersonalize and oversimplify this struggle. If Hitler and Stalin were both to die tomorrow—if, in fact, they are dead now and some of their numerous stand-ins are taking their places—the war is not won if their systems stand. If, on the other hand, their systems change, or are overthrown from within or from without, then Hitler and Stalin won't matter any more than the old wood chopper of Doorn who died recently, too insignificant to be hated any more.

Our mortal enemy is the totalitarian system, with its force, its lawlessness, its lying, its ruthlessness.

How shall we defeat it?

One way is to defeat it right here at home; to stop the growth of uncontrolled power, regimentation, bureaucracy, censorship, double dealing in foreign affairs.

Another way is by meeting the system on its own terms and opposing force with force, lawlessness with lawlessness, lying with lying, ruthlessness with ruthlessnes, even if this means the bombing or the starving of the women and children of Belgium and France. There are two objections to this:

1. Democracies are not so good at these tactics as dictatorships unless they surrender their democracy.

2. We are not ready yet to meet force with force. We can send token forces of men, planes, or ships. We, too, can take part in heroic evacuations, but we are just not ready for a military offensive. If we abandon aid short of war, we may find ourselves in war short of aid.

There is another way to defeat the Hitler system, and that is by an American peace offensive. We are not ready to fight now, and Hitler knows it. On the other hand, we are getting ready fast, and Hitler knows it. We are not ready to launch an American military offensive, but we are in a strategic position now, before we get in, to launch an American peace offensive.

We are told that this is not the right time. Both Churchill and Roosevelt have discouraged the mention of the word "peace." We must not forget that once we are in war there never is a right time to discuss peace, as shown by the experience of the nations now fighting. If we are losing, peace talk sounds like surrender; if there is a stalemate, it sounds as if we were losing, and sad experience teaches us that peace is not made wisely in the flush of victory. Right now, when we are not ready to fight but will be ready soon, we can lead the world in a peace effort, for the world knows we are leading through strength and not through weakness.

If Britain is losing, we can open negotiations for peace better than she can, and an American peace offensive could be our most effective aid to Britain.

If, as is more likely, a stalemate lies ahead, we can propose peace better now than if we are in, and locked in the stalemate with the others.

If Britain is to win, then we had better obtain some commitments on peace terms while we are needed by the British, rather than wait for another Versailles, when what former Ambassador Bullitt calls "our moral authority" will be gone, because they no longer need us.

We are ready now with the weapons of peace. Surplus food for the starving in Europe. Surplus cotton and wool for those who are naked and will be cold. Surplus gold to finance the crumbled economies of Europe. Friendship to intervene where hatreds are aflame.

You may say these are frail weapons to stop a war machine, a gangster economy. I say these are the most potent weapons on earth. When have starving, naked, penniless, hated people been able to resist food and clothes and gold when offered in friendship?

We must use our peace weapons wisely and courageously and shrewdly and aggressively.

Let's get this clear. We are not going to offer or approve a peace of surrender or defeatism or appeasement. While we would be mediating and would not expect to dictate terms, we would not agree to the dictation of any such terms by anyone else.

We won't take a nonaggression pact dependent on Hitler's honor. We would insist upon guaranties so that we would not have to rely upon Hitler's word, and Germany would not have to rely upon the word of the other belligerents. Terms could be arranged for impounding arms by all sides under joint or international control, strategic positions could be put under such control, other conditions could be arranged that would involve no injury or loss of prestige to any nation intending to keep the peace, so that peace would depend upon more than Hitler's mere promise.

But we are told that Hitler would never agree to any such terms or to any decent terms now. We have an epidemic of mindreaders. People who cannot tell you what Hitler will do in war next week or next month or next year can read his mind as to what he will do in peace now and 10 years from now. They get it from something he said or wrote, although they say you can't trust anything he says. I don't pretend to know Hitler's mind, but we have heard in Washington, in Congress, very definite reports that Hitler would be willing to call it quits with Britain, leave her fleet and Dominion intact, restore every pre-World War conquered country, and settle the rest at the conference table. Why shouldn't he?

We learn through many leaks in the censorship that the German people want peace. Germany has had enough aerial bombing, has lost enough men, more than we lost in the entire World War, to bring the "glories" of war home to the people. Among the German people are many who fear the dynamism of Hitler, who fear that each Nazi victory merely sets the stage for further fighting, further suffering. The German soldiers in the occupied countries are becoming restless. We hear on good authority that the possible entry of America into the war brings up ominous memories in Germany. The mind readers may be wrong about Germany and peace.

Suppose, however, that Hitler will not make peace, that his offers are purely for propaganda purposes, that Hess and Funk and the rest are only to divide us. Then let us turn his own offers—his own tactics—against him. If we launched a peace offensive, intelligently, aggressively, and in good faith, and it failed, it would nevertheless unite our own people as they are not now united, would divide the German people, and would hearten the conquered people. The time to try it, however, is before we go in. We will never have such a chance again.

Our President says that not even a tenth cousin of a peace proposal has been made. It seems to me that the statements of peace aims by Anthony Eden and Secretary Hull are at least first cousins of a peace proposal, but if it be true that neither our country nor the British nor Germany are exploring the possibilities of a just and satisfactory peace now, they had better start now.

What are our peace aims? "Beat Hitler" is a war cry, but it is not a peace aim. Much of our confusion is because of lack of unity on peace aims. There are elements in this country who intend to beat Hitler, and in the doing of it, make us over into a Fascist state by destroying the rights of free labor. There are those in this country who are willing to beat Hitler if, in the doing of it, they can set up a dictatorship of labor unions which shall destroy free capitalism. There are those in this country who think that if we ignore the war, the war will ignore us. There are those in this country who feel that we can regain the good old days and the good old times if only Hitler is destroyed and Churchill's England is preserved. Can we have national unity on any one of these peace aims?

What are our peace aims? The two great spokesmen, President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill, have been reticent and vague on this subject. President Roosevelt has promised everyone the four freedoms and self-determination. Mr. Churchill has said he favored a few "practical measures of reconstruction," but disliked all talk of a new order and wanted to preserve traditional England. Harold Laski and many others in Britain are discussing British peace aims and are insisting that a democratic new order be adopted in England now, not after the war.

The self-labeled 1941 committee commentary has suggested that Britain must "win the peace," as well as the war, and has suggested a program.

Mr. J. B. Priestley has gotten into difficulties as a radio commentator because of his impatience to discuss peace aims.

The Malvern Conference of the Church of England stated a peace program which proposed "a cooperative commonwealth as a new order for Europe." The Pope has presented to the world the peace aims of the great Catholic Church.

In this country, Vice President Wallace, making an unusual speech for a Vice President and doubtless with the approval of the administration, has publicly suggested a pax democratica with a bill rights and a bill of duties.

While statesmen and politicians are vague and brief as to peace, while editors and columnists who are so helpful in predigesting ideas for us are for the most part silent as to peace talk, the church people are talking peace. A number of conferences are being held to attempt to formulate into a workable program the Christian ideal of peace on earth among men of good will. Dr. E. Stanley Jones, a great Methodist missionary and world statesman in the realm of the spirit has said that America's role in this crisis should not be that of intervention or arbitration but of mediation, to produce a cooperative world centered around one idea—equality of opportunity. He suggests for discussion a seven-point program.

Many Americans are struggling to formulate and state our peace aims. Their proposals are all vague and various, as they must be on a vital question that has had so little attention. They have one thing in common—none of them describes a world, an America, such as we now know.

They also reflect what every real student of this war knows—that a world revolution is going on as a part of, and cause of, and result of this war. There is violent disagreement as to just what this revolution is. It is called a revolution against the West, against Roman law, Greek logic, Christian idealism, against democracy, against the "haves," against gold and naval power. James Burnham calls it "the managerial revolution," a label approved by Stuart Chase as something different from capitalism or socialism. I can think of no better quick description than this—a revolution against traditional capitalism. It is going on in every country, going on in the United States. So far it is not our war, but it is our revolution. It is more than a wave of the future, it is the tide of the present, and the scum and guttersnipes may dirty it but they cannot control it for long. If we could only understand it, and in some way think it out instead of fighting it out, as we fought out the Protestant revolution, the French revolution, the industrial revolution, we could make this a better country, a better world. I have some suggestions for peace aims for America. Like the others, they are vague—a basis for discussion rather than a final set of demands:

First. We will preserve this country as a republic and work out the internal effects of this world-wide movement on our system by peaceful, intelligent evolution—not by violent, blind revolution.

Second. We will preserve our hemisphere intact against the military or political aggression of the world.

Third. We recognize the right of similar areas to preserve themselves intact against our military or political aggression.

Fourth. We believe that neighboring states must learn to live together peacefully in union, as we have. We will not approve of the domination of one race, or one nation, or one man. We are opposed to unions or axes based solely on color, language, race, or ideologies. We want a regime in Europe that is not a balance-of-power mosaic. We believe people who live near each other must unite in peace.

Fifth. We believe in equality of opportunity for all nations in markets, raw materials, acquiring land and emigration to all undeveloped lands.

Sixth. We believe in reciprocity of opportunity as to markets, materials, land, and emigration as between developed lands.

Seventh. We will do our part in maintaining world peace, order, and justice based on these principles. We will not enter any arrangement that inevitably involves an immediate war.

Eighth. We will participate in progressive disarmament.

We should start tonight to formulate our peace aims. It will take time and study and discussion. As Anatol Muhlstein says in New Europe:

"In order to have a general conception of what a pacified Europe should be, it will not be sufficient to consult in a hurry between two plenary sessions some prominent experts brought together on the eve of the peace congress.

"This is a long-range work, a work of thought and scientific research which independent minds must undertake without delay."

I have no set idea as to how our proposal should be made. The President will have to take the leadership. On the other hand, I doubt whether a peace offensive would be effective unless the Congress joined. After the sad experience of President Wilson, and in the light of the unreliability of Executive commitments in Europe and elsewhere, we will have to do more than merely send a Presidential note. We must show the world the whole country means business.

But some will say peace now would only be a truce. I do not think so, but always before we have thought each war was the last war and at the end that we were entering perpetual peace. Perhaps it would be wise for us to know this time that war would come again unless we waged peace as bravely and wisely as we wage war.

Suppose all we could get would be a truce for a few years. Who would be the loser? We need those years to complete our arming. On the other hand, Mr. Churchill said Sunday Hitler's "machine cannot stand idle lest it rust or fall to pieces." Let's make it idle so it will rust and fall to pieces. Delay is on our side.

Are we in danger of defeat by the Nazis in peace? They think so, and so do many of our prominent interventionists. I am amazed at the craven defeatism of those Americans who are terrified by the Nazi system in economic competition with ours.

I believe in the American system. I agree with Barney Baruch who says Germany, not the United States, will be "on the spot" economically even if Germany is successful in Europe.

In peacetime competition with Germany I have faith in persuasion versus pressure, Yankee ingenuity versus Prussian efficiency, free labor versus slave labor, Christian love versus pagan hatred, American friendliness versus Nazi nastiness.

My countrymen, America has not led the world in war. I feel certain we could, but before we risk everything in trying it, let us risk nothing by trying to lead the world in peace—something in which we know we can lead the whole world. We have our faults and our frailties, but after all, in cold blood, the Nazis are not the greatest nation on earth, Britain is not the greatest nation on earth—we are the greatest nation on earth. We owe it to thousands abroad who are otherwise sure to die this year to give them the chance to live in peace before we send our thousands to die with them.

Safeguarding the Sugar Supply

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY B. COFFEE

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS BY FRED BRENCKMAN

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address by Fred Brenckman, Washington representative, the National Grange, over stations of the National Broadcasting Co., on the Grange Hour, from Washington, D. C., June 21, 1941:

Congress is at present considering legislation to amend the Sugar Act of 1937. Under this act quotas are allocated to domestic producers of sugarcane and sugar beets. Quotas are likewise fixed for our island possessions, as well as Cuba. About 30 percent of our domestic consumption of sugar is allocated to the continental producers of sugar beets and sugarcane; 42 percent goes to Hawaii, Puerto Rico, the Philippines, and the Virgin Islands, while Cuba gets the remaining 28 percent, including the very small amount that is allocated to other foreign countries.

America leads the world in the consumption of sugar. Our domestic consumption amounts to more than 6,500,000 tons a year, which is at the rate of more than 100 pounds for each man, woman, and child in the country.

Under the provisions of the Philippine Independence Act the duty-free quota of the islands for the present year is fixed at 982,000 tons. However, because of the growing scarcity of shipping and a tremendous increase in ocean-freight rates, the Philippines will not be able to fill their quota this year.

SHIPPING AND INSURANCE RATES SOAR

As an example of the way the freight rates have soared, before the war the cost of shipping a ton of sugar from the Philippines to the United States was $6.75. Today the rate ranges from $25 to $35 a ton. This does not take into account the rise in insurance rates, which are also heavy.

Under the Sugar Act of 1937, the Secretary of Agriculture is directed to prorate any deficit in the Philippine quota to foreign countries other than Cuba. In pursuance of its good neighbor policy, the administration has been very anxious to allot to certain South American countries that portion of the Philippine quota which the islands cannot fill under present conditions.

By a vote of 45 to 26, the United States Senate early this month passed the Adams-O'Mahoney bill, S. 937, directing the Secretary of Agriculture to prorate to foreign countries other than Cuba 75,000 tons of the allotment which the Philippines cannot fill this year. The remainder of the unfilled quota of the Philippines, if any, is to be equitably apportioned among domestic producers.

Secretary of State Hull voices strong objections to the Adams-O'Mahoney bill. He alleges that its enactment "would repudiate the policy of hemisphere defense and the economic cooperation which the American republics agreed upon at the Habana Conference less than a year ago."

The fact is, however, that the 75,000 tons allocated to foreign countries other than Cuba is about three times the allotment to which these countries are entitled under the present act.

There can be no doubt whatsoever that the advocates of the Adams-O'Mahoney Act are on the right track in maintaining that it is not in the interest of national defense to put an unnecessary strain upon shipping facilities by bringing more sugar from such countries as Peru and San Domingo, which lies east of Cuba, when we have in the United States huge surplus stocks of beet sugar which cannot be sold at present because they are in excess of marketing quotas.

COFFEE BILL PLACED ON HOUSE CALENDAR

The House Committee on Agriculture has favorably reported H. R. 3582, introduced by Congressman HARRY B. COFFEE of Nebraska, bearing on this question.

The Coffee bill is directly and fully responsive to the request which had originally been made in 1937 by Secretary Hull on behalf of the Dominican Republic, Peru, and other South American countries. As the report of the committee shows, the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Agriculture in 1937 requested that the deficit of dutiable sugar from the Philippines be transferred to foreign countries. At no time was it stated or understood that foreign countries were promised that they would be given any part of the duty-free quota of the Philippines.

It is impossible, therefore, to justify any claim that the adoption of Congressman Coffee's bill would be a repudiation of a promise. In fact, the Coffee bill pays scrupulous regard to the good-neighbor policy. The good-neighbor policy is a worthy concept, but, just like any other good thing, there are definite limits beyond which the United States Government cannot go without trampling on the rights of American producers.

Most of the opposition to the Adams-O'Mahoney bill, which has already passed the Senate, and to the bill by Congressman COFFEE, comes from the eastern seaboard, where most of our cane-sugar refineries are located. The eastern seaboard refineries base their opposition on the prospect that any increase in the quota of the beet-sugar areas would reduce cane refinery operations. This manifestation of local patriotism is disappointing and unfortunate, coming at a time when unity in the national-defense emergency is so essential.

There are 17 cane-sugar refineries in the United States, of which 4 are in New York. Let us assume that these 4 would benefit by giving to foreign countries a larger share of the sugar market of the United States. Louisiana has 6 refineries and they handle the crop of that State, as well as some of the sugars of Puerto Rico and Cuba.

Under the Coffee bill, the sugar producers of Louisiana and Puerto Rico would furnish their share of the Philippine deficit and in the event of a still further deficit in domestic areas Cuba could furnish its share.

SURPLUS OF DOMESTIC BEET SUGAR

As I have said, domestic areas have a surplus of sugar which cannot be sold because it was in excess of the marketing quotas. The domestic sugar-beet industry on January 1, 1941, had on hand inventories of 1,754,000 tons. Its quota for 1941 is 1,589,000 tons. This means that more than 165,000 tons of beet sugar from the 1940 crop must be carried over until 1942, in addition to the full production of the 1941 sugar-beet crop.

The industry usually markets about 350,000 tons of beet sugar from the current crop during the last few months of each year. The existing surplus of beet sugar amounts to more than 500,000 tons. This was produced in direct compliance with the Sugar Act and has protected consumers against excessive prices.

Because of this surplus, the acreage planted to sugar beets in the United States has been reduced more than 16 percent in conformity with the Sugar Act. Various beet-sugar factories throughout the country have been forced to close down because of this reduction in acreage.

If domestic areas are enabled to market some of their excess sugar this year, increased acreage allotments to domestic growers may be available next year. This would reopen some of the closed factories and relieve unemployment.

It should be understood that the Sugar Act and the quotas which it provides was designed to protect the domestic sugar industry as well as consumers. Without any restrictions on imports, the domestic sugar-beet industry would probably have been driven out of existence. Under present conditions the beet-sugar industry is in a position to protect domestic consumers against price gouging and scarcity, if it is simply permitted to function.

It is argued, with good reason, that under existing abnormal conditions this country ought to emancipate itself so far as possible from dependence on sea-borne sugars, for access to that sugar is rendered precarious by lack of ships and the need to divert all the ships possible to aid Great Britain in the battle of the Atlantic.

If shipping space is scarce this year, it is easily conceivable that it may be still more scarce next year. If we fail to take advantage of the opportunity to expand sugar production at home, there may be a repetition of the conditions that existed in the United States during the first World War, when sugar was retailed at from 30 to 35 cents a pound and when families were strictly rationed in the bargain.

As I have already indicated, only 30 percent of the sugar we consume is produced in the continental portion of the United States. Under existing conditions, we would be fully justified in producing 40 percent of our sugar at home.

HISTORY OF SUGAR INDUSTRY OUTLINED

It is interesting to note that sugar is found in almost every plant and, therefore, has been eaten by man from time immemorial. Commercial sugar today comes almost entirely from the sugarcane and the sugar beet. Sugarcane came first. It probably originated on the banks of the Ganges in India. The first real records of the manufacture of cane sugar were written from 300 to 600 A. D. Sugar making was introduced into Spain in the year 755, and the art soon spread, aided by the vast trade renaissance of the seventh and ninth centuries.

Sugarcane was brought from Europe to the rich soil of the West Indies and then to Brazil and other parts of South America. Cheap slave labor made possible the rapid development that followed in the next two centuries.

The Jesuits are credited with importing and cultivating the first sugarcane in Louisiana, about the year 1750. The first company to refine American-grown sugar is said to have started operations in 1795, a few miles from New Orleans. Practically all of the cane sugar produced in the United States comes from Louisiana and from Florida.

The first successful beet-sugar factory in the United States dates from 1879 in a plant which is still operated at Alvarado, Calif. A decade or two before, Brigham Young had tried to make beet sugar in Salt Lake City, bringing the imported machinery overland by ox train. While Young and his followers triumphed over many other seemingly insuperable obstacles, their attempt to make beet sugar failed.

The sugar beet is white and larger than the ordinary red garden beet. It is cultivated in almost every country in the Temperate Zone from Italy to Sweden, and in 19 American States from Ohio to the Pacific. Successful production depends on soil, topography, water supply, and drainage. The beets are sensitive to frost when very young, but can withstand low temperatures as they approach maturity. Crops take about 6 months to mature. In this country havesting starts in July in California and really gets under way throughout the Nation about the 1st of October. The beets are pulled before the ground freezes, although they wait many weeks for final conversion into refined sugar.

Sugar beets are grown by nearly 100,000 individual farmers of the United States, who in turn sell their product to about 80 beet-sugar factories located at strategic points in the areas of production.

The Bureaucrats' Gift to the Farmers—Russian Whiskers and Leather Boots

OF

HON. FREDERICK C. SMITH

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, we are rapidly approaching the harvest season, the time in the year when God blesses the farmers and all the people of the land with the fruits of their labor. Undoubtedly, the occasion of this harvest will be as memorable to today's tillers of the soil as it was to our Founding Fathers.

The Pilgrims, founders of this great Nation, were ever mindful of the veneration man owes to his Creator, and set aside a special day to give thanks for the blessings of harvest.

I doubt, however, if the American farmers of today can really give much thanks for the blessings of the 1941 harvest season. This harvest season will be different. It will definitely mark the American farmers' introduction to the beginning of a complete communistic agricultural program that was made possible by the recently enacted amendments to the so-called marketing quotas under the A. A. A., passed by this Congress May 13, 1941, and which made so strongly for the setting up of compulsory corn and wheat quotas.

This bill was supposed to give something to the farmer. If it did, I am afraid the gift will turn out to be Russian whiskers and leather boots. And this should be expected since the President yesterday, in his June 24 press conference, startled the country by announcing faith in communistic Russia to such an extent that he intends to give them full material benefit of the notorious lend-lease bill, which should be properly called lend-lose bill, because it so generously dips into the money pocket of the American taxpayer. Well, thank God, my conscience is clear on that score because I voted against the lend-lease bill—H. R. 1776—and one of my reasons for voting against same, as the record will show, was that the bill made aid possible to Russia and I feared the administration might desire to help Russia. I warned this House against that danger in my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 24, 1941, entitled "The So-Called Lend-Lease Bill." And I warned this Nation over the Columbia Broadcasting System on the evening of January 22, 1941, when these January 24 RECORD remarks were given as a radio address.

I also warned this House on April 29, 1941, of the viciousness of these so-called marketing quota amendments. It was my opinion at that time that my remarks were timely. Today, as harvest time approaches, I think they are more timely because this legislation draws the American farmer nearer to his doom. At this point I would like to read to this body again the warning I issued on this floor on April 29, which went unheeded:

Mr. Speaker, I am voting against this bill which will, if it passes, make the farm program compulsory for all farmers.

Congress and the bureaucracy which grew out of the A. A. A. program and the administration or its spokesmen have persistently in no uncertain terms assured the farmers they would never make this program compulsory. Now all pretense is thrown to the winds and henceforth all farmers will be compelled to join the program or be penalized for not so doing.

Even the farmers who were not in the program and who planted wheat last fall will be, under this bill, forced to pay as a penalty about 50 cents per bushel for all wheat they raise over and above the quotas fixed by some bureaucrat here in Washington who probably in his entire life never planted a grain of wheat. Could anything possibly be more unfair than this?

I understand the Agriculture Department intends to exempt corn from the program for this year, but it will be in the hands of that Department to do whatever it pleases.

I do not believe the majority of the farmers of the United States if they had an opportunity would vote for this compulsory feature in the farm program. I believe most farmers still feel that they are more capable of managing their own farms than the politicians in Washington.

Ever since I have been in Congress I have been warning the farmers and people of my district of the danger of the farm program ultimately becoming compulsory. Now it is here if this bill passes. From now on it may be expected the bureaucrats will pull the rope tighter and tighter around the farmers' necks. This bill now tells them how much they can plant. Soon they will be told what they can plant, when they can plant it, and how much they can keep of what they produce.

This is just another long step toward making agricultural slaves out of the American farmers.

In the short space of 6 weeks the things which the supporters of these marketing quota amendments denied have come to pass. The American farmer has been denied the right to plant what he wishes, the amount he wishes, and the right to keep that which he produces. It makes him an agricultural slave.

Abuse of Power

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES R. ROBERTSON
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

STATEMENT BY C. J. MURPHY

Mr. ROBERTSON of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to present a very lucid statement made by C. J. Murphy, an attorney at Grand Forks, N. Dak., in regard to Senate bill 674, relating to procedure of administrative officers and agencies of the Government. The statement is presented herewith:

Senate bill 674, which would prescribe "fair standards of duty and procedure of administrative officers and agencies," should be promptly passed by Congress. Every Member of Congress must be painfully aware of the abuse of power by many of the new Federal bureaus and the resulting detriment to business. Members of these boards ignore common rules of fair play, have lost all sense of impartiality, and seem to have the conviction that the men connected with industry are arch criminals.

This bill, if enacted, would require that the functions of those presiding at hearings shall be "judicial in nature," and their conduct governed by "the accepted canons of judicial ethics." What would we think of a judge of one of our courts who would be willing to play the part of investigator and prosecutor of a case pending before him for decision? Would there be a chance, if this practice prevailed in the courts, that we would be governed by law—not men? What would become of what is left of the Bill of Rights? It is just as important, perhaps more important in view of the growth of administrative law and agencies, for us to have impartial men passing upon the issues and problems of present-day business.

The men in our bureaus who are supposed to counsel and advise businessmen and aid them in managing their business under our complex and often bewildering statutory law, are in the habit of disqualifying themselves from the very beginning of proceedings. They not only become complainant, but resort to almost every third-degree method invented for bringing hardened criminals to justice. There is the ex parte counseling with underlings of bureaus who are making investigations, without the knowledge of the accused, unnecessary demands for access to business books and records, newspaper publicity for the Government's side of the case with derogatory statements or insinuations against the defendant, or at best silent treatment, decision of questions of fact without reading the evidence, upon the say-so of some young whippersnapper who says he read the record, and so on. This sort of thing cannot continue without the loss of the last vestige of our way of life.

Many cases might be cited to prove these charges, but it is not necessary as they must be well known to the Members of Congress. They will undoubtedly be aired plenty in debate on the present bill. One of the most flagrant cases was decided by the National Labor Relations Board and came before the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia. The dissenting opinion of Judge Stephens points out the many abuses of the rights of citizenship and dangers that confront us in the future growing out of the maladministration of law by half-baked uplifters and radicals of every grade.

It is clearly the duty of every patriotic Members of our Congress to give this bill preferred attention, to the end that it may be passed so overwhelmingly that there will be no veto. However, should the measure meet the fate of the Logan-Walter bill it should be passed over the veto.

Lippmann Aids the Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BERNARD J. GEHRMANN
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

ARTICLE BY WALTER LIPPMANN

Mr. GEHRMANN. Mr. Speaker, in my estimation, Walter Lippmann is one of the Nation's outstanding columnists. Realizing the great influence of pens of men of his stature, I have noted with pleasure his honest factual reporting and the complete reliability of his statements.

Among his outstanding qualities is his constructiveness. I was happy to see in his column appearing in the Washington Post of June 19 that he is lending his support to the St. Lawrence seaway. His logic is refreshing, and I hope that the contagion of his straight thinking will be effectual now.

The article follows:

TODAY AND TOMORROW—OUR UNUSED RESERVES
(By Walter Lippmann)

A question of very general importance came up before the House committee on Thursday when Secretary Stimson was testifying in favor of the agreement with Canada to develop the St. Lawrence seaway. This is a project which, besides developing a considerable amount of hydroelectric power in a region where it is badly needed, would open a channel for shipping from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean. Whatever regional and other objectons there may have been to the project in the past, it is fair to say that on the merits it would be an immense advantage to us today if it had been completed years ago. Who can seriously deny the value of being able to develop American sea power in the heart of the North American Continent, and of being able to provide the great inland industrial and agricultural centers with access to the sea? We must wish we had had the foresight to carry out this project in the years when we were spending so much money on less valuable things.

The only real question now is whether, since it will require several years to complete it, we ought to regard the seaway as a genuine defense project. Secretary Stimson, who surely has as vivid a knowledge of the urgency of the defense program as anyone and certainly is not remotely interested in boon-doggling, has now urged Congress to approve. That ought just about to settle the matter for those who have kept an open mind, and particularly in view of Mr. Stimson's argument that he regards this long-range undertaking as necessary preparation "for a very long emergency."

This poses the question which appears again and again in planning the defense program—how to combine quick results as soon as possible with greater results in the long run? For, looked at one way—that of stopping Hitler this year—we must sprint; looked at the other way—that of insuring Hitler's defeat, we must prepare for a long-distance run. The correct planning of the total effort requires a sound and bold judgment as to when to sprint, when to get ready for the long run, and how, if possible, to do both.

It is, in fact, necessary to do both. Obviously, Hitler has to be stopped so he cannot win, and no less obviously he will be defeated more quickly if, when he has been stopped, the preparations are well advanced for an overwhelming production in the long run. There is no paradox in saying that the more fully we are prepared for a long war, the shorter the war is likely to be.

Now, for the United States there is, speaking broadly, no reason why we cannot combine the sprint with the long-distance effort. We can do both better than any other nation in the world, because we have incomparably the greatest reserves of industrial power. Our immediate emergency effort, considerable though it is, uses a much smaller proportion of our much greater industrial power than the war effort of Germany or Britain. Therefore, there can be no question of our being able to push the emergency program and also to supplement it with a longer-range program. We have an unused reserve.

LETTER FROM THE ADJUTANT GENERAL, UNITED STATES ARMY

Mr. MYERS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including below a letter from the War Department regarding the recently adopted slogan, "Keep 'Em Flying."

The spirit back of this slogan is fine and commendable. It typifies united action.

The idea is another product of Lt. Col. Harold N. Gilbert, of the Adjutant General's office, an outstanding officer who only last November stood before the Secretary of War and was awarded the Distinguished Service Medal for "exceptionally meritorious service in a position of great responsibility." Already Colonel Gilbert possessed the Distinguished Service Cross for "extraordinary heroism in connection with military operations against the enemy" and the Purple Heart, for wounds received in action. I trust the idea embodied in the following letter will meet with universal favor and cooperation:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., June 19, 1941.

Hon. FRANCIS J. MYERS,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MYERS: The War Department requests your cooperation and assistance in popularizing the recently adopted slogan, "Keep 'em flying!" It is the desire of the Department to make "Keep 'em flying!" a popular everyday expression used by persons in all walks of life throughout the Nation. It is designed to focus the public mind on unity of purpose and action in our national-defense effort and applies to the wheels of progress in the whole national-defense program as well as to airplanes.

The objective, of course, is to get people everywhere to use the phrase "Keep 'em flying!" as an expression of felicity, high morale, or as a toast, to the point where "Keep 'em flying!" will replace such everyday expressions as "So long," "I'll be seeing you," "Down the hatch," "Good-bye," "Good luck," and similar expressions. In short, "Keep 'em flying!" is to be our expression comparable to "Thumbs up."

Thanking you, and with kindest regards.

"Keep 'em flying!"

E. S. ADAMS,
Major General,
The Adjutant General.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WARD JOHNSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, are we convoying ships across the ocean? Many would like to know definitely the answer to this question. Robert S. Allen and Drew Pearson, prominent columnists of Washington have answered this question very definitely in a release they have sent directly to certain newspapers throughout the Nation, and not through United Features Syndicate that usually releases the column of these two reporters.

We cannot expect unity of action on the part of our Nation unless our people are informed as to what is transpiring in this critical period, and especially are they entitled to know what part our Government is taking in this world conflict.

It is common knowledge that agents of the Axis Powers are familiar with the aid we are extending to Britain, and therefore by giving this information to our own people we will not be aiding the Axis Powers by giving them information beyond what they already have.

This release by Pearson and Allen was printed on June 24 in the Long Beach Independent, of Long Beach, Calif., and the following is a copy of that release:

INSIDE ON AIR PATROL

(By Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen)

WASHINGTON.—A group of American naval vessels have just returned from their first experience at Atlantic patrol and/or convoying. Whatever it is called, they helped to get about 80 British merchantmen safely most of the way to the west coast of Africa. There the British took over.

Just after the American warships left Nazi bombers sank four British tankers. They were big, modern tankers capable of making 17 knots, but held down to about 9 knots by the slow speed of the convoy.

The manner in which the new Atlantic patrol operates is unique in naval history. Here are the mechanics:

United States warships picked up the British merchantmen in a British Western Hemisphere port—in this case, Bermuda. (Sometimes the north Atlantic route is used via Halifax, but the route is seldom the same.) Prior to that British vessels had been concentrating for several weeks in various West Indian ports—wheat and meat ships, together with oil tankers. The British merchantmen which awaited the United States patrol in Bermuda chiefly carried munitions. Oil tankers comprised the most important part of the convoy, there being about 30 of them, a number carrying airplanes on their decks.

Three United States airplane carriers, 6 destroyers, and 3 cruisers accompanied the convoy across the Atlantic—but never within sight of the 80 British merchantmen.

One airplane carrier steamed ahead of the merchantmen, another to the rear, another to the north. Each carrier was protected by two destroyers, zigzagging constantly. The carriers performed the most important part of the patrol, keeping their airplanes constantly scouring the sky.

GERMAN RAIDER SUNK

Once a plane sighted a German surface raider and radioed its position to British warships, which rushed up and sank her. The battle took place so close to American vessels that they could hear the firing, though they never saw the ships. United States radio operators picked up a distress message sent to Berlin by the Nazi vessel, saying that she was sinking.

On another occasion an airplane carrier detector picked up the vibrations of a submarine and signaled it to come to the surface. When there was no answer, United States destroyers immediately dropped depth charges. After that the detector picked up no more vibrations.

Later, another submarine was detected and warned to come to the surface. It did so and proved to be one of the long-range French submarines—the largest in existence and manned by a Free French and British crew. It carried a small airplane aboard.

When the patrol reached its meeting place with the British, near the Cape Verde Islands, off the African coast, it turned north, and shortly after this the 12 United States naval vessels headed home.

In the same issue of the Long Beach Independent appeared an editorial on this question of informing the American people of what our Nation is doing in this war. This editorial reads as follows:

TRUTH WILL OUT

The Independent again today publishes a sensational news release by Pearson and Allen, authors of Washington Merry-Go-Round. This article did not come through the regular channels which distribute their syndicate articles. This newspaper is fully aware of the great responsibility which falls upon it in publishing news which has been turned down by those in charge of national syndicates. It is gratifying that this responsibility has been accepted by an overwhelming number of those newspapers through the Nation which subscribe to Pearson and Allen's informative and remarkably accurate account of what goes on in Government. This response on the part of the American press reveals an alert insistence that the truth in the news be made known to the people of this Nation regardless of attempts to suppress such truth.

It is one thing to suppress news of actions which are yet to happen, because premature release might endanger such actions, but it is quite another thing to suppress news of actions that have already taken place, news, which, incidentally, is known to all the governments involved in this war.

The President in his latest speech on the international situation told the people that we were going to deliver supplies to Britain. It is evident that such a policy is being carried out according to Pearson and Allen's story. However, the people of the United States were not told that these actions had been carried out. Why they have not been told these facts, we do not know, but whatever the reasons may be cannot obscure the duty of democratic government to fully inform its people of every act and every move as soon as these are made.

Anyone in government who does not subscribe to such a principle does not belong in government conducted in the American way.

As a people we will not attain unity of purpose nor confidence in our leadership nor build up our morale unless our leadership deals with us frankly, openly and honestly. So long as we remain a democracy the right of the people to know all the facts of those activities which may take us into war is so absolute as to be unassailable except by those who are the enemies of democracy.

Our public-opinion polls indicate that the American people would undoubtedly support any action no matter how drastic in order to carry into operation our policy of aid to Britain. Those who criticize these polls, such as Senator WHEELER and others, disregard all of our past experiences which have shown that the polls in question are remarkably accurate indexes of public opinion. From first-hand knowledge of how such opinions are gathered and how great an effort is made to secure unbiased and uncolored opinion, we believe that they are far more accurate as a sample of public opinion than any unsupported statements from groups who assert their contrary.

With such polls revealing a vast majority of opinion supporting the policy of the President, we cannot understand the reticence on the part of Government officials to return that confidence. There is an increasing tendency to suppress news from every quarter of Government, and we insist that such tendencies are dangerous to the security of the state. History is consistent in revealing that suppression of news is exercised more zealously in the direction of covering up stupidity and blunders than it is in keeping vital information from the enemy.

This newspaper supports the proposition as outlined by Pearson and Allen that so long as the American people are the ones who are going to shed the blood and do the shooting in any war in which we may become involved they are not only entitled to know the facts, but they will be given the facts by a free press. We further indict those who would hide the facts from the American people as failing in their first and most solemn responsibility to those who support them in power to account fully, frankly, and often for their stewardship. No group, no clique, no man, is indispensable in a democracy, and if we must, in order to maintain our constitutional rights, demonstrate that fact, we are confident the American people can and will find those who have enough confidence in them to believe them capable of dealing with truth to serve them. Let us remember it was Jesus who said:

"The truth shall make men free."

So long as we struggle to maintain freedom, so long must we struggle to maintain truth, as both are the great foundation stones of our Nation.

As was said recently by a public-opinion expert:

"The American people may be deficient in information but they are long on common sense." Armed with truth that common sense would be our greatest weapon.

The New York Stock Exchange and Its Relation to World Events

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES M. BARNES
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. EMIL SCHRAM

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by Hon. Emil Schram, chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, at the Hotel Commodore, New York City, on June 25:

Mr. Toastmaster and gentlemen, my feelings in facing this audience tonight are, I must confess, somewhat mingled. In the first place, I deeply appreciate your having extended to me this opportunity to spend an evening informally with you in so cordial an atmosphere. I had hoped for just such an occasion as this in order to become better acquainted with all of you in advance of the time when I shall assume my new duties. The courtesy shown by the members of the exchange and the Association of Stock Exchange Firms in arranging this dinner is, I know, characteristic.

Quite apart from this warmth of friendly fraternity, however, I cannot fail to sense that tonight I am undergoing what might be called a baptism by total immersion. I am reminded this very minute of a young lad back in Illinois who once heard that there was a job open as watchman at the crossing of the single-track railroad which bordered our farm. The railroad boss told the boy he would have to undergo a strict examination. Quite enthusiastic about his abilities, the youth said, "Ask me anything," and thereupon his prospective employer came at him with this query:

"Suppose you were at the crossing, and two trains were coming along 60 miles an hour—head-on. What would you do?"

"Well—I'd blow my whistle."

"Yes, but suppose your whistle was out of order."

"I'd always wear a red shirt, and I'd take it off and flag the train."

"But suppose it happened at night."

"Then I'd swing my lantern."

"Suppose you had no oil in your lantern."

"In that case I'd holler for my sister."

"Your sister? What for?"

"So she'd come and see the damnedest wreck she ever saw in her life."

In case any of you are in doubt, I think I should tell you at this point that, although some have said the exchange is at the crossroads, I do not anticipate that there will be any head-on collision, or that I will have any use for a whistle, a red shirt, or even a lantern. Besides, I haven't any sister.

If you have been reading the press comment I suppose you have already noted that this fellow who stands before you as your president-elect is jumping from the stockyards to the stock exchange—that he has had a passing acquaintance only with the bulls on his farm back home, and until very recently had never met any of the kind that are supposed to frequent the Street, although lately they have been conspicuous by their absence.

Next Tuesday, when I sit down at my desk at No. 11 Wall Street, I shall become an integral part of your community. This is probably the last occasion upon which I can speak to you with any sense of detachment. It is for that reason that I am now so bold as to present a few of my personal observations with respect to the exchange and its relation to world events at this time. I know you will accept these remarks in the spirit in which they are offered—that you will be patient with one who, entering this intricate field, intends to balance with sincerity what he may lack in technical experience.

As most of us realize, the drastic national-defense steps now being undertaken are absolutely imperative if we are to protect that precious heritage which identifies our American way of living. Today nothing will satisfy our people except the efficient and effective production of those things which are essential to the full defense of our Nation. Last week, at another meeting in this city, I had occasion to remark that the democracy we are struggling to preserve must not be weakened in the defense process but must be strengthened. Quite obviously, then, full economic efficiency is a vital part of our preparedness. This requires the fullest development of all those facilities which contribute to the success of our economy. Free markets are a proper and necessary adjunct of that democratic system to the preservation of which the country has now consecrated itself. I regard the stock exchange, therefore, as an institution whose continued vitality is of national concern.

In the past few weeks, out of natural curiosity and self-interest, I have been assembling and assimilating a few ideas, most of which will, of course, sound platitudinous in your informed circle. For example, I was impressed by the fact that the history of your exchange, which had its origin a century and a half ago, almost parallels in time the history of the Nation. Yours is an organization with a long and honorable record of which both you and the Nation have a right to be proud. I know, too, that, regardless of popular notion, the exchange is not mysterious—no more so than the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, of which I am now Chairman, is mysterious.

In this connection I want to say that I believe that these two institutions possess a great many attributes in common. Nor do I regard my new position as representing an abrupt transition from my duties with the Government during the past 8 years. I refer, of course, to the obvious fact that both the R. F. C. and the exchange are institutions which exist to perform a worthy public service. Surely no one will deny that the exchange has a great national service to perform because of its strategic location—not on the periphery but in the very center of our economic orbit.

As I visualize it, the exchange is the public square in the business community of America.

It is the meeting place of capital and industry. Through those companies whose securities it has on its list it presents a composite panorama of American business. To me this is a thrilling and exciting picture.

According to reliable estimates, some twelve to fifteen million people in this country own securities directly, not including that large number who have an indirect ownership in securities through insurance and bank accounts. How many of this number own securities listed on your exchange I do not know, but in any event a great many people and a great many institutions require the services of your market. It goes without saying that these investors want to see that market maintained at maximum efficiency and maximum serviceability. There is no room for pessimism concerning the future of this exchange. It occupies a permanent place in our economy. Those who really need this institution—the investors of capital—will not permit it to be destroyed.

Let me say that, while I have emphasized the essential usefulness of your market to investors, I fully appreciate the constructive influence of speculation by informed people who can afford to assume risks. That kind of speculation unquestionably contributes to market stability and thus serves the interests of investors.

Without financial pioneering the development of the vast resources of the Nation would have been immeasurably retarded. One need only to recall the early history of our great industrial empires to realize the important role played by risk money in the economic growth of the country.

Because your exchange is affected with a public interest, because it is vital to the American economy, the problem of the future would seem simply to be this: How can it best serve that public interest which is the reason for its existence?

Looking at this problem from the point of view of one who is uninitiated in stock-market custom and tradition, but who, nevertheless, confesses some familiarity with business in general, I would say that the answer to this problem lies in the operation of the exchange both as a business enterprise and as a public utility.

In assuming my new position as president of your exchange, I shall feel, therefore, that I am becoming a part of a thoroughly businesslike organization. The desirable steps which have been taken recently by the exchange itself to introduce the corporate form of management demonstrate your determination to provide the framework for competent operation of your market place. This forward-looking measure indicates the sincerity with which you accept your public responsibility. As a result of this concept, I believe that you cannot fail to command the universal respect of both the Government and the vast numbers who make use of your facilities.

In this connection I am pleased at the warm reception which you have given tonight to my predecessor, Mr. Martin, who has done honor to me by taking leave from his military duties and coming a long distance to be present on this occasion. It is gratifying to witness this demonstration of your esteem. I feel that I am under a special obligation to Mr. Martin by reason of the many constructive achievements which have marked the 3 years of his administration. I realize that my own path has been made easier because of the work which he has done, and I am happy to join with you in paying tribute to him.

Mr. Martin recognizes, as I do, that our first responsibility is to the public. Although we live in an age of propaganda and monstrous build-ups, the beating of drums through elaborate publicity campaigns cannot win a lasting public confidence. Public confidence is only the reward of public service. Never before in the history of this Nation has there been presented a riper opportunity for public service—a service devoted to the fortification of our economy and to the protection of our democratic system.

The exchange is merely a mart through which securities are bought and sold. Through your listing requirement of full disclosure of comprehensive information, you see to it that the merchandise available on your market bears an honest label. I know that it has been repeated that "the Stock Exchange is not Wall Street, nor is it Wall Street's keeper." It should be recognized, however, that the public does not understand this delineation. Unhappily, the term Wall Street, through a psychological tyranny of words, has come to be a generic term applied to all brokers and dealers in securities wherever they transact their business. The exchange has been more sinned against than sinning in having the derelictions of some individuals for whom it was not responsible unjustly heaped upon its doorstep.

One of the bright spots in your story—and one which has helped to increase public confidence—is your support of sound financial policies in business. This is a subject with which I can claim some familiarity, due to my association with the R. F. C. for the last 8 years. The R. F. C., too, in connection with loans of every variety—loans to banks, to railroads, to drainage and irrigation districts, and to business enterprises—has always insisted upon a regular amortization of funded debt. To me it is quite apparent that only through such sound policy can the interests of the investor be safeguarded. It has been the fundamental purpose of R. F. C. to assist in establishing such financial practices in order to insure the economic stability of the Nation.

To the extent that the exchange continues to assert a position of leadership in this direction, the closer and happier will be its relationship with the Securities and Exchange Commission, which is interested in the same objective. It is illogical to suppose that the S. E. C. is intent upon either the destruction of the exchange or the strangulation of security markets. The S. E. C. appreciates, just as we all do, the vital position which the exchange holds in our economy. The purpose of the S. E. C. is the same today as it was at its inception: To require a full and fair disclosure of the character of securities sold and to prevent inequitable and unfair practices in security markets. To undertake this important task, to effect an external regulation which had never before been attempted, the S. E. C. had to be permitted in the beginning a wide field for experimentation. Obviously any subject possessing such variable factors as the security markets could hardly be regulated by any rigid formula. I earnestly believe that the S. E. C.'s regulations, together with your own, have afforded that strong measure of protection which is essential to the public interest. One day, not far distant, the merit of such accomplishment will have become axiomatic.

In this time of rapidly changing concepts one should not cling tenaciously to the inertia of the past. This is a trying period calling for bold action. For instance, we at R. F. C. during the last year have been acquiring vast quantities of strategic and critical materials, financing the construction of emergency-plant facilities—doing a whole host of other things which it was never dreamed would ever come within the ambit of R. F. C.'s authority. Such jobs have been undertaken simply out of necessity—which is still the mother of invention. The same attitude must prevail in every branch of our economy.

I have never in any sense been a radical. Neither do I consent to the name conservative—especially if a conservative is defined as "one who will not look at the new moon out of respect for that ancient and honorable institution, the old one." Besides, except from a personal point of view, the terms are entirely relative and it is hard to tell where the one ends and the other begins.

I have not donned overnight a Joseph's coat of conservatism. In speeches all over this land, during my tenure as Chairman of the R. F. C., I have said and I now repeat, that I do not subscribe to the theory of government in business except as an emergency measure. Some of you fear competition from government in the investment field. I do not share those apprehensions. There has been too much talk about the Government—and not enough talk about our Government. Today business and government have become a team in the defense effort. From this relationship a finer understanding is sure to result.

Cooperation must be the keynote of the hour in America. It is important to remember that, while the dictatorships are characterized by compulsory tactics, a representative democracy must grow by that upon which it feeds. And that is voluntary mutual effort. The prime object and purpose of this country at the present time is to prove to the world that a free people can work together for defense. Such cooperation cannot be conscripted—it must spring from the faith and hope of those individuals who cherish the freedom of our society.

This spirit of cooperation was certainly appreciated by an old darkey on a worn-out farm down South who was approached by his deacon for a contribution to the church.

"This sho' is a pretty crop you and the Lord raised on your farm this year, Brudder John," said the deacon.

"Yeah," said the good brother.

"The Lord sho' has been gen'rus to you this year," said the deacon.

"Yeah," said the brother.

"Well, don't you think you ought to be grateful to the Lord and give a little donation to the church and the parson?"

"Well," said the good brother, "I donno 'bout dat. You oughta' seen dis place las' year when the Lord had it by hisself."

I believe this thought of cooperation has particular application to the stock exchange. Its problems call for firm and aggressive administration and for an enthusiastic acceptance of that type of leadership. I do not expect that my administrative task will be easy. But neither do I expect that it will be too difficult because I recognize that both of the essentials to a successful administrative program are conspicuously present in your organization. I refer to the integrity of the exchange and to that deep desire, which I know pervades your entire membership, to operate it in a manner to serve best the public interest.

I expect to bend to the oars, but if you should cease to row our craft will only move in a circle. I am no Aladdin with a magic lamp, no Moses promising to lead you out of the wilderness. I offer no panacea for all your ills. But I do say—and I believe with all my heart—there is no problem facing the exchange today which we cannot solve together by intelligent effort and earnest endeavor. Suppose we—I mean all of you—the membership, the Association of Stock Exchange Firms, the management of the exchange, myself included—suppose we make the resolution tonight that we apply the same resourcefulness, the same ingenuity, and the same energy to this business as we see displayed by management of the companies listed on your exchange. Is there any doubt as to what the results would be?

I believe that your Association of Stock Exchange Arms can perform a useful and valuable function by assisting in the rehabilitation of your business. It strikes me that you have in this association the nucleus of a powerful trade body, a trade association devoted to your highest aspirations. Such an association, adequately financed and staffed, should become a vigorous coordinating force. Many examples of cooperative effort have been set by other industries. As I visualize it, your association, properly organized for such a purpose, could become the strong right arm of the exchange. I do not attempt, of course, to prescribe any particular program, and I am not suggesting that the exchange relinquish any of its responsibilities or functions. I present this to you merely as an idea which I believe to be sound and which I suggest for your serious consideration.

In the days ahead there is opportunity for everyone to contribute patriotic service, service which in many cases will be of equal consequence with that rendered in the military offices of the General Staff. Within this category are those activities protecting national credit, those activities preserving civil rights, those activities promoting economic stability, and those activities insuring free enterprise.

The defense of such principles constitutes as great an evidence of patriotism as any citizen of this Nation can reveal.

It is service of this character to which I dedicate my future efforts as president of our exchange.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD, late a Senator from the State of Texas

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the passing of Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD is a great blow to our country. Senator SHEPPARD worked himself to death in the interest of the people he loved, had the honor to serve for a long period of time, and in the interest of our national preparedness program, which placed a very heavy burden upon him in view of the fact that he was the chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs. Senator SHEPPARD was really casualty number one in the present national emergency, and the disabilities which caused his death were incurred in line of duty. He is, therefore, just as much a hero as if he had been a soldier in uniform and had been killed upon the field of battle in the defense of his country and his country's cause.

It was my privilege to know Senator SHEPPARD all my life. I have lived in the same city, Texarkana, Tex., with him for 16 years and have been rather closely associated with him in Congress longer than 12 years.

Senator SHEPPARD was a man of strong character, strong convictions, and possessed the courage, persistence, and the ability that are so vital in the accomplishment of the many good things advocated. Very few men in public life have demonstrated the courage and strength of character that Senator SHEPPARD demonstrated upon many occasions when his personal views conflicted with his party's platform and his party leaders. His course, in such situations, was always commendable and invariably resulted in his enemies and opponents having a higher regard for and greater confidence in him.

No one ever questioned his veracity or his honesty. In addition, he was trustworthy, dependable, loyal, able, faithful, courageous, and efficient. He was genuine in every way. No State or congressional district ever had a more loyal and faithful Representative. The good, true, Christian life he lived is an inspiration to every person who knew him. He was always a public-spirited citizen in the locality where he resided, and in the Nation no greater American has ever lived.

At the time of his passing he was the Dean of Congress. If he had lived and had been reelected in 1942, and doubtless he would have been reelected without opposition if he had lived, by the time he served out the term commencing January 3, 1943, he would have broken the all-American record for length of service in Congress. He first came to Congress in 1902, as a Representative of the First Congressional District of Texas, the district that I now have the honor to represent. In 1913 he was elected to the Senate.

The only five Members of Congress who have exceeded his record of service were: Representative Cannon, Republican, of Illinois, once Speaker of the House, who served 46 years, but nonconsecutively; Morrill, of Vermont, who served 43 years and 7 months consecutively in the House and Senate; Frye, of Maine, 40 years and 4 months consecutively in both Houses; Gillette, of Massachusetts, 38 years consecutively in both Houses; Swanson, of Virginia, 38 years nonconsecutive service in both Houses. Swanson was a Democrat, the others Republicans.

At the end of another term of service Senator SHEPPARD would have served consecutively 46 years and 2 months.

No Member of Congress, House or Senate, has ever been held in higher esteem, more loved or highly respected by his colleagues than Senator SHEPPARD. By reason of his passing the people and the country have suffered a great loss.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. BARNES

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

ADDRESS OF EMIL SCHRAM, CHAIRMAN, RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Hon. Emil Schram, Chairman, Reconstruction Finance Corporation, before the National Retail Credit Association, New York, N. Y., Monday, June 16, 1941:

I have been asked to speak to your association this afternoon on the subject of business and government. Certainly no topic is of greater importance during this critical time of national defense. For today we find that the whole of our Nation's business has taken on a governmental aspect, and the whole of our Government has taken on a business aspect—all in a concerted effort to carry through to successful completion our huge national-defense program. Business and government have truly joined hands in an all-out effort which supersedes all other interests.

To all of us the strengthening of our defense on the massive scale necessary to modern warfare is a new experience. Although convinced of its necessity, although seeing clearly the implications of war, many of us, nevertheless, are inclined to be overawed by the proportions of our preparedness program. Methods of national defense, like methods of international aggression, have undergone tremendous change. The successful defense of a nation now depends upon its productive capacity, and only that nation which is economically strong can endure.

It has been said that "we live in deeds, not years." If so, certainly this country has lived within the past year more life than in the normal span of 10. Nineteen hundred and forty was a year of awakening. We began that year with Europe in what was termed a "phoney war"—a war we thought would never come within striking distance. We began that year with a beautiful dream that a peaceful nation could stay at peace. At year's end that dream was shattered. America has now witnessed nation after nation torn from the paths of peace and now it is alive to the fact that wide reaches of the earth are ruled by men who observe only a "grab" law. The ingenuity of the machine age has resulted in a new peak in brutality. Today we know that America cannot be allowed to make a false step by standing still—that with the ramparts we must watch, a new vigilance is necessary—a vigilance combined with service. Every American has a vital part to play. Our modern minutemen must keep farms, factories, stores, industries. Thus only will the outcome of any future conflict be predetermined. We are faced with a new conception of industrial mobilization—the mobilization of finance, of labor, of business. And all planning must now take account of defense needs.

Because of the vital importance of credit in our defense economy, the members of your association should be most concerned with these economic changes which have already taken place and with the changes yet to come. Credit has been the object of your investigation and study for a great many years. By Latin derivation, of course, the term "credit" denotes faith or confidence. In this modern time of international aggression and conflicting ideologies, it should be recognized that this credit—this faith or confidence—is the mortar which binds the structure of business, society, and government.

It has been my good fortune to be connected for more than 8 years with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and during more recent years to serve as its chairman. The activities of the R. F. C., like those of your own association, have always been associated with credit. In the beginning, the R. F. C. was concerned with the rehabilitation of the entire credit structure of the country. Unless the pressure of current events has erased the recollection from your minds, you will recall that it was a complete break-down of our credit structure which brought the R. F. C. into being. You are, I believe, familiar with the record: October 1929—Black Friday—America facing the horrible reality of economic collapse—finally that grim day in January of 1932. The Congress acted boldly and authorized the establishment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to meet the economic crisis.

The problems of the thirties—closed bank doors, depressed agricultural prices, migratory labor, ceaseless unemployment—Congress called upon Reconstruction Finance Corporation to help meet them one by one. Its authority became manifold—it embraced loans to agriculture, banks, insurance companies, public bodies, drainage, levee and irrigation districts, railroads, business enterprises, and a myriad of similar activities—the familiar story of "billions out and billions back." The flow of credit was turned on and off, first in one field and then in another, as the needs of the country shifted.

This participation by the Corporation in such varied phases of our economy was not at first contemplated. Rather, it stemmed from a recurring recognition by Congress of the Corporation's ability to assist in solving constantly changing economic problems. Thus it has been said that Reconstruction Finance Corporation serves as an economic catalyst—an agent that produces desired economic changes without itself being changed.

Shakespeare has said that "one man in his time plays many parts." So also has it been with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Just now it finds itself absorbed in the biggest job in its history—the job of financing a large share of the defense program. History with its well-known flair for repetition will record with some satisfaction that Reconstruction Finance Corporation began in 1940 to perform the role of the old War Finance Corporation, which the lawyers by prophetic coincidence had used as its prototype.

As always, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is operating in the twilight zone of banking. The private institutions of this country can and will finance the major part of the defense program. They occupy a key position in the broad plan and at no time in history has their sound condition been of greater importance. It is their function to make loans to business to keep it operating at maximum capacity and efficiency. There are certain activities, however, which, although an essential part of the defense program, cannot with any degree of propriety and practicality be handled by private banks. Hence, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, filling its customary role as an emergency financing institution, has stepped into the breach and has begun the task of providing funds for such special purposes. Because these recent activities of our Corporation are of vital importance to the Nation at large I should like to tell you something of their general character.

Within 3 days from the date of the President's approval of the enabling legislation of last June, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation had created two new defense agencies, the Rubber Reserve Co. and the Metals Reserve Co. The purpose of the first is to acquire and carry a reserve stock of crude rubber. The Metals Reserve Co. was formed in order to acquire vital defense minerals and metals and to provide for their safe and practical storage without the disruption of normal marketing conditions. The company is acquiring as rapidly as possible reserve stocks of tin, antimony, chrome, copper, graphite, manganese, zinc, tungsten, and other metals. In order to complete this task, it is necessary for the company to vary its purchasing practice in accordance with the customs of the trade. Defense Supplies Corporation was likewise created by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to acquire and carry reserve supplies of certain strategic and critical materials such as nitrate of soda, diamond dies for use in the wiredrawing industry, and wool.

The urgent need for the expansion of our productive capacity requires a ready reservoir of credit for plant facilities. To meet this demand, Reconstruction Finance Corporation last August created the Defense Plant Corporation. Aside from the War and Navy Departments, which use direct appropriations, this Corporation is the only agency of the Government providing for the financing and construction of production facilities.

In setting up this Corporation a lease arrangement was evolved which has proved to be a most flexible and expeditious method. Quite simply, it provides for the construction of the emergency plant facilities by the contractor, with Defense Plant Corporation assuming the cost, taking title in its own name, and leasing the facilities to the contractor for a fixed period, subject to a provision for renewal and an option to purchase. In the case of manufacturers and suppliers having contracts directly with the Government, the rental is generally nominal, and Defense Plant Corporation receives an agreement for reimbursement by the War or Navy Department. In the case of subcontractors, an actual rental is required to be paid by the lessee based upon a percentage of its sales.

Defense Plant Corporation has already approved total commitments for the financing of emergency plant facilities—including the acquisition of land, buildings, and necessary machinery—aggregating over $600,000,000, and it has agreed to a general aviation program involving about a billion dollars of additional funds.

One of the Coporation's first undertakings was the construction of a plant in Hamilton County, Ohio, in conjunction with the Wright Aeronautical Corporation, comprising approximately 37 acres. It was my privilege to speak on the occasion of their ground-breaking ceremonies last October, and I stated at that time that such activity was a positive symbol of the real ability of business and Government in this great democracy to collaborate efficiently in the interest of the common good. Last week again it was my privilege to attend the dedication ceremonies for the same plant and when I witnessed the first airplane engine coming off that huge assembly line in what is now the largest factory in the world under one roof—all completed within the short space of 7 months—my conviction about business and government was given new strength and vigor.

Emergency plant facilities are of three distinct kinds. First, there are those facilities requisite to the national-defense program which are being built by the Government itself. As explained by Mr. Knudsen, plants having no commercial value after completion of the defense program must be financed by the Government itself and title to such properties must vest in the Government itself, even though the actual operation of the plant may be delegated to private industry under a management-fee contract. This category of facilities embraces munitions plants, loading plants, and heavy shell forging and arms plants of which there is little present private capacity and of which there is certain to be surplus capacity after the emergency is over. The Government will have absolute control of such plants and can elect to retain them for future emergency use.

Second, at the other extreme, there are those facilities which will be made available by private industry as a result of normal expansion in the ordinary course of business, without cost and without risk of any kind to the Government. In general, these facilities consist of manufacturing plants which have a real economic value entirely apart from the defense program.

Third, and midway, are the cases in which the emergency plant facilities, whether built with the aid of public or private capital, will be paid for directly or indirectly by the Government. In general, these facilities consist of plants carrying on operations that will be expanded far beyond any probable normal use—plants filling defense orders which fall somewhere between outright munitions (such as powder for which the Government will build its own plants) and purchases of regular commercial items (such as blankets where needed extra capacity will be added by private contractors).

With respect to facilities of this third classification, it has been felt that the cost of construction should be segregated from the cost of the supplies and that the reimbursement or payment of the cost of the construction should be made directly rather than being covered into the unit price. It is to satisfy the demand for this type of Government financing that R. F. C. has, as I have explained, inaugurated its lease plan through the Defense Plant Corporation. The Government cannot expect private business to assume the entire cost of such facilities. For the present, at least, the Government should own this increased plant capacity. When the emergency has ended the manufacturer will have the option to acquire these plants to avoid undesirable competition. I feel very strongly that this option to purchase is a necessary right of the manufacturer, since the time will come when the disposition of these plants will be at issue. I do not believe that the Government itself should ever operate these manufacturing units in peacetime.

I have attempted in these remarks to give you an interim account of the stewardship which you have entrusted to those of us who are associated with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. In this great national-defense program it is important not only that the activities of the Government be known to all of the people but that they be thoroughly understood as well, for only through such intimate understanding will the country be able to achieve that national unity which is so essential to the success of the preparedness drive. We do not intend that what the Reconstruction Finance Corporation does shall be shrouded in secrecy but, rather, that it shall be exposed to the light of public inspection to the end that all the citizens of this country shall know what their Government is doing for the common defense and the common welfare.

While the Nation is committed to this all-out program of defense and is preparing to make whatever sacrifices such program may require, it is not content to make unnecessary sacrifices. The democracy we are struggling to preserve should be strengthened in the defense process, not weakened. Two important considerations should be of direct concern to your association. The first is price stability. We all know that we cannot achieve our goal of democratic defense with anything less than full efficiency in the use of our economic resources. But full economic efficiency requires price stability. Like a sword of Damocles hanging over our national head is the memory of the skyrocketing prices and high cost of living which spiraled upward as a result of the last war. We cannot allow that disaster to recur in our economy. Someone has said that inflation is like a balky horse: You lash it and lash it and it won't move; then suddenly it bolts and you cannot stop it. Inflation, of course, is exceedingly unpredictable. The United States has at the present time, however, not only the determination to combat it but the machinery as well. Not only is the Government policing prices but business itself, having learned its lesson, is doing some policing, too.

Just as important is the second consideration which is of immediate concern to your association—the protection of the national credit. The people of this country have been educated to a high standard of living—the highest in the history of the world. It is, of course, only proper that every person in the country should be permitted to profit by our technological progress. But it should be remembered that people will not abandon easily that which they have been permitted to enjoy. Hence, there arises the issue of expanded consumer credit. We all know that it is no longer necessary for a man to have the cash in his pocket when he goes out to make a purchase. Consumer credit is now an accepted medium of business. Therefore it is essential that this credit of the individual be safeguarded and protected if we are to preserve the American standard of living.

We have all heard the note of warning. The industrial index is soaring upward, pay checks are growing, and it is anticipated that the national income this year will approach the $85,000,000,000 mark. Knowing that defense production cannot last forever, it requires little imagination to see the economic chaos which lies ahead if we allow this double demand upon our productive capacity to go uncontrolled. We are now reconciled to the fact that this country will eventually be faced with a tremendous national debt due to the terrible urgency of defense expenditures. We need not, however, be reconciled to consumption debt—it can and should be prevented. The considered opinion of your financial leaders is that we cannot in times like the present mortgage our future through uncontrolled installment purchases.

I know that it will require great courage on the part of retail dealers not to extend to their customers terms more liberal than those granted during the depression years. The working people who have been denied a just share in life's advantages during recent years will quite naturally want to acquire some of the fruits of their increasing incomes. They will be dominated by the belief that the days of economic adversity are over, and they will be eager to capitalize their future earnings. Without some brake upon this tendency, the tragedies of 1921 may easily be reenacted. Many persons believe that the "silk shirt" era of the last war will not be repeated—that the public has learned its lesson and will not be so foolish again. Time alone will tell. But the only safe course is to apply that proverbial stitch in time and persuade the people that the high wages of the present may not be of lasting duration and that never has the old philosophy of saving for a rainy day been so pertinent as right now.

The Government's defense-bonds program is a step in this direction. The worker who has a reserve fund in the form of Government bonds has a prop which he may lean on in the future. When the post-war period of readjustment comes he can use his defense savings to meet the needs of his family, and his spending at that time will be of general economic benefit to the country.

What is necessary all along the line, therefore, is self-control. Higher taxes, defense savings, price-stabilization orders—all of these will furnish a measure of protection against the dangers of inflation. But without the voluntary assistance and cooperation of you businessmen who occupy such a strategic position in our national economy no real success is possible. In all of our considerations we must take into account the national good. We can no longer be a nation of small ambitions and of petty selfishness. We must unite in a single ambition to perpetuate our democratic way of living and of the liberties of our priceless heritage.

Do not think that I believe for one moment that this country cannot meet and overcome any force or any combination of forces that may threaten our institutions. Come what may, this Nation will survive. We have the men, the money, the resources, and the courage to withstand any assault and to triumph over any foe. But to do the job, to make ourselves so strong that no one will dare question the determination to preserve our Nation's democracy, we must stand shoulder to shoulder, each ready to do his part. We must submerge those things that do not contribute to the national defense.

Let us admit that in the beginning our defense machine creaked a little from idleness and disuse. Let us admit that in the beginning our machine had difficulty in keeping on the main highway and showed too much of a tendency to turn off on side roads—some employers, for example, continued a rear-guard battle against inevitable economic and social changes; some labor leaders refused to distinguish between just payment for honest toil and tribute exacted in a grave emergency; and some industrialists were too greedy for war profits. But now our defense machine is well oiled. It is moving ahead at an accelerated pace day by day.

Amidst the welter of confusing economic concepts there are many factors which furnish a source of confidence—things which do not receive much comment but which, nevertheless, are weather vanes of successful cooperation. Business management, for example, is working longer and harder hours today with no strikes, no sit-downs, not even weekends to furnish respite from its new double responsibility. Labor, too, is giving a good account of itself despite some newspaper headlines to the contrary. It should be remembered that while a few striking thousands are receiving wide publicity for their obstructive tactics, the working millions are quietly on the job. What is more, the subversive elements motivating the conduct of some misguided labor leaders are now being put into firm check. Finally—and this is the keynote of my remarks to you this afternoon—both business and Government are cooperating efficiently and effectively as never before in the history of our country. The Government is receiving invaluable assistance not only from the mills and the factories participating in the defense program but also from those individual businessmen who are devoting their time and efforts to defense work throughout the land. Many men of skill and experience, executives both big and small, are working harder for the Government now at a dollar a year than they ever have for their own companies at high salaries.

I am sure that as a consequence of this common effort there is today a growing respect, a better understanding, between business and Government. Whatever is good for this country now is vital to this country after the conflict is over. What we all want is a stronger, happier Nation to pass on to our posterity—a Nation which is plentiful and sound—free of sickness, ignorance, and poverty, and abounding in those civil liberties which are so precious to our American tradition. These defense measures of today are therefore merely steps in the forward march to the attainment of that assured future for our country—a country which has grown to leadership amongst the nations of the world, with a leader's privileges and responsibilities—a country whose future is the salvation of the world.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. C. W. (RUNT) BISHOP

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 25, 1941

Mr. BISHOP. Mr. Speaker, it will be my purpose to inform the people of my congressional district of facts in connection with their Government and the Twenty-fifth Congressional District of Illinois.

POPULATION

On June 23 the Bureau of the Census issued a release showing the total urban and rural population by counties. This release disclosed that there were 7,897,241 people in Illinois. Of these, 2,087,591 are listed as rural and 5,809,608 listed as urban. The Twenty-fifth Congressional District breaks down as follows:

County	Total	Urban	Rural
Alexander	25,496	14,407	11,089
Franklin	53,137	26,594	26,543
Jackson	37,920	17,526	20,394
Perry	23,438	10,661	12,777
Pulaski	15,875	None	15,875
Randolph	33,008	8,774	24,834
Union	21,528	4,092	17,436
Williamson	51,424	26,914	24,510

OIL CONSUMPTION

The Bureau of Mines forecast the daily average supply of domestic crude oil needed to meet the market demand in July will be 3,847,100 barrels—17,100 barrels more than the estimated June demand. The Bureau said effects of adjustments required in transportation and consumption caused by withdrawal of 50 tankers from trade routes running from the Gulf to the east coast are "still too indefinite to be accurately measured." It said present information "indicates at least temporary curtailment of the Gulf coast markets" and an increase in the relative production of refinery districts to the north and east.

NURSES WANTED

The Surgeons General of the Army, Navy, and Public Health Service issued a joint statement that the shortage of nurses "beginning to be felt in our towns and cities" threatens "the safety of our civilian population." The statement, signed by Maj. Gen. James C. Magee, Surgeon General, United States Army; Rear Admiral Ross T. McIntire, Surgeon General, United States Navy; and Dr. Thomas Parran, Surgeon General, United States Public Health Service, said:

> Although current requirements are being met, it is essential to prepare immediately for potentially greater demands for nurses. The situation can be met only by a large increase in the number of women entering the Nation's accredited nursing schools.

The statement reported "an important initial step toward the preparation of more qualified nurses is about to be made" using the facilities of Bryn Mawr College and the Woman's Medical College of Pennsylvania, with the support of the American Red Cross.

MEDICAL SUPPLY DEPOT

The War Department announced the Surgeon General's Office has selected St. Louis, Mo., as the location for the main Army medical supply depot; and the Army has purchased the Mart Building in St. Louis at a price of $2,300,000 for it. The largest supply depot was previously in the Bush Terminal Building, Brooklyn, N. Y., the Department said.

WHEAT CROP IN UNITED STATES

The Department of Agriculture reported prospective winter wheat output in the nine principal producing States decreased from an estimated 488,770,000 bushels on June 1 to 476,310,000 bushels on June 16. The Crop Reporting Board's first midmonth estimate of wheat production indicated that crop prospects declined in most Western and Midwestern States, the Department said.

WORLD WHEAT STOCKS

The Department of Agriculture said world wheat stocks would reach a record high on July 1 in spite of reduced crops in Australia, Europe, and north Africa. With a world crop expected to be about the same as last year, supplies for the entire 1941–42 period will be of record size, the Department said. The carry-over of old wheat will be equivalent to 60 percent of a year's domestic needs, and with the new crop prospects world stocks will be increased an estimated 200,000,000 bushels, amounting to almost a full year's domestic supply, the Department reported.

MAIL TO SOLDIERS

The War Department announced that mail to Army personnel should carry the grade and full name of the person addressed, and that the Army serial number, if known, should follow the name. The letter or number designation of the company of which the soldier is a member, the identification of the regiment or separate battalion, and the Army post-office number and its location should be included in the address, the Department said. Letters and packages now delayed due to improper addressing may be further retarded as the men leave their permanent stations to participate in the summer war games, the Department said.

MATERIAL SHORTAGE

Some airplane factories and machine shops have restricted hiring schedules because of shortages of materials, Social Security Board reported, while the severity of shortages of competent machine-shop, aircraft, shipbuilding, and general metal workers has continued. The demand for construction workers has improved in almost every region, the Board said, following a general decline in February while building activity was shifting from military to industrial and residential building. An ample supply of construction workers is available, the announcement said.

HOW WELL ARE WE PREPARED?

The United States News both asks and answers this question in their June 27 issue. When they asked:

Is United States ready if Hitler shoots again? Answer is: In part.

As for the Navy: It is ready. Both the Atlantic and Pacific Fleets are geared to instant action. Both are at a high level of training and experience. Navy's air force is strong and increasingly well equipped.

As for the Army: It isn't ready. It is just taking form and is lacking in equipment and in experience. But nobody sees any early use for a land army; everyone looks on the new Army as an investment in the longer-range future.

As for the Army Air Corps: It isn't ready, owing to equipment shortage: But the Air Corps now is beginning to come along fast; is to be ready in near future.

As for industry: It is gearing itself slowly to war production; is starting to break peace-time habits; is beginning to grind out military equipment. Aircraft industry is doing an impressive job. But over-all, American industry will not be turning out war equipment in volume before October.

GEN. JOHN A. LOGAN

House Joint Resolution 200 provides for the purchase by the Congress of a bust of the late Senator from Illinois, Gen. John A. Logan. If passed, the bust will be placed in the Capitol along with that of Lincoln and Grant.

Statement Before Committee on Reciprocity Information

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN THOMAS

OF IDAHO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 27 (legislative day of Thursday, June 26), 1941

STATEMENT BY HON. JOHN THOMAS OF IDAHO

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement which I made before the Committee on Reciprocity Information, protesting the lowering of the tariff on farm products and minerals.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The matter which I want to discuss today is the question of resumption of trade-agreement negotiations with Argentina.

It is to be recalled that in the late summer of 1939 our State Department announced that it would undertake the negotiation of a trade agreement with the Government of Argentina. The list of commodities posted for possible duty concessions at that time was substantially the same as is proposed in the pending negotiations. It included, among other items, casein, fats and oils, beef and veal, cheese, hides and skins. Hearings were held before this committee and vigorous opposition was recorded by many organized farmer-producer groups to the reduction of duties on these admitted competitive agricultural products. Then quite abruptly the negotiations were called off. The fact that so much opposition was registered to the proposed agreement coupled with the fact that the authority of the President and Secretary of State under the Trade Agreements Act was to expire by limitations the following June 1940 contributed, without doubt to the decisions to terminate negotiations. The word "terminate" I use advisedly. It is the identical term employed in a joint statement issued by the Argentine Government and our own at the time, the first paragraph of which reads as follows:

"In the reciprocal trade negotiations between the Governments of the United States and Argentina, notwithstanding the efforts of both parties, it has not been found possible to reach a satisfactory basis to permit the conclusion of an agreement, and the two Governments have agreed to terminate them."

It is unnecessary for me to go into details about the debate in the Senate over the renewal of the reciprocal trade agreement program, but in March 1940 I pointed out the undeniable fact that if the authority to make trade agreements is extended another 3 years a most serious blow will be dealt to agriculture. I had in mind this very resumption of negotiations with Argentina and other South American countries, notwithstanding the announced termination of such negotiations in January 1940, 2 months previous.

Now as then, the State Department demonstrates its willingness to reduce tariffs on a large number of commodities for which the American farmer already needs a larger market. This is how the President, the State Department, and for that matter, the Congress, barters away the previous protection accorded by law to that important one-fourth of our population, the American farmer and his family.

Inasmuch as negotiations have been reopened with Argentina, what I had to say in March 1940 additionally regarding our trade relations with this South American country forcibly illustrates this triparty breaking of faith with American agriculture. It illustrates, too, the logrolling tactics of the administrative branch of the Government to assure the perpetuation of the trade-agreement program. I quote again from my remarks to the Senate body:

"At present negotiations with Argentina have been stopped; but I do not believe there is a particle of doubt in anyone's mind as to why they were stopped. It was not because the State Department suddenly discovered that we have a corn surplus or that the cattle industry is already being injured by imports of canned beef. It does not take lengthy hearings to develop these facts.

"Moreover, the agreements that have been made previously, over the strongest protests farmers and producers were capable of making, indicate that perhaps the Department is not particularly concerned by the extent to which American markets are injured by trade agreements. The negotiations were called off because the State Department is asking the Congress this year to renew its authority to write tariff laws. Officials of the State Department have condemned Congress for logrolling. Apparently their desire is to roll their own logs; and they are now doing it on a grander scale than Congress ever attempted.

"More important than the reason for calling off negotiations on the treaty with Argentina, as far as the people I represent are concerned, is the fact that there is no assurance that the negotiations will not be reopened after the law has been reenacted. When Secretary Hull was asked in the course of the House hearings, 'Is it your idea that conditions may so change that negotiations may be resumed a little later?' he replied, 'This general statement said that these negotiations were terminated.'

"The statement referred to is a joint statement by the Governments of the United States and Argentina, released by the State Department. It is not at all reassuring when we compare it with the statement of the President of Argentina, who is reported by an Associated Press dispatch to have said that he feels that President Roosevelt would favor a resumption of the negotiations in the near future, and he is quoted as saying, 'For my part, I fully desire it.'

"In the light of what tariff reductions have already cost the people of the West, I feel safe in saying that our people do not share the attitude of the President of Argentina. The Argentine proposal was a threat to their prosperity, which only the expiration of the Trade Agreements Act can remove."

We are now removed more than a year from the time I made these remarks. The Congress did extend the Trade Agreements Act. The administration has resumed negotiations with Argentina. It did not take the vision of a prophet to see what was in the offing with this bit of logrolling on the part of the State Department.

What are the changed conditions which cause negotiations to be resumed? 'True, there is a war. There was a war in January, March, and June 1940. Hemispheric solidarity was the sugar-coated tablet then; it is today, more so since the European conflagration reaches nearer our shores. But what are the facts? Should hemispheric solidarity be achieved at the practically sole expense of the American farmer? That is what the proposed agreements with Argentina and Uruguay accomplish in purpose. When one goes down the list of products on which possible concessions will be made we find that nearly all are products of the farm.

Facts relating to production figures, available supplies, etc., undoubtedly will be presented by interested producers or their representatives. I will not take the time of the committee to present them in advance, but do wish to present an over-all concise picture of what the farmer is up against in this program which militates against his very existence.

I would like to comment briefly on just a few items upon which you are preparing to consider concessions. For example, in the line of dairy products you propose to make concessions on casein and Italian type cheese. Both of these products are produced in this country, and any reduction in the tariff rate will be reflected immediately in lower returns to farmers producing the raw materials for these products. Last year our dairymen produced about 50,000,000 pounds of casein, which, at current prices, is worth well over $5,000,000 to the farmer. This casein is produced in more than 300 factories located in 22 of our States. The existing tariff wall on casein is not excessive, because last year we imported about 25,000,000 pounds over the tariff wall. Domestic producers of casein are already giving one-third of our domestic market to foreign countries, notably Argentina, and any reduction in the tariff rate will result in their giving all of it away.

On cheese the story is much the same. Last year we produced 26,000,000 pounds of Italian type cheese as compared with our normal imports of around 20,000,000 pounds of this kind of cheese. In 1938, 1 year before the war, we imported 57 percent of our domestic consumption of Italian type cheese. Even in the war year of 1940 we imported over one-third of our needs. This does not indicate that our present tariff is too high. Argentina is currently shipping us 1,500,000 pounds of cheese per month, which, on an annual basis, is more than six times as much cheese as Argentina exported to all countries 4 years ago. The milk which goes into the production of our own Italian type cheese is worth around $4,000,000 annually to our farmers. A reduction in the tariff rate will make it virtually impossible to maintain our domestic production of this type of cheese.

In the contemplated agreements duty concessions are proposed on cattle hides, despite the fact that hides are the most important byproduct of our important cattle industry. In 1940 Argentina exported to us over the existing tariff about $10,000,000 worth of cattle hides. Our tariff on hides of only 10 percent ad valorem is, if anything, too low already in light of the heavy importations. Since 1933 our imports of cattle hides have increased about 60 percent.

It is proposed to lower the duty on various meat products, notwithstanding the fact that our own meat industry is the very backbone of our agricultural system. In 1940 we imported about $5,000,000 worth of meat products from Argentina, and I understand it is proposed that we grant concessions on a substantial proportion of these imports. On the other side of the picture it is of interest to note that our exports of meat products to Argentina are virtually nonexistent.

It is further proposed that concessions be granted on certain types and kind of wool, despite the fact that our imports of wool have been increasing, and that we are large producers of this commodity. In 1940, the American farmer received $110,000,000 for the sale of wool. Despite our tariff wall, Argentina is already sending us large quantities of wool. Our imports of competitive wools have been increasing year by year and at an alarming rate. In 1940 our imports of wools of the type produced in this country were higher than in any of the past 16 years of record, and were twice as great as last year.

This alarming increase may be attributed in part, at least, to concessions made in other trade agreements. As I have publicly pointed out, the proposed concessions on wool come at a time when the tariff rates on shoddy and wool rags which supplant virgin wool in the American market has been sharply reduced in the British trade agreement with a resultant tremendous increase in importations.

I have been advised that several briefs have been filed stressing the importance of an adequate tariff for tungsten, and, from the information I have, any material reduction on tungsten would work a very serious hardship upon the producers.

Recently new discoveries have been made in several of the western States including Utah and Idaho, where real prospective mines are being developed, and the production of tungsten could be materially increased if the industry is let alone. However, if it is confronted with a material reduction in the tariff, it would simply mean that these mines could not be developed which would slow down production and prevent the Nation from becoming self-sufficient in this important strategic metal.

I will not encumber the record further with the statement of the situation as it has been carefully covered by others.

In concluding my remarks, may I say that this whole program of trade agreements, past and prospective, forces the American farmer and workingman to compete with people of other lands who work for small wages and live under conditions which we in America cannot tolerate. In the light of our past commerce with Argentina and Uruguay it is inevitable that the American farmer will bear the brunt of any trade agreements we make with these countries. The record is clear. Practically everything we import from these countries are competitive agricultural products, while on the other hand practically everything we ship to them are industrial products. Under these circumstances, I would like to know how we can negotiate the proposed agreements with these countries without forcing the farmer to shoulder the entire burden. It is, of course, highly desirable for us to promote hemispheric solidarity. Such a program is legitimately in the interest of our own national defense. But, I raise the question: Is it the American way to ask one segment of our population, namely, farmers, to pay the bill for this good-will program which is intended to benefit the Nation as a whole?

Russian Entrance into European War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STYLES BRIDGES

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 27 (legislative day of Thursday, June 26), 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE MANCHESTER (N. H.) UNION LEADER

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Manchester, N. H., Union Leader entitled "Still Intolerable," pertaining to the entrance of Soviet Russia into the war.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Manchester (N. H.) Union Leader]

STILL INTOLERABLE

In giving its pledge of all possible aid to Soviet Russia in its defense against Nazi Germany, the United States Government has taken pains to emphasize that such a step does not alter in any way its opposition to communism.

In his statement on the issue Acting Secretary of State Welles used the following words:

"To the people of the United States, this and other principles and doctrines of communistic dictatorship are as intolerable and alien to their own beliefs as are the principles and doctrines of Nazi dictatorship. Neither kind of imposed overlordship can have, or will have, any support or any sway in the mode of life or in the system of government of the American people."

This statement should be kept clearly in mind by every American. The crude materialism of Communist thinking, its negation of religion, and the insincerity, the cruelty, and the international meddling of Stalin's dictatorship become no less obnoxious because Soviet Russia has suddenly joined the defense against Hitlerism.

But, as Acting Secretary Welles has said, we must be realistic. The immediate issue before the American people is whether Hitler's plan for universal conquest, for the cruel and brutal enslavement of all peoples, shall be halted and defeated. If our aid to Soviet Russia, now fighting against Hitler, will help to accomplish his eventual defeat, then that aid is well placed for that purpose, and that alone.

One needs only contemplate a few other possibilities to see that the entrance of Soviet Russia in the war against Hitler is a great gain. Suppose, for instance, that instead of being forced into the war against Hitler, Soviet Russia had joined the Rome-Berlin-Tokyo Axis. This would have weighted the scales in Hitler's favor so greatly as to multiply many times the difficulty of his defeat. Or suppose that Soviet Russia had remained on the sidelines, until Hitler was defeated. What would the problem have been then? Many people have contemplated this possibility which would have required that after Hitlerism was crushed, the menace of Russian communism would have had to be disposed of.

But neither of these possibilities occurred. Instead Hitler chose to make an enemy of Soviet Russia and throw her into the camp of his opponents. This means one of two things: Either Soviet Russia will eventually be defeated and Hitler's power enhanced by control of Russia's vast resources, or Soviet Russia, through outside support, will be able to stay in the war and aid in the destruction of Hitlerism.

The latter alternative certainly is most desirable from the American standpoint, and upon that basis American aid is proffered, although the Soviet ideology is highly obnoxious. In rendering such aid the United States Government should require that the Soviet Government cease meddling in other nations' affairs and give some evidence of a willingness to cooperate in achieving the ends of freedom.

Russian-British Alliance Provides New Reason for America to Stay Out of the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS D. THILL

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 27, 1941

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, the unexpected comradeship which has made communistic Russia an active, shooting ally of Britain in the war is causing a great many former interventionists in America to reexamine their thinking and to bring them to realize the folly of trying to control the destiny of Europe, Asia, and Africa from a distance of three to seven thousand miles. More and more it is becoming clear to true Americans that the best way to protect our way of life in our sphere of influence is to mind our own business, mend our own defenses, and manage our own affairs so well that the seeds of discontent from which foreign "isms" are developed will be destroyed here at home.

Illustrative of the return to sanity which is being registered in America even in sections formerly so badly confused and frightened that they had lost a true sense of perspective is seen by the following quotations from recent editorial comment.

EVEN NEW YORK TIMES OPPOSES SLOGAN OF "HELP RUSSIA"

Mr. Speaker, let me first cite you the first two paragraphs of the lead editorial in the New York Times on the subject of aid to Russia which President Roosevelt and Sumner Welles so hastily tried to propose as an acceptable national policy for America.

[From the New York Times of June 26, 1941]

AMERICA, BRITAIN, AND RUSSIA

It will make for greater clarity in the thinking of the American people and for greater speed in the action of their Government if from the very start of this new discussion of our policy toward the German-Russian war, we drop the false and misleading slogan of "Help Russia" and concentrate our attention on the real aim: "Stop Hitler!"

Certainly, the only people in this country who want to "help Russia," in the sense of helping Stalin, are the handful of our domestic Communists, who time and again have shown their hatred of every American principle, their unfailing intellectual dishonesty in the face of Stalin's twists and turns, and their willingness to sabotage our own defense program in any way they can.

In this morning's Washington Post—an early advocate of all-out intervention—Mark Sullivan strikes out savagely against the President's proposal to give all-out aid to the communistic armies and calls upon the President, the Congress, and the country to reject such an un-American proposal.

Let me submit one more exhibit from a wide variety of examples which can be found in the eastern press denouncing any proposal to give aid to Russia which might in turn be used against America's European friend—honest, faithful, courageous little Finland. I quote from an editorial in the Washington Times-Herald of June 25.

The prospect of a Hitler victory over Russia is dreary enough. But how much brighter for us is the possibility of a Stalin victory? * * * The thing for the United States to do, we believe, is to go no deeper into this war than at present, to steer clear of entangling alliances with the Soviet and with everybody else, to keep its powder dry, and collect a lot more of it, by expanding its Navy as rapidly as it can and building a large army of plentifully equipped and highly trained mechanic-sergeants at top speed. * * * If we stick our fingers into this war we're likely to get a hand chewed off, no matter who wins.

SIOUX FALLS (S. DAK.) ARGUS LEADER REFLECTS MIDWESTERN VIEWPOINT AGAINST ENTRANCE INTO WAR

Mr. Speaker, the following editorial from the leading newspaper of South Dakota, which is frequently read by many of you in the congressional cloak rooms, pretty well typifies midwestern sentiment as expressed editorially throughout the country. Now—more than ever—it is important that this country stay out of the foreign war.

[From Sioux Falls (S. Dak.) Argus-Leader]

AN EPOCHAL SWITCH IN THE TIDE OF WAR

Germany's declaration of war against Russia is not just another incident. It is a major event—in truth, an epochal development in the course of the conflict.

The world was stunned in last August 1939 when Berlin and Moscow announced the signing of a friendly treaty. It was a circumstance that was as ominous as it was surprising. It meant that Germany was to enter this war on a basis radically different from that which existed at the beginning of the World War. Then Russia was her enemy and her difficulties in the war were accentuated by her position.

So it was with considerable satisfaction that Hitler drew attention to the Russian treaty at the opening of this war. Germany this time, he said, would not be required to fight a war on two fronts.

But that is now history. Germany is again fighting on two fronts—a huge, sprawling enemy at the rear and a vigilant, alert, and efficient one in the front.

The rupture between Germany and Russia was a natural consequence of an abnormal alliance. In Mein Kampf Hitler attacked no one with more bitter feeling than he did Russia. He expressed contempt not only for the Russian form of government but for her people. He derided the Russian leaders and flayed their characters. The Russians shared his hatred.

The alliance, therefore, was formed in an atmosphere of mistrust. Both Stalin and Hitler felt perhaps that each was serving his own interests to advantage. But Stalin did not appreciate then the great strength of the German military machine. He did not realize that he was more likely to become a victim than a coconqueror.

Russia, it appears, has some things which Hitler must have. When Russia refused to assume a puppet role like Italy, Hitler was compelled to act. He needs the food of the Ukraine, for example. He wants to be in a position where he need not worry about a molestation in the rear.

It is true that Russia is not strong in a military sense. If Hitler had no other problems on his hands, he might find it quite simple to subjugate her. But he is fighting England and he has the constant job of keeping the already conquered nations under his heel. In consequence, he cannot devote his full attention to Russia.

And Russia, because she is so large, cannot be overwhelmed in a blitzkreig as Norway or Holland was. Hitler may capture a few miles of Russia, but a generally successful campaign involves extended operations over a long front.

Americans are naturally deeply interested in this late development in the holocaust in Europe. It will have a bearing on our attitude toward the war.

Steps will be taken, no doubt, to list Russia among the nations entitled to receive aid under the lend-lease bill. This measure was intended supposedly to assist the democracies but that was more or less camouflage. Its primary purpose was to assist in the defeat of Hitler.

This incident should serve to emphasize the war more in its exact basis. Despite what many persons say, it is not an ideological war.

It is fundamentally a power war, with many queer alinements in prospect. We now have little Finland, bloody but unbowed, fighting with Germany against Russia.

Just a short while ago Germany assisted Russia in conquering her. But Finland is not to be criticized. She has been tossed about by circumstances wholly beyond her control. Insofar as she is concerned, Russia was the major aggressor. In now fighting Russia, nevertheless, she is using resources obtained in past through American assistance.

The position of Finland deserves more than passing attention. It is something to consider in the extension of aid to Russia. Before we go too far in shipping our supplies to other countries we should make sure that our home defenses are adequate. Russia is now against Germany, to be sure, but she might be with her again.

The whole incident also emphasizes the extreme desirability of the maintenance of a nonbelligerent role on the part of the United States. Let us watch our step. Let us consider America first.

The world is shaking on its foundations today. The present catastrophe may engulf all of civilization. If we can keep out of it, we can maintain here a citadel and a cathedral of progressive humanity.

If we become involved, all of this may be lost, and the world will descend into a dark age whose end the present generation is not likely to see.

But if we remain solid, we can serve as a central nation around which the world can be rebuilt and order can be restored.

The necessity for our involvement—since Sunday's development—is less and the outlook is much brighter.

The Seaway and National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER C. PLOESER

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 27, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE ST. LOUIS DAILY GLOBE-DEMOCRAT OF JUNE 19, 1941

Mr. PLOESER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the St. Louis Daily Globe-Democrat, June 19, 1941:

[From the St. Louis Globe-Democrat of June 19, 1941]

THE SEAWAY AND NATIONAL DEFENSE

Under the guise of the present national emergency the administration has launched a new offensive to push through Congress the $285,000,000 St. Lawrence seaway and power project. Secretary of War Stimson, who as Secretary of State in 1932 signed a waterways treaty with Canada which the Senate rejected in 1934, and Assistant Secretary of State Berle were the first witnesses for the project when the House Rivers and Harbors Committee opened its hearings on the proposed agreement this week. Both insisted it is a national-defense undertaking.

Cross-examined by members of the committee, both men countered with the grim prediction that this war will be an exceedingly long one. Berle even drew a comparison with the Napoleonic wars.

A decisive reason for rejecting the seaway and power project is that it stands in the way of our immediate defense efforts. Money and engineering skill which are urgently needed for our defense program should not be diverted for a power and waterway scheme which cannot possibly be completed in less than 4 years and probably would take 7 years. While the administration witnesses stressed the necessity for power for defense projects, Mr. Stimson admitted that the O. P. M. has estimated the peak of arms construction will be passed in 1942—long before the seaway could be completed.

As expert economists have pointed out, if additional transportation and power facilities are needed, there are other and cheaper ways of obtaining them.

Even if Mr. Stimson's pessimistic prophecies are borne out, the facts do not support the seaway as a practical defense measure. It was considered carefully by the Senate 7 years ago, and there is nothing in the present emergency to reverse the Senate's rejection of the treaty.

Flood Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. W. F. NORRELL

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 20, 1941

Mr. NORRELL. Mr. Speaker, I believe this bill to be the most equitable flood-control legislation that has been presented to the House since the great flood of 1927. The bill is not perfect, it is not all that some of us had worked for, but it is much better than previous flood-control bills. We believe it should be unanimously passed by the House.

On April 21, 1927, a portion of the district of which I have the honor to represent, suffered the most tremendous and devastating flood recorded in history. The flood of that year in the alluvial valley of the Mississippi River took a toll of something like 200 lives, rendered approximately 700,000 people homeless for approximately 1 month, and inflicted property damage estimated to be upward of $200,000,000. Since 1927, we have been wanting flood control within the levee walls of the Mississippi River, but nothing has been done by Congress during all of these years to accomplish this desire on the part of our splendid citizens. It is commonly known that flood control in this section of the Mississippi River is the greatest problem of its kind in all the world. General Tyler, before our Flood Control Committee hearings this year, testified in part as follows:

It is well known that flood control in the alluvial valley of the lower Mississippi River is the greatest problem of its kind in all the world. For over 50 years, or perhaps 100 years, progress on that plan has been continuous until the protection now afforded is good—better than anybody 25 years ago thought it would be.

After the devastating flood of 1927 the only request our citizens made of the United States was that our National Government give us a fair assurance that the calamity of 1927 would not again occur.

On May 15, 1928, the Congress of the United States recognized and accepted national responsibility for flood control on the main stem or channel of the Mississippi River throughout its alluvial valley, and adopted the Jadwin plan, as set forth in House Document No. 90, Seventieth Congress. The Jadwin plan, among other things, provided for diversions from the main channel of destructive floodwaters in excess of the carrying capacity of the then existing levees, the most important of which diversion was the Boeuf floodway in the critical middle section of the river lying immediately south of the mouth of the Arkansas River and flowing through southeastern Arkansas into Louisiana designated to carry approximately 100,000,000 cubic foot-seconds of water, 6 times the volume of water flowing normally over the Niagara Falls.

The property owners of that area upon the passage of the act assumed that it was necessary for the floodway to be constructed in order to give the maximum levee benefits possible to the greatest area affected by the floods, and while they did not desire to sell their property and very greatly hoped for adequate flood control, they felt that under the guaranty contained in the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States that "private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation," they were entitled to equal levee protection or just compensation for their property. They were willing for the authorities to determine which should be done: (1) Levee protection; (2) compensation for property, caused by the floodway. I think it can be said that the property owners accepted the decision at that time of Congress, that the sacrifice of their property in the Boeuf floodway was necessary in order to protect the remainder of the alluvial valley of the Mississippi River, and, of course, assumed that they would receive fair and reasonable compensation for their property.

To this end a test suit to collect reasonable compensation for their property was prosecuted through the Supreme Court of the United States under the style of Mrs. Julia Caroline Sponenbarger against United States, and the Court's decision was to the effect that they were not entitled to compensation. Hence, if they are not entitled to compensation, they now take the position that they are entitled to equal levee protection with their neighbors to the north, south, and east of the Mississippi River, such levee protection now being possible according to the testimony and reports of our Army engineers.

In the report of the Army engineers, contained in Document No. 90, several suggestions for the control of the floodwaters of the Mississippi River were made. They have been very efficient in their work and have secured the maximum benefits from several of the methods suggested in House Document No. 90, to reduce the flood hazards of the Mississippi River. Some of the methods are as follows:

First. Dredging the river annually.
Second. Side channels.
Third. Set-back levees.
Fourth. Straightening river channel.
Fifth. Clearing between levees.
Sixth. Forestry work, and,
Seventh. A multiplicity of other minor suggestions.

On page 18 of the Commission's report, further to illustrate how successful the efforts of our Army engineers have been in the operation of several methods of flood control, as above mentioned, we find that the Mississippi River has been shortened between the mouth of the White River and the lower end of the Glasscock cut-off approximately 137 miles. This was done by straightening the river channel. It is well established that the Army engineers have very greatly increased the flood-carrying capacity of the Mississippi River through the other methods mentioned above, and, as a consequence, have very greatly reduced the height of crest flow lines of all floods confined between front line levees.

General Tyler further testified before our Flood Control Committee, as follows:

In 1928, when the existing project was laid down to include a west-side overland floodway in the middle section, the capacity of the main river leveed channel was estimated at about 1,950,000 cubic feet per second, and the capacity of the floodway at about 1,250,000 cubic feet per second. The capacity of the main river leveed channel at Arkansas City is now about 2,600,000 cubic feet per second. Had these conditions existed in 1928 serious consideration quite probably would have been given to confining the project flood between the main levees, for to do so would not have involved such substantial increases in levee heights as were then estimated.

The report of the Mississippi River Commission contained among other things the following statement:

Had the flood conditions of today existed in 1928, consideration also would quite probably have been given then to a west-side floodway of less capacity than the one recommended and adopted.

These accomplishments were recognized in 1936 when Document No. 1, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session, was filed with the Congress covering the flood control of the alluvial valley of the Mississippi River. This report was dated February 12, 1935, and the abandonment of the Boeuf floodway was recommended by the Chief of Engineers and a modified floodway provided, referred to then as the Eudora floodway. The Eudora floodway was a miniature floodway of the original Boeuf floodway. At that time, owing to the improvements which had been made by the Army engineers regarding the control of floodwaters of the lower mississippi River, it was considered advisable to have a small modified floodway, and that the modified floodway, in view of these improvements, would be ample in every respect to control any flood which could even be visioned in the future by the Army engineers.

Our engineers have continued their very fine work on flood control in this and other sections of the Mississippi River, and now on page 30 of the Report of the Mississippi River Commission, before our committee, we find the following language:

Under existing conditions of the main river channel there are three physically feasible alternatives to the adopted plan which will afford protection equal to that contemplated by the existing project when it was adopted, and a fourth which will give protection equal to that afforded by levee and flood-wall projects on other rivers.

According to this, there are now five feasible plans presented to the Congress, and which the Flood Control Committee considered. The engineers outlined those plans and said that either at this time would give adequate flood control, but that the plan to be selected is one of policy for the Congress of the United States, and not one involving a question of engineering. The Report of the Mississippi River Commission sets out in full the five plans presented to the Flood Control Committee.

Prior to the presentation of the report of the Mississippi River Commission, as a member of the Flood Control Committee, I introduced H. R. 3064 in the House of Representatives, and Senator OVERTON, of Louisiana, introduced S. 705 in the Senate. My bill was and is as follows:

A bill to amend the project for flood control of the lower Mississippi River adopted by the act of May 15, 1928, as amended by the acts of June 15, 1936, August 28, 1937, and June 28, 1938

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of May 15, 1928, as amended by the acts of June 15, 1936, August 28, 1937, and June 28, 1938, is hereby amended so as to provide that the project for flood control in the alluvial valley of the lower Mississippi River existing at the present time in accordance with the provisions of said act, is hereby modified and as thus modified is hereby adopted, as follows:

Pending the completion of the ultimate plan for flood control in the alluvial valley of the lower Mississippi River, the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army is authorized to make revisions in the grades and sections of the main line Mississippi levees on both the east and west banks and to adjust and equalize the unequal freeboards which now exist, or may hereafter develop. Between the latitude of the Arkansas River and a point at, or south of, Deer Park, La., revision, adjustment, and equalization shall be made so as to obtain net grades of existing front-line levees generally of such height above the computed crest flow line of the project flood as the Chief of Engineers may deem advisable as affording reasonably safe protection against such project flood.

The Boeuf floodway, in the project adopted by the act of May 15, 1928, and the Eudora floodway, as well as the back protection levee extending from the head of the said Eudora floodway north to the Arkansas River in the project, adopted by the act of June 15, 1936, as amended, are hereby abandoned.

The levee on the south side of the Arkansas River shall be enlarged in grade and section so as to afford, in the opinion of the Chief of Engineers, reasonably safe protection against the project flood of the Mississippi River.

From time to time additional protection against floods shall be given simultaneously to, and equitably distributed between, the Yazoo River backwater area and the Red River backwater area under such plans as may be approved by the Chief of Engineers.

The total authorizations heretofore for the flood-control project of the alluvial valley of the Mississippi River shall not be increased by reason of any provision in this act, but any appropriations heretofore or hereafter made or authorized for said project may be expended upon any feature of the said project, notwithstanding any restrictions, limitations, or requirements of existing law.

The bill carries out plan No. 4 of the Mississippi River Commission.

Before the Flood Control Committee this year I exerted every possible effort to secure the approval of the Overton-Norrell bills. Each of these bills, as above stated, provide for the abolition of the floodways, construction of the levees on the Arkansas side to the 1940 grade and section, equal in height and strength to the levees on the opposite side of the river, giving fair and equal protection to both sides of the river.

The Mississippi River Commission reported that this could be done. General Tyler and his corps of assistants testified before the Flood Control Committee that such plan could be done. Engineers and a number of lay witnesses gave the same testimony. Testimony also before the Flood Control Committee was that under the law now Mississippi levees are from 3 to 6 feet higher than the levees on the Arkansas side in various places, and that under the law they have the flood protection of the floodways and fuseplug area on the Arkansas side, and that the citizens of Mississippi very vigorously oppose the abolition of these existing differences between the east and west sides of the river.

After much testimony and extensive arguments the Flood Control Committee finally recommended the adoption of Plan No. 4, which was the provision of the Overton-Norrell bills, with one modification, to wit: That the levees in the Yazoo Basin on the east bank of the Mississippi River, south of Coahoma-Bolivar County line in said plan, shall have a 2-foot freeboard over the west side of the river in this area.

The Flood Control Committee rewrote my bill, and I quote in part from the bill now under consideration, H. R. 4911, which is the omnibus bill of 1941, from line 6 of page 10 to line 6 on page 11, having to do with this section of the Mississippi River, as follows:

The project for flood control of the lower Mississippi River adopted by the act of May 15, 1928, as amended by the act of June 15, 1936, as amended by the acts of August 28, 1937, and June 28, 1938, is hereby modified and, as modified, is hereby authorized and adopted, and the Flood Control Act of June 15, 1936, as amended, is amended as follows:

(a) The existing engineering plan for flood control in the alluvial valley of the Mississippi River is hereby modified so as to provide for the construction of plan 4 as set forth in the report of the Mississippi River Commission, dated March 7, 1941, to the Chief of Engineers, except that the levees in the Yazoo Basin on the east bank of the Mississippi River south of the Coahoma-Bolivar County line in said plan shall have a 3-foot freeboard over the project flood, and all levees shall be constructed with adequate section and foundation to conform to increased levee heights. The Boeuf floodway in the project adopted by the act of May 15, 1928, and the Eudora floodway, as well as the northward extension and the back-protection levee extending from the head of the said Eudora floodway north to the Arkansas River in the project adopted by the act of June 15, 1936, as amended, are hereby abandoned, and the provisions of said acts relating to the prosecution of work on said floodways and extensions are hereby repealed.

The actions of the Flood Control Committee in reporting this change in the law with reference to the Mississippi River is adequately supported by our Army engineers. I quote their testimony in part as follows:

Whatever may be the ultimate plan for the middle section, it is apparent that advantage should be taken of the opportunity to attain increased protection at small cost by bringing up to some common and higher grade the lesser levee freeboards that now intervene between reaches of maximum stage lowering. Not to do so is to fail to obtain the maximum possible return on a portion of the present investment, for the maximum possible return on a portion of the present investment for the maximum freeboard is the controlling freeboard and makes the contiguous higher freeboard of little avail.

Complete confinement of the project flood to the leveed channel of the main river throughout the middle section appears now to be physically practicable.

The Euroda and Boeuf floodways, insofar as they represent definite projects and locations, could be abandoned.

General Tyler has testified that No. 4 would give greater flood-protection benefit to a wider territory than any of the other suggested plans. General Tyler and the other engineers, however, take the position that since they have advised Congress with reference to the engineering and financial feasibility of these several plans, and that either is now physically possible from an engineering standpoint, the plan actually to be inaugurated is a question for Congress to determine, as it is purely a matter of policy, and not an engineering question.

For approximately 14 years the citizens of the Boeuf and Eudora floodways have been subjected to the constant and continuous menace of the floodways, fuseplug area, and differentials in existing levees from 3 to 6 feet in the floodway area. They have lived for approximately 14 years under the shadow of the fuseplug levee that might at any unexpected time be used by the Government in diverting the destructive waters of the Mississippi River and consequently again, and in a most terrifying form, flood their lands as was done in 1927 when approximately 200 people lost their lives, 700,000 others were made homeless for approximately a month, and something like $200,000,000 worth of property was destroyed. If the floodway is not necessary they do not wish to live under the shadow of the act of Congress providing for the floodway. Their property has been constantly damaged by virtue of the provision of our statutes, insurance rates have been increased, loans cannot be secured, and normal development cannot be expected by that section of the alluvial valley of the Mississippi until the floodway is abolished, and they are given equal levee protection.

The adoption of the Overton-Norrell bill, even as amended herein by the committee, and placing in operation plan No. 4, as modified, will have the effect of restoring an empire on the west side of the river in Arkansas, and Louisiana, to its rightful position. It will remove the constant fear that has been upon them for 14 years, and the hazards and uncertainty under which they have lived, give the west side security, increase values, and permit a healthy, normal development.

They are desirous that these mandatory provisions be enacted by the Congress to divert the presently existing fuzeplug levee in southeast Arkansas into a standard levee of 1940 grade and section, giving to all the property owners in the presently existing Boeuf and/or Eudora floodways adequate protection.

I have also been intensely interested in adequate levees on the south bank of the Arkansas River from Little Rock to Pine Bluff, Ark., for the protection of one of our best agricultural areas and for the protection of other important enterprises.

Fortunately, we have succeeded in obtaining a favorable report and recommendations from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army. After the Army Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors had completed a thorough study of the matter over a period of several years, I and others who have been earnestly interested in flood control in this area were pleased to have this highly important recommendation.

Need for these levees is emphasized by the lengthy history of disastrous floods in the locality from Little Rock to Pine Bluff. The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors found that "during the 66½-year period of record, flood stage has been equaled or exceeded 46 times in Little Rock." These floods occurred in an area where the property value has been set by Army engineers at $2,375,310 and the farm income is estimated to be $1,180,079 annually when not interfered with or damaged by floods. The vast extent of damages is not known. Estimates, however, that have been made reveal the desperate need for action by this Congress. Other than the destruction of crops, there has been with each flood tremendous damages to fences, farmhouses, barns, and other outbuildings, farm implements and tools, drainage ditches, loss of livestock, damage to existing levees. These represent direct losses. Indirect losses include interruption of business and gainful occupation during and after a flood, interruption of traffic, evacuation and reoccupation of the flooded areas, the pollutior of wells used for drinking water, the increased number of breeding places for mosquitoes, and the creation of other conditions adverse to human health and happiness. All of these conditions reveal the need for corrective legislation.

The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors has made this recommendation:

Raising, strengthening, and extending of these levees to give complete protection against floods—at a cost fully warranted by the amount of direct damages prevented, the indirect damage that will be eliminated, the appreciation in the value of lands that can profitably be put to productive use, and the general though intangible benefits to a large number of people through the threat of frequent disruption of normal activity. The Board recommends that the levees along the south bank of Arkansas River between Little Rock and Pine Bluff, Ark., be raised, strengthened, and extended generally in accordance with the plan contained in the report of the district engineer, at an estimated first cost of $641,000.

The Flood Control Committee has presented the recommendations of the Army engineers providing this levee for the Arkansas River in the pending bill to the House for consideration, and I sincerely hope that this feature of the bill is retained.

I appreciate the actions of our distinguished chairman in agreeing to plan No. 4 submitted by our Army engineers and modified by the committee as above stated. I appreciate the actions of the committee in voting the additional flood-control protection for Arkansas. I very greatly appreciate the fine cooperation I have had from General Tyler, Major Reber, and other engineers from the War Department. They have all been very helpful. Of course, I deeply appreciate the efforts of citizens of Arkansas and Louisiana in coming to Washington and testifying with reference to the matter before our Flood Control Committee, and on behalf of them I wish to express my appreciation to the membership of the House for the passage of the bill today, and I sincerely hope that it is passed in the Senate and approved by the President.

If it is finally enacted into law, I am advised by our Army engineers that it will constitute a very enormous saving to the Government and at the same time there will be expended in the building of the levees on the Arkansas and Louisiana side the sum of $31,453,000. The sums of $17.128,000 for work in Arkansas and $14,325,000 in Louisiana.

Mr. Speaker, last but not least, I desire to express my appreciation to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HARRIS] who so ably represents Chicot County for his very fine cooperation and outstanding service with reference to perfecting this plan before our Flood Control Committee. He has rendered every possible service.

OF WYOMING

RESOLUTION OF THE STATE OF WYOMING COUNCIL OF DEFENSE

Mr. McINTYRE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution recently adopted by the State of Wyoming Council of Defense, of which Col. Goelet Gallatin is the chairman:

Whereas the United States of America is engaged upon a tremendous national-defense program; and

Whereas it recognizes the necessity of utilizing its total manpower to the best advantage of the program and to the best interests of the Nation; and

Whereas it is cognizant of the valued experience along military lines of that group of patriotic citizens referred to as ex-service men; and

Whereas this experience can be utilized for industrial protection, thereby releasing men for the more active pursuits of labor and the Army: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the National Council of Defense, Civilian Defense, and other allied departmental agencies so recommend and broadcast to industry the desirability and necessity of utilizing ex-service men for all types of industrial protection and activity where mature judgment, valued experience, and a patriotic desire particularly qualifies them.

No Man Who Does Not Have Vision Will Ever Realize Any High Hope or Undertake Any Great Enterprise

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAMPTON P. FULMER

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 27, 1941

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting a letter addressed to me by Mrs. Muriel Smith, 2234 West One Hundred and Seventh Street, Chicago, Ill.

I want to call the attention of those who may happen to read these remarks and this letter to the importance of the statements as made by her in the last paragraph of her letter.

I am wondering if our people as a whole are carrying, deep down in their hearts and in their minds, the seriousness and importance of our national-defense program at a time when it appears that the war which is now raging in Europe may be extended to every nook and corner of the world.

It is true that in this war we are combating ideologies as well as violence. Just look what we have to contend with in our own country and how much it would mean to us in helping Great Britain and in building promptly and efficiently our own national-defense program if, as stated by Mrs. Smith, our people as a whole were deeply concerned in heart and in mind about the seriousness of this war and the importance of standing up and defending the freedom of our people.

The bill referred to in Mrs. Smith's letter is the type of legislation that would be helpful, not only in training the boys and girls of this country in that outstanding and most important vocation in life, agriculture, but it would tend to instill into their hearts and minds the type of citizenship that would carry with it the importance of living and defending the American way of life.

In that agriculture is the very bulwark of our democracy, and in that no national-defense program can be successful unless it has back of it a well-balanced agriculture, I am hoping that the Members of the House will give careful and favorable consideration to this most important piece of legislation.

The letter follows:

THE BEVERLY HILLS WOMAN'S CLUB,
Chicago, June 19, 1941.

Hon. H. P. FULMER,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FULMER: May we, the public-welfare department of the Beverly Hills Woman's Club, offer you our sincere congratulations upon the introduction of your bill, H. R. 4530? A quotation from Woodrow Wilson, which we have adopted as our club motto for the coming year, when we shall be earnestly concerned with the national-defense program, seems to fit you admirably. It is as follows:

"No man who does not see vision will ever realize any high hope or undertake any great enterprise."

We hope that your bill will become a law, allocating, as it does, funds for a constructive purpose, which we deem highly indispensible for the preservation of the American way of life, by educating our youth in American principles. 4-H Clubs accomplish this work so effectively and at such a minimum of cost that we urban mothers regret our children cannot also share in these projects; however, what benefits rural children is an indirect benefit to all children.

National defense must be carried on from within, in the hearts and minds of our people, as well as from without, by armed force; we are combating ideologies as well as violence. In the scramble for armaments, the promulgation of an idea must not be lost. Therefore we would add our little bit of encouragement to your efforts for 4-H work. Please have a hearing soon.

Sincerely yours,

MURIEL SMITH.

POEM BY A CONSTITUENT

Mr. DAVIS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following poem written by a distinguished constituent, a country newspaper editor, author, and humorist, Mr. Mack Sauer, of Leesburg, Highland County, Ohio:

WHATCHA GONNA' BE?

"When you get big,
Whatcha gonna' be?"
I say to my lad
As he climbs my knee.
He says he's gonna' run
A newspaper press,
Or be a band leader
In fancy dress,
Or sell ice cream cones,
Like his playmate's dad.
Ah, the plans are many
Of this little lad.

The Russian lad
On his daddy's knee
Isn't asked:
"Whatcha gonna' be?"
It's not up to him,
It's up to the state,
Which rules his life,
Which decides his fate;
In Germany, too,
Where men aren't free,
What folly to ask
"Whatcha gonna' be?"

Oh, I'm thankful to God
That in America still
My little boy
Can be what he will;
He can choose his faith,
His vocation, his all,
And he knows not
Of a dictator's call.
What a blissful joy
With my lad on my knee
To say: "When you're big,
Whatcha gonna' be?"

War Supplies Held Up by Red Tape

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT J. ENGEL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 27, 1941

ARTICLE BY JAMES L. WRIGHT

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by James L. Wright, which was published in the Buffalo Evening News of June 14, 1941:

[From the Buffalo Evening News of June 14, 1941]

RUSH ORDERS FOR WAR SUPPLIES HELD UP 4 MONTHS BY RED TAPE—MATERIALS UNITED STATES MANUFACTURERS COULD TURN OUT IN 2 WEEKS ARE DELAYED AT CAPITAL DESKS

(By James L. Wright, Buffalo Evening News Washington Bureau)

WASHINGTON, June 14.—"Rush orders" for war supplies by the men actually doing the fighting on the other side of the Atlantic often take 4 months to clear the desks of London and Washington officials when the American manufacturers could turn out the supplies so urgently needed in 2 weeks.

There have been so many generalizations about how governmental red tape is tangling up the delivery of essentials in this state of unlimited emergency that it was decided to trace through a typical "requisition." The sample, which may be called "Contract X," showed:

1. After an officer in the British Near East forces dispatched from Cairo in early March his "rush order" for 250 units of a standard American-made commodity, 70 different signatures, approving the requisition, had to be obtained in London before the order could be cabled to the British missions here.

STILL FURTHER DELAY

2. In Washington, the order had to pass over at least 10 desks, including that of Lease-Lend Administrator Harry L. Hopkins, before it reached the blotter of President Roosevelt, the only person who can authorize lease-lend expenditures.

3. It was presented at the White House late in April, but nothing more was heard from it until early June when word was received that the President had approved the expenditure. That was a verbal report, however, and it took 2 days more for the formal authorization to go back down the line to the buyers' desk.

4. Because every expenditure of more than $500,000 must be cleared though the Office of Production Management, and this one runs into big money, the "clearance" process has been started. Fourteen more signatures must be obtained before the contract can be signed and the bids still are out.

SITUATION IS TRAGIC

The goods called for in the rush order can be turned out here in 2 weeks after the contract is signed, but if they successfully run the gauntlet of Nazi submarines and airplanes after they have been made and loaded they probably will reach the colonel in Egypt, if he is still alive, so that he may use them in his desert fighting about 6 months after he sent in his urgent call.

The way in which London and Washington officialdom becomes entangled in its own red tape and gets everything snarled, while these same officials are crying for speed, more speed, and still more speed, would be uproariously funny if it were not so tragic. The situation was described here this week in this lighthearted but graphic way:

INTERNATIONAL RED TAPE

"Whitehall old red tape is being joined to American young red tape, with Harry Hopkins as the minister and the President as the bottleneck." To that a group of harried British and American purchasing agents, all businessmen working for their government, added this song of their own composition, a sort of safety valve for their pent-up emotions:

Oh, we would be a mighty nation,
If we could get that allocation.

Undoubtedly, situations such as that surrounding contract X are what Defense Purchasing Agent Donald M. Nelson had in mind when he told reporters here this week that there is too great a lapse between the point "where the need is felt and the time when action is taken."

But, in answer to demands for allocation of some of the work the President personally attempts to handle, he himself has contended that he really has less paper work to do now than he had in normal times.

DENIES HE IS SWAMPED

He also says that he is able to turn his attention more largely to war preparations now that he is not snowed under with multitudinous duties.

Nevertheless, it took an exasperated Army purchasing agent more than half an hour just to trace the zig-zag course of contract X through its labyrinthian maze, from the time a British colonel put in his rush order early in March until two British businessmen walked into his office with it on April 17, and he delivered the approved requisition to the White House late in April for Mr. Roosevelt's signature. A 6-week delay followed.

Asked how many separate pieces of paper were and will be required for the transaction, the Army buyer shrugged his soulders and replied: "You'd have to figure it out in hundreds of papers; I just wouldn't know."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 27, 1941

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, Russia may need God before the end of this hot July.

Our $50,000,000,000 war baby is now in the same phew with Stalin.

One thing sure, we won't hear anything more in the chats about fighting for the democracies.

If MARTIN DIES fails of the senatorship there is a chance of sending him as Ambassador to U. S. S. R.

Mr. Churchill urges us to aid Russia. Thank you, Winston. This meets with both our inclination and convenience.

Two tragedies in Philly a year ago this week: Gen. Smedley Butler was buried—and an interventionist unwittingly was born.

How are we going to "die on our feet or live on our knees" when we have been down on another part of our anatomy for over 8 years?

The tradition of George Washington isolation suffered again when the President encouraged our boys to enlist in Canada for the European dog fight.

Earl Browder may now supersede Henry Stimson as Secretary of War. This would be a great stroke for national unity and would settle the labor problem at the same time.

Josephus Daniels said in a speech to the electors at the Mayflower during inaugural that Franklin Roosevelt in '17 was more anxious to go to war than President Wilson, Newton Baker, or himself.

Why the reason for all these degrees to the G. O. P. standard bearer—because he had joined the brain trust, or for the confession that his campaign promises were just political oratory?

A thought for the 4th of July—the new Members of the Seventy-seventh Congress gave and took with Lord Halifax on Wednesday evening, and the general opinion later was that they had loved England more on Tuesday.

St. Lawrence Seaway a Swinging Gate for Foreign Trade

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALFRED F. BEITER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 27, 1941

LETTER FROM PAUL M. SMITH, EDITOR OF LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS JOURNAL

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, at the hearing of the St. Lawrence project before the Rivers and Harbors Committee the other day, the Lieutenant Governor of the State of New York was very emphatic that organized labor wants the St. Lawrence seaway constructed. I have had a great deal of correspondence with labor groups concerning this subject, and am convinced that labor organizations all over the country are awake to the deleterious effects this seaway would have upon the present commercial, industrial, and transportation facilities of the country. Under permission to extend my remarks, I include a letter from Paul M. Smith, editor of the Locomotive Engineers Journal, which expresses the feeling of that group on the subject:

Baited with glittering misconceptions, the farmers of the great agricultural areas of North Ameria are being led to believe that the St. Lawrence waterway and power scheme will help them get more money for their products. They are told that such a project would make the area a mighty "gateway to world trade."

Skillful investigators of the scheme have neglected to mention that this so-called gate to world trade, which is so generously offered this grea area—at the expense of the already overburdened taxpayers—is a swinging gate. One that will swing back and smack the face (and security) of the very same farmer and businessman, small and large, who would have to struggle to pay this enormous tax bill. The great farm areas should become alert to the fact that America's agricultural markets are jeopardized by this scheme, which is being proven unsound economically and politically.

A quick survey of world trade conditions reveals the "back swing" that could be expected from the St. Lawrence scheme. Most of America's trade, except for war and defense transactions with Great Britain, is with South America and probably will remain so balanced for years to come. Our good-neighbor policy will see to that.

In return for our goods Latin America offers principally agricultural products, cattle, and hides. Through lower living standards and peon labor their cost of production is much cheaper than in the United States and Canada. Thus the St. Lawrence scheme would enable them to dump these products into the very center of America's own agricultural area and would do much to demoralize the markets.

Not so long ago, you may recall, a number of small, ocean-going boats from South America came through the circuitous St. Lawrence route and unloaded their cargoes of grain in the Midwest. This raised havoc with grain markets in the area.

With the good-neighbor policy enforced, politicians would find it most discomforting and embarrassing to endeavor to raise protective tariffs to guard our agricultural markets in the Midwest. Thus, through the St. Lawrence scheme America's great army of farmers would toil in their fields to raise the taxes for a project that would severely cripple their own market.

Increased opposition to the St. Lawrence project is becoming more evident throughout Canada and the United States, as people become more familiar with its economic and political effects. As a defense measure it cannot be completed in time to be of any use in the present conflict, and when completed it could be used only about 7 months of each year, because it would be icebound and unnavigable 5 months of the year. As a power project, steam plants have been conceded to be far more desirable, because they can be erected where the power is needed more quickly and at less cost.

A channel 27 feet deep is specified in the project, which eliminates the possibility of building warships of capital size—battleships or cruisers—in the Great Lakes shipyards, as many of the project's proponents would have us believe. Lake shipbuilding facilities are already congested with their share of the construction of boats which can go through the existing water route.

As we consider the St. Lawrence scheme in the solid light of day, we must not neglect the fact that it will do much to harm the farmers of Canada and the United States. Neither can we forget that the scheme will serve to drain millions of dollars from overburdened taxpayers in every part of the country now (and for many years to come) when every effort and dollar is urgently needed for advancement of a vital rearmament program.

PAUL M. SMITH,
Editor, Locomotive Engineers Journal.

The Late Senator Ben Williamson, Sr., of Ashland, Ky.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOE B. BATES
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 27, 1941

Mr. BATES of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, Senator Ben Williamson, Sr., of Ashland, Ky., died in a Cincinnati hospital Monday night. Senator Williamson was recognized, even by those who disagreed with him, as an important influence not only in the business world, but in the political, social, and spiritual thought of eastern Kentucky. It will, perhaps, be many years before the real contribution of his long and useful life of public service can be adequately appraised. He was always looking ahead discussing events of the day and attitudes of the day not in terms of any hypothetical, existing situation, but with a profound conviction that nothing is fixed and all things must be judged in their relation to changing times. We have lost a great American and a great Kentuckian, whose passing will be felt by thousands of citizens to whom he has been a friend and benefactor.

What Is the Catholic Stand on War for America?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK B. KEEFE

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 27, 1941

ARTICLE BY T. FRANCIS BENNETT

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by T. Francis Bennett, which was published in the Tablet, a Catholic weekly, under date of June 7, 1941:

[From the Tablet of June 7, 1941]

WHAT IS THE CATHOLIC STAND ON WAR FOR AMERICA?

(By T. Francis Bennett)

"If after the war into which we are now being led, as happened after the World War, certain hostile writers and speakers allege loosely that the church abdicated her post as a moral guide when war was impending, it will be a satisfaction to be able to say that the accusation is unjustified."—The Catholic World, New York City.

(The following editorial opinion of the Catholic Press of the United States was expressed during the past month. Due to limitations of space only a few Catholic papers can be quoted.)

WHY PEACE?

"The major portion of the Catholic Press has been consistently opposed to our involvement in the European conflict. It shouted opposition to the first moves to amend our original position of neutrality, pointing out what has since come to pass, that each amendment would edge us closer to the conflict.

"Its editorial policy was not planned in any pact among the various units throughout the country. It was based spontaneously on the principles of sheer patriotism, that America's defense and security come first, and on the conviction that neither a moral responsibility nor intelligent self-interest could find a place for our country in a conflict not of its making and out of its power to control the aims, methods of operation or the basis of peace that would follow the outcome of the war."—The Evangelist, Albany, N. Y.

"Our Land is America. We want her, who offered to Catholics in days gone by an almost unexampled refuge for the free development of the faith, to survive and prosper in this perilous world."—The Catholic Transcript, Hartford, Conn.

THIS IS NOT OUR WAR!

"Let us do away with the hypocrisy of the propaganda which is trying to draw the American Nation into the war on the thesis that one of the sides is fighting for the preservation of Christianity. The present war is not a holy war. It is an old-fashioned foreign war for colonies, for trade, for raw materials, for mastery of the sea, and mastery of the air. American citizens, who are Christians and who are devoted to Christianity, will not be misled by labels and slogans and trade-marks. The present World War was distinctly 'not made for Christianity.' The United States should determine to stay out of it. (The Catholic Tribune, St. Joseph, Mo.)

"What is needed is not dabbling in international politics, but adherence to the principles enunciated by the Holy Father. So long as this Nation remains at peace, "like a strong man armed," we will be the one power that can help to negotiate a peace founded upon justice and charity." (The Catholic Standard and Times, Philadelphia, Pa.)

"Nor is there any reason why the people of our own United States should have any illusions about democracy, or possible democracy, over there. Nothing will be gained by shedding of American blood in a foolish effort to clean up the situation. The age-old hatreds and petty despotisms will continue because there is no present indication that they will be eradicated. It is the business of America to attend to her own interests, to purify her own soul, and to see to it that she is not involved in, or contaminated by, the many evils which have brought Europe to the brink of ruin." (The Superior California Register, Sacramento, Calif.)

WHY MUST WE ENTER THE WAR?

"Certain groups in America and many people in England think it is our duty to enter this war. Why? The only answers ever given to this 'why?' are fantastic. First, if we don't get Hitler, Hitler will get us—like the big, bad wolf. Just imagine 130,000,000 people protected on either side by thousands of miles of sea, afraid of invasion. The threat is not offered seriously. It must not be taken seriously. The other answer to the 'why?' is to save Christianity and civilization. That sounds almost blasphemous" (Ave Maria, Notre Dame, Ind.).

"We should know that immediate invasion is only a remote possibility, that Herr Hitler cannot hope to successfully garrison all of Europe, let alone take on, in the havoc of the present, the strongest industrial power in the world. No doubt the economic possibilities are alarming, the future definitely disturbing. Declaring war, however, is not a solution at the moment. The sensible course is to follow a calm, resolute program of national defense, in the meanwhile supplying all aid to the victims of aggressor nations. We hope that this conduct will not unleash the dogs of war on our peace-loving land" (The New World, Chicago, Ill.).

"As has been said many times by many observers, no country in its right mind goes to war—unless perhaps in those very rare cases in which, without any provocation or previous controversy, it is actually invaded by a foreign foe and must needs protect itself" (The Inland Catholic, Spokane, Wash.).

"The Nation is united in resolute opposition to the spirit and methods of totalitarianism and its atheistic basis. There is a wide difference of opinion, however, on the best means of combating it. It is our considered and firm conviction that we should build up our defenses to such a point that no nation or combination of nations will dare molest us, utilizing them only in the event they are needed for self-defense. We thoroughly disagree, therefore, with those who advocate immediate military action against the totalitarian powers" (The Catholic News, New York City).

WHO WANTS AMERICA IN THE WAR

"It may well be that there is a strong case for our entry into the war for American reasons. If so, we would prefer to have the case stated by responsible Americans than by foreigners, no matter where they were born. The war propaganda by foreigners in this country is dividing Americans and preventing American unity, such a unity as we shall need if we do go to war. The most offensive and ill-mannered, of course, are the French and British hybrids. They presume that most Americans feel more sympathy for them than for the brave Finns, the betrayed Bohemians, the cat's-paw Poles, and the deserted Belgians" (The Monitor, San Francisco).

"Watching the drift of the tide, noting the trend of oratory and newspaper and magazine comment, one is compelled to ask—is our country really ours, or do Americans hold their land as a kind of fief, with the title of real possession held overseas? It may appear to be a ridiculous question to ask. It would have been ridiculous as short a time ago as 6 months. But not now. One could almost gather the impression these days that Americans who believe Europe should settle its own problems are guilty of supreme selfishness. Subtly it is conveyed that to think first of America is in some odd way 'unpatriotic'" (The Pilot, Boston).

IS THIS OUR WAR

"The American people have no personal interest in this war. Whether we are to be duped as we were in 1917 depends entirely upon ourselves. If our emotions are permitted to rule our reason, we shall surely be embroiled, sooner or later. And every effort will be made to arouse these emotions. Even now they are being worked on and we should expect them, catch phrases, studied insults, falsehoods, and appeals to our vanity. All of this will be for the sole purpose of our giving our lives and our money for the same thing we did 22 years ago. In the light of that experience, would it be worth it? There is a need, and indeed a grave need, for a protracted period of sanity on the part of the American people" (The Indiana Catholic and Record, Indianapolis, Ind.).

"This European power politics is not our war. We had no part, as a people, in its declaration and we must have no part, as a people, in its waging. But this war against Christianity in our educational, social, and political life, right here in America, is our war. As a Christian people we must enlist here in America to fight here in America for the duration of this war against Christianity here in America. There must be no participation of America in this war. There must, there will, please God, be a united America for the honest defense of our homeland and not for the defense of the pelf of imperialism. There must, there can, and there will be peace if the people of our country, and people everywhere turn back to God, and give ear to the constant, never-changing plea for peace of Christ's vice regent on earth, Pope Pius XII."—The Catholic Week, Birmingham, Ala.

WHAT IS THIS WAR ABOUT?

"War brings a curse upon all nations that resort to it without a just cause. Those who remember the years preceding the first World War know that since then we have been living in an age of frustration. Even the balance of human thought, as a result, received an upset from which it has not recovered. * * * And now here we are fighting again over the same old issues. And the present state of the world is a hundred times worse than the first. The fight to get is opposed by the fight to keep. Quite a simple and sordid fact underlying all the bunk of propaganda."—The Tidings, Los Angeles, Calif.

"Uncounted numbers of wars have spattered Europe—in fact, the whole world—with blood. At the close of each war, the survivors meekly buried their dead and paid the costs. * * * The present century is stained the reddest of all centuries. One asks: How long will it be until man returns to his senses and to God? God-led, man is the creative force of the world. Estranged from God, man is the destructive force of the world."—The Advance Register, Wichita, Kans.

MUST THE PEOPLE YIELD?

"If the majority, or even a fair number, of the 80 or 90 percent of American citizens who are positively opposed to the involvement of this Nation in war would speak out now, they would preserve this Nation's peace and strength and future. Why should one fear to speak out for America when America so sorely needs our voice? If our Nation be pushed into this war, then and after the war ends there will truly be things to fear" (The Catholic Northwest Progress, Seattle, Wash.).

"All polls of public opinion show that we desire to stay out of war. The man on the street tells you this. The mothers whose young sons are in selective-service training camps tell you this with choked voices. What the future holds in store for us we do not know. But to have one of the very small number of men who can tip the scales away from national peace to war make the gross misstatement that Senator PEPPER has, is an insult to our common intelligence. He should be told by letter and telegram just how wrong he is" (The Catholic Chronicle, Toledo, Ohio).

"This is no time to stop in persistent efforts for the achievement of peace for these United States and for the world. * * *

"The 'what's the use' attitude furnished by a resignation when the going is tough will not suffice now for the seekers of a peace of justice and charity" (The Catholic Courier, Rochester, N. Y.).

"Within the last few weeks, the movement against armed intervention by the United States in the European war appears to have gained strength. The American people still hope to see the downfall of Hitlerism, and they have not changed from their original wish to give Great Britain whatever aid may be possible, without compromising our own national welfare or safety. * * * As far as can be ascertained, the determination of the American people to keep out of war is stronger than at any time since the outbreak of hostilities in Europe" (America, New York City).

THE MEMORY OF THE OTHER DEAD

"There will be a special poignancy in the observance of Memorial Day this year in view of the terrible scenes of death and carnage which are being enacted in Europe. The memory of the first dead is still living and vibrant in the hearts of their surviving relatives. And now they are forced to witness again a similar holocaust. Americans will breathe a prayer that such scenes will come to a speedy termination and that American blood will not again be spilled on foreign battlefields."—The Providence Visitor, Providence, R. I.).

"Let every son who loves his mother and every mother who loves her son send a wire to Washington registering a plea for peace. The people of America do not want war. They are willing to work to protect their own country. They do not want to go out and become involved in other nations' century-old quarrels. Only by besieging the President and Congress with repetitions of their desire for peace can they make the force of their opinions felt."—The Daily Tribune, Dubuque, Iowa.

"Since May of 1940, war with its grief and devastation has been creeping closer to American homes. Last year many a Catholic family was enough personally interested in what seemed foreign affairs to respond to the Pontiff's appeal for special prayers. This year we don't see how any Catholic family can dare fail to unite in prayers for peace."—The Catholic Herald Citizen, Milwaukee, Wis.

WHAT HOPE FOR PEACE?

"While one faction of world leadership shouts in fiendish glee at anticipated victory and the other calls for crushing vengeance, the Father of Christendom appeals for a just peace. * * * The holy father puts little hope in the prospect of stirring up sufficient good will among men or of finding enough men of good will with sufficient desire or power to put quick end to the conflict. His Holiness looks to divine intervention and calls upon the Christians of the world to win and merit God's help by their heartfelt intercession" (The Evangelist, Albany, N. Y.).

"Actual war is now devastating large portions of the earth, but its shadow really falls on the entire world, including our own beloved land. Men everywhere hate war, but they are being driven into it by the ill will of a few who do not fight themselves but force others into the battle lines. War is the harvest which the world reaps from its sowing the seeds of hate. * * * Mary brought God into the world at the time of the Incarnation. Mary can bring God back into the world of today that has exiled Him. She will bring Him back as the Prince of Peace if her children are sincere in their request to have Him end His world exile" (The Universe Bulletin, Cleveland, Ohio).

"The breath of war is felt upon the Nation, and actual immersion in war's horrors seems almost unavoidable. The compass of the ship of state has been set, and the course marked out is through stormy seas. If the catastrophe of actual war for this country is to be averted, it will not be through the diplomacy of the Nation's leaders, but only through the divine intervention" (The Catholic Standard and Times, Philadelphia, Pa.).

"In the universal confusion, minds are deluged with the reports and tales of the spreading wars. Now one nation succumbs, now another; hope of victory against aggression, despair of the conquered, alternate their play upon our sympathies. It is difficcult to consider the hope of peace; it is difficult to bring ourselves to pray for peace. Even the Pope does not visualize a hope for an early peace. And yet peace must come; we must hope for peace; we must pray very fervently for peace. Our Holy Father calls us to a crusade of prayer for peace." (The Florida Catholic, Miami, Fla.)

LET US PRAY

"Let the prayer go up to Heaven for right guidance of those in authority, for God's help on their efforts to defend our country and its liberties, for God's blessing on their earnest efforts to do all that is right and needful to keep far from America the devastation and ruin and oppression that are today the portion of so many countries abroad. God bless our fields; make them yield unto us all the bounties of a good harvest; keep them for productive growth, not for destructive blows of clashing armies." (The Catholic Courier, Rochester, N. Y.)

"If the power of prayer is again released and used in the lives of common men and women, if the spirit declares its aims clearly and boldly, there is yet hope that our prayers will be answered." (The Record, Louisville, Ky.)

"The Holy Father again formally, and as the head of Christ's Church, asks that we pray for the return of peace. In a special appeal he asks that we approach Our Lady during her month of May with this one definite petition. The language of the Holy Father is remarkably incisive in his analysis of what we ought to work for and pray for." (The Catholic Sun, Syracuse, N. Y.)

"We ask her (the Blessed Mother) not only to put an end to the cruel slaughter and miseries of war, but to recultivate the world, stripping from the hearts of men all the unholy passions that are a barrier to the peace of Christ. We cannot ask for more and it would be senseless to ask for less" (The Southern Cross, San Diego, Calif.).

"At the feet of her who is the Help of Christians and the Queen of Peace, let us pray perseveringly for the great boon of peace. Let us ask Christ for this peace in Mary's name and through her all-powerful intercession. When Mary asks her Son for us, Christ will not refuse her request" (The Messenger, Belleville, Ill.).

TWO CONTRARY VIEWS—OUR TASK

"Certainly no recriminative charges of past fault or failure to stand by these same principles (enunciated by Lord Halifax as Britain's 'war aims,' and by President Roosevelt as the 'four freedoms' for the world), or to vindicate these rights; no plea for 'isolation' in the present from the world's great agony; no willingness to accept a 'negotiated peace' at any price that may spare us the suffering of 'persecution for justice' sake'; no selfishness or softness of heart will suffice to excuse us as a people from the task which lies before us: to recognize the inherent evil of the totalitarian philosophy and its threat to our own way of life, and to be ready, willing, and determined to do all that must be done to defeat it, completely, finally, once and forever" (The Church World, Portland, Maine).

DENYING THE CRISIS

"There is a small group within the country that is more concerned with stirring up hate and mistrust to gain their own ends than in promoting national unity. They criticize everything that is not in perfect agreement with their own narrow aims. Most of them are living in a neat world of unreality that denies our national crisis. Their chief means of attack is vicious, destructive criticism rather than the constructive criticism that should be expected of them. * * * There are many sincere and honest people in the various peace groups but they seem to be fast losing control to other groups and individuals who have dedicated themselves to a permanent campaign of name-calling, half-truths, and malicious criticism" (The New World, Chicago, Ill.).

Memorial Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN C. KUNKEL

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 27, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. JOHN C. KUNKEL

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an address which I made at the Memorial Day services held on Sunday, May 25, at Mount Holly Springs, under the auspices of the South Mountain American Legion Post, No. 674, of Mount Holly Springs, Pa.:

I salute each and everyone of you who, by your presence here, reconsecrate this annual Decoration Day, so sacred to all of us; who by your presence, give honor and recognition to those who by their actions have bequeathed to us freedom, liberty, and union; who are upon this occasion dedicating yourselves anew to the solemn pledge that the deeds by which these departed heroes upheld our ideals and institutions shall not have been in vain. Others before them had won these prized possessions at great cost and sacrifice; and molded with certain knowledge and uncanny skill the framework to preserve them. Those who rest in these little green tents so near us now have done their utmost to give them to us intact, whole, and undivided.

It is a cheering thought to think that while Father Time has brushed away with gentle hand much of the heartache and sadness caused by the departure of these brave men and women, yet each year adds to their stature, their luster and their glory. The magnitude of their achievement increases as the days grow into years and as the years grow into decades. A great English poet, Gray in his Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard once said, "The paths of glory lead but to the grave." This I do not believe. All of us here today are giving testimony to our belief that the paths of glory lead beyond the grave. Our United Nation of free citizens proves that fact.

How fitting it is that this day in spring was chosen—when the earth is again bursting into song and color and giving us sure and certain proof that there is a new birth after death, and that our loved ones are not truly dead, but have just gone forward and upward to a better life than this.

Now and for many years past we pay homage to those who have passed on to the Great Beyond—"To that bourne from which no traveler returns"—after using freely and gladly of their strength, their energy, and their blood to build this Nation into a bulwark of free civilization and to cement our Union into an indivisible and indestructible unit. When we do so, we also rededicate ourselves to carry on the purposes and ideals which they have achieved.

History tells us that this custom of setting aside May 30 as Memorial Day, or Decoration Day, for the soldiers of the Civil War originated in the South. There were located most of the battlefields of the war. Near these battlefields were the last resting places of the mortal remains of so many of the brave soldiers of both sides. A young Virginia girl, Cassandra Oliver Moncure, is reputed to have originated the idea in May of 1866. Flowers were placed on the graves of the brave men of both armies. Gen. John A. Logan, of the Grand Army of the Republic, witnessed these services. It was he who, 2 years later on May 5, 1868, issued an order appointing May 30 of that year as Decoration Day for the Grand Army of the Republic. That day was chosen because it was the date of the discharge of the last Union volunteers of the war. Since then various States one by one have adopted it as a holiday. Today nearly all the States observe the day. There is no national law on the subject, however.

Instituting the reverent custom of Memorial Day, Gen. Logan said: "It is our purpose to inaugurate this observance in the hope that it will be kept from year to year while a survivor of the war remains to honor the memory of the departed." General Logan's hope will be fulfilled. The veterans of the Civil War have honored this request and all patriotic Americans have proudly claimed the privilege of joining with them in doing so. And when the last of the old comrades muster out and fall in with the ranks of that vast silent army, when the last bugle call has blown, free Americans throughout the land will continue to place the flowers of spring in tribute and devotion upon these graves.

On the hillside above the narrow pass of Thermopylae stood a marble lion—the emblem of fearless courage—and at its base was written the inscription:

"Go tell the Spartans, thou that passeth by,
That here obedient to their laws we lie."

To this shrine of Spartan valor the Spartan mothers brought their sons so that they could read this message sent by the dead to the living. The mothers would tell the story of Leonidas, the young king of the Spartans, and his Spartan band, who gave up their lives in defense of their country.

We have witnessed recently the remarkable bravery with which the Greeks, thousands of years later, have opposed the forces of oppression and have struggled against what they knew to be overwhelming odds in order to maintain their freedom and institutions. We cannot but feel that the inspiration of these ancient heroes produced to some degree in some divine and mysterious manner the courage shown by their descendants. Thermopylae has lived again.

We would be unworthy of our own heroic dead if we should fail to do our utmost or put forth whatever effort, no matter how great, in order to preserve the priceless heritages they have left for us.

There could be no more appropriate place to pay tribute to the heroes of the Civil War than in this spot in the Cumberland Valley, skirted and rimmed with so many of the historic battlefields of that war; with so many of its towns and villages yet bearing scars from that conflict. In that time of stress troops were moving to and fro all around us. Not far from here is where the decisive battle—the battle that made inevitable the final result—was fought—the Union preserved. We Americans have always known by instinct and intuition that the Battle of Gettysburg was one of the decisive battles of the world. Historians of other nations after long study agree with us. As time marches on, the importance, the far-reaching significance of that battle, and of the preservation of our Union have become increasingly crystal clear. In the precarious, brittle world situation that challenges us today, think what it would mean to us if this country had been divided into groups of smaller States or nations instead of being one powerful and united whole, able to mobilize all its resources, ready to defend its security, safety, and integrity with them. Think how important this fact is to the other peoples of the world also. We can hold aloft the torch of freedom and liberty much higher as we are today. In union there is strength. We can make the light of liberty burn more brightly amid the storm clouds of a war-torn world when the 48 stars embrace all the land between the Atlantic and the Pacific, between Canada and the Gulf of Mexico.

We could not have fought for freedom if our forefathers had not made all men free. For if the principle of secession had once been established it is only logical to assume that it would have been carried farther and farther; that both a separate North and a separate South would have broken up later into yet smaller units by further use of that same principle. This sentiment is shared by our brothers in the South just as much as by those of us in the North. A southern Representative in Congress, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER], expressed this view in a Memorial Day speech some years ago, when he said, "I shudder to think what might have happened had the South prevailed." Today the North and the South are one. Indeed, there is no North, no South, no East, no West. The bitterness and ill-feeling which was bound to be created by such a war and its emotional aftermath have almost entirely vanished. The common purpose with which all sections of the country joined strictly together to further our ideals in the World War provided the final crucible in which were washed away the few remaining antagonisms which existed at that time. Never did so many go so far to fight for so little of material value as did those boys of 1917 and 1918, who, with shining eyes, marched forth on that great crusade to make the world safe for democracy, and to end all wars, and who asked nothing for themselves. The fruits of their victory and their achievements have been largely dissipated by hands other than their own. Yet their idealism remains today—as it always will—one of the great moral and regenerative forces of the world. When we look at the totalitarian governments of today, and when we see the four horsemen of the Apocalypse again riding roughshod over more than one-half of the world, we know that their high objectives were well worth fighting for. If those boys had had their way the world would have had throughout the peace we still cherish so greatly and strive to preserve in our own land; and countless thousands who now feel the tyrants' heel would enjoy the blessings of freedom.

Today North, South, East, and West seek to provide for our common defense and to safeguard these same rights and principles which those to whom we pay honor and homage today paid for so willingly but so dearly many years ago.

In many parts of the world, man—like Narcissus—has fallen in love with his own image. His intellectual advances and achievements have outrun his spiritual growth and development. Today we are forced to see that intellectual and physical progress are not worth much if unaccompanied by spiritual gains. The inventions which have annihilated time and space are being used to destroy everything else on the face of the earth, including man himself. The airplane is erasing an age-old civilization in Europe and England. The factories built by toil to create articles for the enjoyment and use of people are now turning out instruments to obliterate useful articles previously created. They are making future toil more necessary and more certain. We are not turning swords into plowshares, but strictly the reverse. The acceptance of force as the decisive and only method of argument has forced every nation to take steps unstintedly and to the utmost of its ability to protect itself by force against threatened force. No matter how peace-loving a nation may be, it cannot afford to remain unarmed in a world aflame. We will have no sure and lasting peace throughout the world until our eyes have seen the "glory of the coming of the Lord."

It was just a little more than four score years after the founding of our Republic until the time the first shot was fired at Fort Sumter. It was four score years today since that shot was fired. The critical junctures in the history of the United States recur at intervals of approximately 60 years. Again today we are called upon to make fateful decisions and to take prompt action to insure our safety and security. We cannot afford to take chances. We cannot afford to gamble with the turns of the wheel of fate.

The life, the liberty, and the pursuit of happiness of a great people must not be subjected to even the slightest risk. We have always had these privileges and perhaps have become accustomed to regard them as part of our natural environment, like the trees and the birds and the air and the sun. It may not be humanly possible to really know the true worth of such gifts unless one has had the bitter experience of living without them. We are proud to be citizens of this Nation. We look back on our glorious past and perhaps we have a tendency to think that this glorious past insures of itself an equally glorious future. But empires have risen and empires have fallen. Nations which long ago decayed and crumbled away also had their periods of amazing success and prosperity. Our own Nation has had its periods of true greatness and it has had periods when it has been less great. Today we are America. What we do and what we are will determine what the future of this country will be. These whom we honor today have given us most favorable opportunities. The strength of any government at any given time is no greater than the composite strength of all its people. It rests upon the aggregate of each and every one of those who form its citizenry.

Americanism is not something inherent—not something which is just here with us of itself because of the fact that we possess the peculiar advantages of being American citizens—but it is something we must create by our daily lives. We must appreciate this and act accordingly, if our Nation is to continue as a dynamic force for right and for freedom.

There are strange forces alive in the world today. It is almost impossible at this time and at this distance to judge their real meaning, their real danger or their real threat. No one can tell today what Hitler proposes to do or what he will be able to do. It would certainly be the part of folly not to assume the worst, not to take every step to guard against whatever may impend. This is not fear nor hysteria but the brave caution of an intelligent people. Many people in many places underestimate the degree of danger which this country may face at a not too distant future time. No one can say what it is, how great it is, or how imminent it is. Today is the time to create full protection against that danger. The destiny of our Nation has been won because—with all our faults, with all our comings and goings, with all our ups and downs—because at the critical junctures of our history we have been able to unite and meet the state of affairs resolutely and adequately. I am sure we will be able to do that now as in the past. But it seems to me to be the duty to point out on this solemn occasion that we must not risk in even the slightest degree the blessings which the heroes whom we honor today have given us. We must remember them and what they did and what they died for.

"Lord God of Hosts be with us yet,
Lest we forget, lest we forget."

Do You Think?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. BERNARD J. GEHRMANN

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. BERNARD J. GEHRMANN, OF WISCONSIN

Mr. GEHRMANN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address, which I am making over the radio this evening:

Good evening. My remarks tonight are not directed to those who are inaccessible to truth or thought. Nothing can be gained by counseling with a closed mind. Action cannot be expected of the inert, who fail to take an interest in progress and exercise their right of controlling the destinies of their government.

It is notoriously shameful that, while most of the world is engaged in a brutal and exhaustive war to save freedom and representative government, we are forced to plead for interest and action in crucial domestic affairs.

I must borrow the statement of Charles Steinmetz, who said, "Cooperation is not sentiment; it is economic necessity." In building the long-delayed seaway—we have the economic necessity—we must have the cooperation. Simply, this means that every wide-awake American has a task to do. Your job is to immediately advise your Senator and Representative of your sentiments for the waterway. If you build support behind him, he cannot fail.

A few days ago I addressed you over a Nation-wide hook-up and pointed out the revelations of history showing how the selfish little people had impeded progress. Tonight I want to weigh with you the arguments they have solemnly pronounced in their efforts to keep national development at a minimum.

In war time it is easy to confound an issue and complicate thinking. For example, the opposition has viewed with alarm the vulnerability of the locks of the waterway. In the event of an attack, do you think that this area would be any more prone to attack than the terminal yards and sidings of the railroad systems in New York, in Cleveland, Buffalo, Milwaukee, Chicago, and other great transportation centers? Do you believe for one minute that the locks on the St. Lawrence seaway would be less safe from attack than those on the Panama Canal? It is certain they will be more safe than the loading wharves of the great cities on the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts.

The vulnerable spots of the seaway will be located far inland and our defense would have to be completely paralyzed if an attacking force were able to carry their depredations this far into the continent.

We all know that it is more difficult to destroy a water transportation system than one on land because of decentralization. To bring water-borne shipping to a standstill, an enemy would have to completely demolish all the docks, all the harbors, and all the ships. To end trucking and the railroads, they would need only to severely damage our trunk highways, railways, and terminals. Without tracks and highways, trains and trucks are of no use.

The nearsighted opponents of the waterway must admit that they have been caught in the mesh of their own superficial thinking. To pursue this idea further—if an aerial attack could demoralize one transportation system, such as the railroads—then the crying and obvious need for a collateral water route is apparent to everyone. In order to protect ourselves from all future contingencies, we should start the project immediately so that we might have another well-developed transportation facility. But a question to my listeners—Do you think, my friends, that this type is reasoning advanced by the selfish and sectional interests is honest or sincere—that this is the kind of representation you deserve?

It is argued with force and vehemence, but with an equal amount of insincerity, that shipping will be seasonable and that the benefits of the seaway will be questionable.

Let us examine these statements in the cold light of common sense and good reason. For the sake of argument, we can admit that traffic will be suspended for a short period of time. The pertinent questions, however, are, When will the greatest need be felt, and can we enjoy the timely benefits of the facilities?

The answer is emphatically in the affirmative. When agricultural development is at its peak in early harvest time, we can fill the steamer holds with grain and other agricultural products from the farms in the Dakotas, Nebraska, Kansas, Iowa, Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, Montana, Minnesota, Michigan, and Wisconsin.

When the demand for industrial goods is the highest, we in the Middle West can get our farm machinery, our industrial goods, our gadgets, and our commercial and pleasure cars from the factories of eastern and central United States.

The completion of the seaway will encourage the building of a new type of lake boat that will be available for coastwise service. During the ice-bound period on the Great Lakes, the ships can be utilized and operated from ocean ports, thus guaranteeing the Great Lakes sailor year-around employment where before it was seasonal. To continue to construct the old type of lake carriers, which are not suitable for other uses, is merely another case of our economic shortsightedness.

To return to the question of national defense and the part to be played by the seaway. The opposing interests doth protest too much that the project has no relationship to our defense program. I suspicion that their repetitious declarations are efforts to reassure themselves.

We need ships—desperately. In the Great Lakes areas much of our construction facilities are begging for an opportunity—for use and development. All this while the yards on the seacoasts are packed with orders—deliveries are scheduled years ahead. With the completion of the waterway we can build larger merchant and navy craft for delivery to coastal bases. Our skilled unemployed can find jobs where they have built their homes. There will be no migration of workers with its attendant serious problems.

A recent survey shows that there are 3,000 skilled shipbuilders located in and near the Head of the Lakes who are ready to respond at a moment's notice to the call—to help build ships.

To expand facilities for the production of much-needed aluminum, we not only need plants, but we must have greatly increased sources of low-cost electric power. The power project on the St. Lawrence will supply millions of kilowatts of energy so critically needed. To the people of New York and surrounding States, this will mean that you have resources for new industries and to expand the old.

At the head of the Lakes lie our great iron mines. We must have additional marine facilities to carry the mass tonnage of ore for expanded industrial and war production needs.

The farseeing—allseeing—opposition to the seaway has ordained that this world crisis will soon pass—that the project cannot be completed in time to be of use in the defense program. I prefer to accept the opinion of the President and the Army and Navy staffs. It is generally conceded now that, with the latest developments in the war picture, the conflict will be of great length Do you think that when peace has been declared after this period of slaughter that it will mean the cessation of our defense efforts? The seaway will be needed in time ahead.

From a commercial standpoint, the project has long been needed and will long be used. It will take years for us to build up our merchant marine; much time in the future will be given to maintaining and expanding our Navy. We can take a lesson from Herbert Spencer, who said, and I quote. "The wise man will remember that while he is a descendant of the past, he is a parent of the future." I say to you tonight, look ahead, America.

We are proposing to spend hundreds of millions of dollars for roads over which to transport troops and war materials. For some years in the immediate future we will maintain an Army of several million men. Why is it not logical to use our natural waterways for the transportation of materials while the highways and railroads are choked with troop movements.

To the men and women on the farm, in small businesses or large, to those in labor's ranks, let us briefly see how this affects your pocketbook. Time will not allow many examples—I propose to use one which affects all. I would like to show you what happens to a cargo of wheat from which we get our daily bread.

In shipping a typical cargo of 275,000 bushels of wheat to New York City from the breadbasket of the Nation it costs $13,750 to ship it to Buffalo or Port Colburn where it must be elevated at a cost of $2,750. It is then loaded out and, since we are taking the cheapest route, we will send the grain from Buffalo to New York by barge on the Erie Canal. It will cost another $13,750 to get it to our harbor there and then we must pay a lighterage charge of 1 cent per bushel, or $2,570. This makes a grand total of $33,000 which does not include inspection fees and weighing fees in the Buffalo elevators, insurance costs, loss from handling, or demurrage or storage

What does this mean? That the farmer of the Middle West might have a large share of this as his profit—if he had this, he could spend more with his local merchant and buy more goods from the manufacturers. It means that the workingman in the East would pay less for his bread and get more for his work because the farmer could purchase what he makes. That, my friends, is just plain, ordinary, everyday economics.

But, since we are looking at the dollar sign, what about the project itself? The power portion of the project, representing some $93,700,000 is to be self-liquidating and will be administered by the New York Power Authority. This is approximately one-third of the entire construction cost.

One of the most specious of all the arguments is the one pointing to the need of men and machinery for defense work and exclaiming, with more vigor than veracity, that we cannot spare them to work on the waterway. What nonsense! Pause to look at the figure compiled by the Federal Security Administration and see the huge numbers still on relief and W. P. A. rolls. Not only have we the manpower, but we have an overabundance of construction machinery to use.

Figures compiled by the American Federation of Labor disclose that we have 6,500,000 still unemployed. The largest share of this group live in the areas bordering the Great Lakes. It is the character of unskilled labor that will be used to construct the seaway that would not be absorbed for national-defense requirements.

Census figures show that in the last brief decade 6 of the great grain States have lost 290,000 inhabitants. This loss cannot totally be ascribed to the drought nor to the depression. The indisputable facts remain that the tillers of the soil left their farmsteads because of lack of profit due to the high cost of transportation and their inability to get farm products to market. During the depression it cost twice as much to ship wheat from Salina, Kans., to Chicago than it could be sold for. North and South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, and Oklahoma have lost their people year after year because of the crushing consequence of the transportation rate structure levied against the interior of the country. Removal of the bottleneck from the St. Lawrence would not only restore the lost population but give them the added producers they are entitled to. A chain is as strong as its weakest link—a nation as its weakest state. Let us tear out the barriers to dynamic national development.

In Europe all of the countries are traversed by extensive canal systems—without which their economies would fail. All of the heavy traffic of the continent goes by ship and barge, the fast traffic by rail. In our planning for the years ahead I believe that it will be necessary for us to develop other water routes in the interior of the country. But, first things, first. The seaway takes precedence because of its importance to national defense. After the war years—when we are building new wealth in consumer goods—we can and must develop our other trade lanes. This Nation can be as great and as powerful as the limits of our imagination, ingenuity, and ambition. Julius Barnes remarked in hearings on the seaway, "Anyone who has ever prophesied against this country's growth and expansion and American industry, has been discredited by following events."

Let me again urge you to assume your share of the responsibility in our efforts to build the seaway. Wire, write, or phone your Senators and your Congressmen. Remember, the time is now.

I would hate to have my suspicions confirmed that much of the opposition to the seaway is motivated by partisanship rather than by national economic considerations. What difference does it make whether the seaway is built during a Republican or a Democratic administration? This project is too great to play peanut politics with. I think we should put the elephant and donkey aside for the moment and raise the Stars and Stripes. If the glory must be shared, let us remember that Presidents of both parties have been greatly in favor of the route to our inland seas.

Good night.

Economy and Efficiency Essential to the Nation's Safety

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. E. COX

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 27, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. E. E. COX, OF GEORGIA

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address, which I delivered yesterday over the radio:

Fellow citizens, I welcome this opportunity to warn my fellow Americans of present grave dangers.

Our form of government, our economic institutions, our system of free enterprise, and our social structure are under attack; they are losing ground. Those who insist upon changing our governmental, economic, and social institutions are in full march; their potential victory is nearer than our people realize.

We are threatened with loss of the fruits of hundreds of years of toil and sacrifice. We appear to be abandoning the gains, as well as the ideals, of our courageous ancestors who by their blood and sacrifice created this great, rich, free Nation which they bequeathed in trust to us.

Our government of laws is being supplanted by a government by men. Our long-established and well-proved principles of Americanism are being driven back before the onslaught of socialism and communism. Our principles of local self-government are being eaten away by the dreadful canker of centralization.

At this hour we find ourselves irrevocably committed to war. That this would be our fate we have known—many of us—for nearly a year. That it is a fate we could not avoid with either safety or honor I accept as a fact. But I am gravely disturbed by the divided or dual program that has been adopted—a dual effort of carrying out an unprecedented program of national defense, coupled with a program of changing an entire social order. To the demand for complete defense there has been attached a condition that there must be no pause in the reforming of America. The dangerous policy is being followed of dividing the command between the trained soldiers and the theoretical reformers.

In the conflict between these forces the attention of our people is being diverted from the toil and sacrifice they must make if we are to win in the war at arms and in the economic struggle which now faces us. The attention of our people has even been diverted from the very problem of financing the defense and our preparation for whatever struggle may lie in store for us in the war. That taxes should be increased is an idea accepted by all; but that the results of increased taxation should flow into the hands of unscrupulous racketeers or be used in a determined effort to subversively change our system of government is beyond any justification.

We are told now that we are headed toward a $90,000,000,000 Federal debt. We are also told by another administration authority that we may be certain we shall be compelled to spend at least $40,000,000,000 annually until the war ends. Our Federal debt may go to $90,000,000,000, it may go to $150,000,000,000; no man in or out of government knows what the ultimate debt will be.

In spite of this alarming prospect, our Government has made no appreciable reduction in expenditures for nondefense activities. What does such a financial course mean? It can mean only that the present solvency of our Government cannot long endure. It can mean only ultimate national bankruptcy, and, as a consequence, collectivism in its most abhorrent form.

Those who are determined to change our form of government have swarmed into the offices of the Government to bore from within like so many termites, and to undermine the foundations of our American institutions. They find the opportunity and take the means of despoiling the people of their liberty. They conjure up alleged gifts for the people, but they offer gifts of which the people should beware. They take all from the pockets of the people and give back some under the guise of governmental largesse. They pollute the channels of public information with destructive alienism. They are masters of subversive propaganda. They control, in large part, the methods and the means of an organized and powerful propaganda. These subversive elements, working within the protection of the Government, hidden away in Federal offices as they are, are getting in their deadly work of undermining home rule and local self-government by promises of Federal aid. That Federal aid is always conditioned upon a surreptitious Federal control. The alleged gifts of bread proffered by these political buccaneers are always accompanied by handcuffs and leg irons for the liberties of the people. Such gifts of bread, the price of which is liberty, turn to bitterness in the mouths of free men and women.

For some time the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives has been considering new rates of Federal taxation, the heaviest in our history. If these rates become law we still will be approximately $10,000,000,000 short of the estimated 1942 expenditures.

Every taxpayer in the Nation will be compelled to make sacrifices now unthought of to meet the expense of an impregnable defense. Thousands of our people heretofore untaxed by the Federal Government because of their low rates of income will soon find themselves compelled to contribute to these new Federal taxes. The new levies will reach far down among the ranks of our citizens earning low incomes.

The fact that we are engaged in the building of a national defense, that we must make haste in building this national defense, is no shadow of excuse for wanton waste and inefficiency. On the contrary, it is a challenge to the leadership of this Nation and to the common sense of our people to see that the greatest efficiency and economy are practiced in the defense and nondefense expenditures. Our citizens must bend their backs, the sweat of their struggles must fall in the dust to pay for the waste and the inefficiency and the racketeering just as much as for the legitimate expenditures.

The bureaucrats proceed as though expenditures for nondefense purposes are as imperative as those for defense purposes. They have proceeded as though the public purse were the reservoir for a never-ending flood of money to be allowed to flow in every direction suggested by the whims of bureaucrats and theorists.

Those bent on reforming our institutions threaten to make our Nation of farm homes a nation of collectivised and industrialized agriculture, modeled upon the principle of a W. P. A. day of 6 hours, and of an industrialized relief wage far beyond the economic capacities of our farmers. We cannot safely close our eyes to the fact that millions of our farmers must still work by the "can-to-can't" system. They must sweat and toil from the earliest hour of dawn when they can see to work to the last hour of dusk when they can't see to work any longer. They must thus toil to pay the interest upon federalized mortgages. They reflect, do those farmers, the effects of a vast social scheme that penetrates even into the sanctity of our homes. Those theories, put into practice as they have been, constitute a noxious growth of administrative bureaucratic boards, commissions, and departments which has disturbed our entire national economy and which now threatens, under the opportunity of this war emergency, to engulf us in a system of collectivism that inevitably will overwhelm us unless we have the courage and the will to halt it.

There can be no retrenchment in our expenditures for defense, but there can be, and there must be, economy and efficiency in the building of that defense.

Were it not for the fact that today two great forces, each of which is opposed to our American way of government, our American way of life, and our American ideals, have become engaged in a struggle to determine the supremacy of the one or the other, we should be confronted with probable aggressions against ourselves.

For the moment fate has halted the threat of totalitarian and communistic aggression against America. This does not mean, however, that we may curtail our expenditures for national defense. It does not mean that we can for a moment halt the program upon which we are engaged. For us this struggle between these two alien forces constitutes only a brief respite of which we must make the most. When one or the other of these two brutal forces—communism or nazi-ism—shall have emerged victorious from their present struggle our respite will be ended. We will again face certain economic, if not military, struggle with the victorious power.

It is utterly vital to the welfare of this Nation, to the very security of our homes and our people, that we submerge every consideration, that we yield every theory to the one practical necessity of efficiently and economically constructing our national defense as quickly as possible.

The needs of our present program of national defense require a minute examination of every purpose, other than defense, for which a dollar must be spent.

It is gravely disquieting that within recent years the expenditures of our Federal Government have increased constantly. These increased expenditures, for other than defense purposes, reflect the increasing growth and expansion of the Federal Government in its invasion of those provinces once regarded as exclusively the field of local self-government. These vast expenditures for Federal relief have tended more than all else to disturb the normal national economy. They have tended to destroy the economic relationships which once existed between employer and employee, and have affected our manufacturing industry to the point of disruption, and now threaten to disrupt agriculture as well. Necessary relief can and must be carried on without it being transformed into an agency for political domination or made the vehicle by which those who would remake our governmental and our social institutions ride to their goal.

We must not, we dare not, forget that we must continue to live as a Nation and a people after the national defense is achieved, and after the wars have ended. Dangers so grave as to make all thoughtful men ponder will face us in the economic chaos which necessarily will follow the titanic struggle at arms now in progress. Every dollar that can be saved in governmental operations now in the non-defense activities will be a dollar less in a burden which in those days to come may prove well-nigh insupportable for our people.

We must be realistic. We must be sensible. Our Government must see to it that we do not go into bankruptcy or into inflation. The Congress and the people must see to it that in seeking to maintain and perpetuate liberty for others in the world, we do not lose our own liberty and become the victims of some form of abhorrent absolutism.

America must be on guard!

CITY COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF CHICAGO URGES ILLINOIS SENATORS AND CONGRESSMEN TO SUPPORT GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY PROJECT

Whereas an agreement has been signed by the Dominion of Canada and the United States of America in the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway project; and

Whereas the President of the United States has affirmed his support of this project as a necessary part of our national-defense program; and

Whereas the ratification of this project would make Chicago a world port and a shipping center of the Western Hemisphere; and

Whereas the completion of this project will expedite the transport of industrial and agricultural goods from the Middle West to all ports of the world; and

Whereas besides its transportation facilities, this project will make available a new source of electric power for our rapidly expanding national industry; and

Whereas a vast program of shipbuilding will be stimulated by the construction of this seaway; and

Whereas this program of shipbuilding will include not only the largest cargo vessels but also every type of naval vessels, with the exception of battleships and aircraft carriers, which are vital to national defense; and

Whereas not only Middle West industry but also the large agricultural population of the the Middle West will profit through the establishment of this project, which will provide a new outlet for farm commodities; and

Whereas a provision of this agreement allows the Sanitary District of Chicago to utilize all the water necessary for the performance of its municipal functions; and

Whereas Mayor Edward J. Kelly has signified his endorsement of this project as a stimulus to Chicago shipbuilding and transportation and a significant addition to our national-defense program: Now, therefore, be it

POEM BY KARL VASS

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker and fellow Members of Congress, I do not know Karl Vass, but do greatly like this song and poem he wrote. It is a good time to have this in the RECORD, too.

OUR COUNTRY, RIGHT OR WRONG

Between the broad Atlantic
And the wide Pacific shore,
Is a land of peace and freedom,
May it reign for evermore;
May our country ever be right,
May our legions ever be strong,
And may we ever be ready to fight,
For our country, right or wrong!

Our Navy is the finest
That has ever sailed the seas,
And it helps maintain Old Glory,
Proudly rippling in the breeze;
May our country ever be right,
May our Navy ever be strong;
And may we ever be ready to fight
For our country, right or wrong!

Our Army is the bravest
That a foe shall ever meet,
For it fights for peace and freedom,
And has never known defeat;
May our country ever be right,
May our Army ever be strong,
And may we ever be ready to fight
For our country, right or wrong!

Our airmen and marine boys
Are as gallant as a knight,
Eager each to serve his country,
Serve his country, wrong or right;
May our country ever be right,
May our legions ever be strong;
And may we ever be ready to fight
For our country, right or wrong!

The St. Lawrence Seaway and Its Effect on the Coal and Railroad Industries in Pennsylvania

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 27, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, Pennsylvania is one of the many States that is bound to feel the adverse effect of the proposed St. Lawrence seaway. For the information of my colleagues, there is herewith inserted a radio address delivered by me over the radio stations in my district. The address follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, because of Congressional duties it is necessary that I remain in Washington; hence I am using the facilities of this radio station to discuss a legislative measure that is vital to the welfare of every citizen in Pennsylvania. I refer to the proposed St. Lawrence seaway and power project.

Since June 16 the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives have been holding hearings on this controversial measure. I am frank to say that those favoring this seaway project have left no stone unturned in their frantic efforts to unearth some sound reason for this proposed project. Instead of logical and sane reasoning, the most weird arguments have been advanced in support of their claims.

We who live in Pennsylvania must depend upon the coal and rail industries for our daily bread, hence we are quick to recognize that the St. Lawrence project is the return of an old political pet idea defeated by the United States Senate in 1934, and now stands before us garbed in its new regalia—the armor of national defense.

The St. Lawrence seaway is not a new idea. Since the turn of the century it has raised its head many times only to be subdued by calm deliberation and sound reasoning. On March 19, 1941, after 5 years of negotiations, President Roosevelt authorized the signing of a treaty with Canada for the construction of a Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway and the development of the hydroelectric resources of the international-rapids section of the St. Lawrence River.

We are told that the St. Lawrence project, which cannot possibly be completed and in operation before 1947, 6 years hence, is a necessary adjunct to our defense of the Western Hemisphere.

In the same breath industries within the Great Lakes region are promised cheap power; Great Lakes shipbuilding yards are promised huge contracts to build oceangoing vessels; inland cities such as Duluth, Chicago, Cleveland, and Detroit are to become great inland ports; and the midwestern farmer is offered cheap transportation rates for his products.

The treaty contemplates that the project be divided in two parts, one for the construction of dams on the St. Lawrence River to be used in the development of new sources of cheap hydroelectric power subsidized by the Government, and the other for the construction of a 27-foot channel from Montreal to the head of the Great Lakes, a distance of 1,200 miles, 90 percent of which is wholly within the Dominion of Canada, and at an eventual cost of $1,200,000,000.

The average American is being led to believe that the St. Lawrence project is being wholeheartedly accepted by not only this Nation but likewise by our Canadian neighbors. On the contrary, it is common knowledge that not only high Government officials in Canada but the people in general have opposed this project for years as being economically unsound. It is significant that Canadian labor organizations are loud in their protest, because this project will destroy thousands of jobs.

We can well appreciate the position the Canadian people have been forced to take on the St. Lawrence project. Were it not for the American program of aid to Great Britain our Canadian neighbors would be as militant in their opposition as millions of Americans who recognize this project as a destructive influence because of its devastating effect on the economic stability of both nations.

It is not difficult for us to agree with our Canadian neighbors that the proposed St. Lawrence project is of little value and cannot be justified at a national-defense measure. Since we as a Nation are building our own defenses and engaged in a superhuman effort to aid Great Britain, the digging of an international ditch and putting the Government of the United States in the power business on a larger scale at a cost of over one billion dollars, is not only ridiculous when Great Britain needs ships and implements of war, but it is likewise an undreamed of folly.

It has been repeatedly pointed out that this St. Lawrence project will require at least a period of 7 years before it can be placed in operation. During the construction of the locks, dams, and generating plants and after completion, the entire project, both from a power and seaway standpoint, will prove an easy target for enemy bombers or "fifth columnists." Even the ships using the seaway would be open to attack from the air.

Little has been said of the gigantic task facing the United States in defending the St. Lawrence seaway and power project. Military experts predict that it will cost over a billion dollars to erect and maintain suitable defenses, since the St. Lawrence seaway from the mouth of the St. Lawrence River to Duluth, Minn., at the head of the Great Lakes will require military posts at strategic points.

Keeping in mind that this so-called national-defense project will require at the utmost 7 years of intensive effort to insure completion, let us consider the argument that our defense industries are in immediate need of additional electric power.

If we are in immediate need of electric power why not expand existing water and steam generating plants both on the American and Canadian side of the Niagara River, which can be accomplished within a 2-year period to enable generating millions of kilowatt-hours of electricity? Why not come into the heart of the Pennsylvania coal fields and construct steam-generating plants that can be completed and in operation within a period of 2 years and at one-third the cost of hydroelectric plants. The construction of these steam-generating plants will make possible millions of kilowatt-hours of electricity and at the same time would give employment to thousands of coal miners and railroaders in the great Keystone State.

To further prove that the St. Lawrence seaway as a national-defense project is a myth, let me call your attention to the fact that this seaway, which is intended to provide a 27-foot channel from the head of the St. Lawrence River to the head of the Great Lakes, will be closed to navigation for 5 months of each year, since the St. Lawrence River is icebound and the surfaces of the Great Lakes are solidly frozen.

This seaway will cost the American taxpayers millions of dollars, deprive thousands of railroaders and coal miners of employment, and will be open for navigation only 7 months of each year.

As previously mentioned industries within the Great Lakes region are promised cheap power; Great Lakes shipbuilding yards are promised huge contracts to build ocean-going vessels; inland cities such as Duluth, Chicago, Cleveland, and Detroit, are to become great inland ports; and the midwestern farmer is being lulled into silence by glittering promises of the rich harvest he will reap in cheap transportation rates.

Were these fanciful dreams to come true, the nonbenefiting citizens of our country will pay 85 percent of the cost of this project which I have already stated will be in excess of $1,000,000,000 dollars. In addition, the annual maintenance cost will be $15,000,000 on the seaway alone, which will mean that every ton of freight carried on the seaway will be subsidized by the taxpayers of America at a cost of $2.50 per ton.

Ladies and gentlemen, do you realize that the vast majority of American citizens own life insurance policies and that from a recent report it is revealed that one-fourth of the assets of American insurance companies are invested in American railroad securities and other utilities; and as a result the St. Lawrence seaway will affect every life insurance policyholder in the United States?

Yes; there is much idle talk about these so-called benefits from this St. Lawrence project. Yet on the other hand, there is a strange silence by those testifying at the congressional hearings in regard to the thousands of American citizens who will be driven to the relief rolls of the Nation by the destruction of their jobs.

Let me give you a few facts and figures showing the effect of this St. Lawrence project on our great State of Pennsylvania. No State in the Nation has more at stake in the rise and fall of employment in the coal and railroad industries, the distribution of pay rolls, the payment of taxes and the purchase of mining and railway materials and supplies. As these earnings in Pennsylvania fluctuate, the economic balance of the Nation swings to and fro.

Practically every State is a purchaser of Pennsylvania products. The railroads spent close to $173,000,000 in Pennsylvania in 1940 for fuel, materials, and supplies and approximately $41,000,000 within the State for new equipment. The vast army of railway employees in Pennsylvania numbering 118,718 in 1940 exceeded any other State. In wages, these employees received close to $218,000,000, while at the same time the railroads paid approximately $15,000,000 in taxes in the State of Pennsylvania.

It is interesting to note that the total production in Pennsylvania of bituminous coal in 1940 amounted to approximately 113,000,000 tons, employing on an average of 118,000 wage earners with an annual pay roll of approximately $138,000,000.

The total production of Pennsylvania anthracite coal in 1940 was approximately 52,000,000 tons with approximately 92,000 wage earners receiving a pay roll of $78,000,000. The bituminous and anthracite coal industries in Pennsylvania pay an annual tax of $23,000,000. Ladies and gentlemen, these facts and figures speak for themselves. Frankly, if this St. Lawrence project is completed it will vitally affect our two basic industries—coal and railroads—with pay rolls running into millions of dollars and employing thousands of good Americans.

Let us consider the effect of the St. Lawrence project on the coal industry and its thousands of employees. The hydropower part of the St. Lawrence project will destroy the Canadian market for American coal that has in the past used from ten to eighteen millions of tons of coal annually, the majority of which was mined in Pennsylvania. In addition to the loss of the Canadian market, foreign tramp steamers will bring to the United States and deposit at Great Lake ports cheaply mined foreign coal which will displace the use of our American-mined coal.

The electricity generated by the hydroelectric power part of the St. Lawrence project will further displace the use of American-mined coal. The St. Lawrence project as a whole will mean the loss of 35,000,000 tons of American-mined coal annually.

Let us turn our attention to the plight of the American railroads and the thousands of railway workers in the event the seaway part of the St. Lawrence project is completed.

During the 7-month period when the Lakes are not frozen over and transportation impossible, dirty, foreign tramp steamers, manned by foreign crews and paid a scale of wages far below the standard of American shipping, will carry their cargoes to inland ports instead of discharging them at Atlantic coast ports of Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, as is the present custom. Thus millions of tons of freight will be diverted from the American transportation systems. Every thousand tons of freight diverted from the American railroads means one less freight train; and every railroader knows that fewer trains mean fewer jobs. Then, too, it is a fundamental truth that when business is flourishing on the railroads the coal miners are steadily employed.

Ladies and gentlemen, this St. Lawrence project is nothing more than an attempt to saddle the American taxpayers with added burdens through the unnecessary expenditure of public funds. Yes, it is a direct challenge to every American citizen and especially we who reside in Pennsylvania.

In the name of thousands of fellow Pennsylvanians whose jobs are destined to be abolished as the result of the St. Lawrence project, I ask you to join with me and other Members of Congress from Pennsylvania who are opposing the sabotage of jobs that will result from this St. Lawrence project.

Your assistance is needed and you can best serve your country and your neighbor by writing your United States Senators asking them to oppose the St. Lawrence seaway project. In addition, you should urge your relatives and friends in other States to write their own Representatives in Congress protesting this attempt to saddle the American people with unnecessary taxes and, at the same time, to destroy two basic industries of the great Keystone State. Every loyal Pennsylvanian should meet this challenge to the welfare of our State by enlisting in this campaign to defeat the proposed St. Lawrence project.

EDITORIAL FROM THE ALTOONA (PA.) MIRROR

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, newspaper editorials play an important part in molding public opinion on matters of national interest.

Since Hitler declared war on Soviet Russia volumes have been written in an effort to explain the unusual situation whereby "Hit," "Muss," and "Joe" came to the parting of the ways.

However, it did not take volumes for Harry Johnston, editor of the Mirror, Altoona, Pa., to make a fitting and telling observation on the turn of events in the Old World in the issue of the Altoona Mirror for June 26, 1941. Recognized as a journalist of no mean ability, Editor Johnston "hit the nail on the head" proverbial fashion with the following timely editorial to which he gave an apt title. The article follows:

[From the Altoona (Pa.) Mirror of June 26, 1941]

THIEVES FALL OUT

Josef Stalin, whose American representatives only last week were attempting to disrupt the American national-defense effort because Comrade Joe and Dear Adolf were pals, is today put to the embarrassing necessity of countermanding orders to United States reds to sabotage our industry, for the tender ties of affection that Joe felt for Adolf are no more.

There is nothing strange in this. We can find a parallel in fairly recent United States history. Gangsters who ruled our greatest cities during the mad twenties on a totalitarian scale. Occasionally it became necessary for an Al Capone or a Legs Diamond or a Dutch Schultz to form a temporary alliance with a neighboring gangster so that they together might operate against a third.

But the moment the third rival was liquidated the first gangster never hesitated to rub out the second.

Until Hitler's pact with Stalin in 1939, the American communists pretended to be "good democrats," and cooperated with the free nations of the world. Overnight, Moscow ordered a right-about face and Communists cooperated vigorously with their erstwhile enemies, the Nazis. Now the shoe is on the other foot and the pinkos in this Nation cannot be blamed for a slight attack of bewilderment.

Russia was Napoleon's downfall; it may well be Hitler's.

EDITORIAL FROM THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS

Mr. MACIEJEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Chicago Daily News of June 16, 1941:

[From the Chicago Daily News of June 16, 1941]

KELLY FOR THE SEAWAY

Mayor Edward J. Kelly's forthright support of the St. Lawrence seaway puts an end to an anomalous political line-up that has made Chicago ridiculous. To have the economic capital of the Great Lakes Basin apparently opposed to the canal has been a terrific handicap in Congress to the seaway cause.

Representatives and Senators from the East, far West, and South could not help but be perplexed to find that former Mayor Hoan, of Milwaukee, had led the fight, while the greatest city on all the inland seas either sulked in its tent or actually tried to cut its own economic throat.

We congratulate Mayor Kelly on his frank avowal. We do not recall that he ever did publicly make a statement opposed to the seaway. After 8 years' service in the mayor's chair, it would be very difficult indeed for any man of sense to oppose what is so patently a primary interest of the city. Kelly's engineering career and his connection with the existing canal and drainage systems of the Chicago region were other factors that made his present stand inevitable. We hope and believe that the mayor's statement will not only have a good effect in Congress but will abate the sniping at the seaway project that has so long come from the sanitary board and its political affiliates.

Governor Green should now come to the aid of the State, the city, and the seaway. Illinois is a lake State. Its metropolis is a lake city. Illinois needs the seaway.

The Calamity Howlers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE CANNON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 27, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE MISSOURI FARMER

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I am including a timely and pertinent editorial from the current issue of the Missouri Farmer, the official organ of the Missouri Farmers' Association.

The Association has long been recognized as the largest and most successful farm cooperative in the Nation. It owns and maintains elevators, exchanges, processing plants and commission agencies, which in the last 25 years have brought its members millions of dollars in dividends, savings on purchases and profits on sales, including $2,000,000 saved in commissions in the handling of livestock alone.

The editorial is from the trenchant pen of F. V. Heinkel, President of the Missouri Farmers' Association and one of the outstanding farm leaders of the day. President Heinkel has long been associated with the cooperative farm movement, is versed in agricultural economics and is unusually well qualified to speak on farm problems and farm legislation. His statement should have a wide audience:

[From the Missouri Farmer]

THE CALAMITY HOWLERS

The daily press of the country is squalling "bloody murder" over the action of Congress in making loans available to farmers at 85 percent of parity. Raymond Clapper, the columnist, termed it "the farm grab." Even the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, noted in times gone by for its fairness to all, denounced the measure, branding it "this philosophy of 'getting something for homefolks.'"

Just when this matter was under consideration by Congress, the United States Department of Agriculture, which agency of the Government is supposedly looking out for the farmer's interests, aided and abetted the calamity howlers by pointing out to the press that this measure means an increase of 20 percent in food prices to consumers. This is both an indefensible and unpardonable act which the farmers of this country will long remember.

The fear is expressed that this support of farm prices will become the basis of a general spiraling of prices. That there is danger of inflation is generally recognized. But in God's name, should the farmers of this Nation—the people who furnish so many soldiers, and food for the the entire Nation and part of Great Britain as well—be called upon to make greater sacrifices than any other class of people? At a time when the prices of things they must buy are rising, can farmers be expected to meekly submit to an economic crucifixion?

Can it be that the daily press of this country, which presumably reflects the sentiment of city people, expects agriculture to go on forever feeding the Nation at less than cost of production? Is their contention the outgrowth of mere ignorance or is it pure selfishness?

The danger of a spiraling price structure is very real. But high food prices will not be one of its causes. The wheat surplus is the largest ever known; the carry-over of corn into the next crop will set a new high record; there is so much cotton on hand that the planners in Washington wonder what ever will become of it; livestock numbers are huge. Indeed, the capacity of American farmers to produce food is unlimited; we can feed this Nation and half of Europe, and there'll be plenty for all.

Farmers have held the bag all down through the ages, and especially has this been true during wartime, our experience during World War No. 1 being particularly fresh in our minds. And now that some patriotic men in Congress have taken a few steps to forestall some of the calamities that befell agriculture during the last war, and subsequently the whole Nation as a result, there are those in our cities who point to them with scorn. They would have the farmers of this country bear the whole brunt of prosecuting the war in Europe by producing food at less than cost of production.

Industry has been careful to safeguard its profits. We remember that the big airplane manufacturers, to use one example, producing war materials most urgently in demand, held out for bigger profits before they would speed up production. Uncle Sam has been called upon to build plants for many private owners. Organized labor has been quick to demand increases in pay on the grounds that living costs have mounted and that they should share in the increased profits of industry.

All of these measures may or may not have been justified, but let's concede that they have been. Aren't farmers entitled to the same consideration? Shouldn't sauce for the goose be also sauce for the gander?

Back in 1920 farmers were getting 53 cents out of every dollar consumers handed out for food. Even then farmers were getting skinned, a fact which has been freely admitted by Congress; we cite its various farm legislation as evidence. But last year farmers were receiving only 42 cents of the consumer's dollar, while nearly half of the farmers in America have lost their farms.

Everybody should be ready to do his part in protecting cur country. But we might as well be practical about it. We contend that everybody should bear his share of the cost of national defense.

We do not admit that Government loans at 85 percent of parity will at last solve the farm problem. On the contrary, the very figure itself is an admission that farmers are not to receive their just share of the national income. The fact that loans are to be used as a price prop is an indication of weakness. But we must make allowances for what Congress is confronted with—many a Congressman and Senator would gladly have gone the whole way for agriculture, but strong opposition forced a compromise. We shall be grateful for even this much help when general price fixing starts, as seems inevitable. (F. V. Heinkel, president, Missouri Farmers' Association.)

The Significance of Flag Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM W. BLACKNEY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 27, 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. WILLIAM W. BLACKNEY, OF MICHIGAN

Mr. BLACKNEY. Mr. Speaker, with the approach of Flag Day on June 14, the mayor of the city of Flint, Hon. Osmund Kelly, issued a proclamation decreeing a civic celebration of Flag Day to be held on June 14, and requested that the Flint Lodge of Elks, B. P. O. E., No. 222, conduct their Flag Day ceremonial as a part of the civic observance of the day. The Elks gladly accepted this invitation and through their exalted ruler, A. C. Lyon, and their secretary, Irvin L. Young, immediately started preparations therefor. Fay B. Murphy and Clifton L. Howard were appointed as cochairmen of the arrangements, and in conjunction with City Commissioner Lawrence H. Griffin greatly contributed to the success of Flag Day by their efficient services.

It was my privilege to be selected as speaker at that occasion. Naturally, I greatly appreciated the honor because, as a member of the Elks, I know full well the patriotic foundation of that fine order and the zeal and patriotism it had displayed toward the flag and what the flag represents.

The Elks had been very diligent in preparing for this event and, through the Boy Scouts, distributed throughout the city of Flint more than 40,000 flags to be displayed on Flag Day. Under the auspices of the B. P. O. E., the American Legion, and other patriotic organizations, supplemented by several fine bands and drum corps, a parade was formed through the principal streets of the city of Flint, with more than 1,000 patriotic citizens in line.

I certainly was proud of my home city of Flint for the patriotism manifested on that occasion. Thousands of people lined the streets of the city during the parade and several thousands attended the Flag Day exercises at Atwood Stadium. The Elks' Flag Day ceremonial was conducted in a splendid manner by the exalted ruler, A. C. Lyon; the American Legion and other patriotic organizations also taking part in this tribute to the American flag.

The spontaneous and patriotic enthusiasm which everywhere greeted the flag convinced me that the great rank and file of the American people are loyal and patriotic and believe in everything that the flag typifies and represents. The thriving city of Flint is but a cross-section of this great country of ours and its loyalty and patriotism is representative of the loyalty and patriotism of our people throughout the entire United States.

My address, in part, was as follows:

June 14 was Flag Day, proclaimed by the President of the United States, by the Governors of the 48 States, and by heads of municipalities throughout our great country. It is the final day of a week set apart to reaffirm our faith in the ideals for which the American flag stands and our loyalty to the Nation over which it has flown, for a century and a half.

Born of a right to self-rule, after years of oppression by a tyrant king, the Stars and Stripes are the history of a struggle by a determined people to be independent and free.

The Stars and Stripes symbolize 8 years of struggle and sacrifice to form a union of States. Each star is the history of a sovereign State. Their setting on a blue field signals to mankind that here is a Nation, dedicated to personal freedom and religious rights, a sanctuary to oppressed men and women, the world over, where they might have life and liberty and where they may pursue happiness.

The red stripes represent human sacrifice and the blood spilled by our Nation's heroes in winning the freedom which is ours; the white ones, the purity of purpose of a greater, nobler and holier America. In the whole is cryastallized all the hopes and fears of a nation, established in the righteous principle of freedom of speech, freedom of assembly and freedom of worship.

During the years of trouble with England, all sorts of queer flags had been designed as standards for the colonies, first by one colony and then by another, each, however, having a distinctive pattern and design all its own.

But of all the flags and symbols since the world began, there is none other so full of meaning as the flag of our country. That piece of red, white and blue bunting, represents 5,000 years of struggle upward; it is the full-grown flower of ages of fighting for liberty; it is the century plant of human hope in bloom.

General Washington, George Ross, the uncle of Betsy Ross, and Robert Morris constituted a committee of three to prepare a suitable design for the new American flag. After some study they submitted their design to Betsy Ross, a widow then, 24 years of age, living in Philadelphia, conducting the upholstery business which her husband had previously run.

Betsy Ross, an expert seamstress, then drew a draft of the flag with 13 red and white stripes and 5 pointed white stars in a field of blue, which the committee accepted. They submitted the flag to Congress, but this flag was not approved until many designs were studied and discussed by the Members of the Colonial Congress.

Finally Congress, on June 14, 1777, adopted for the Nation the flag designed by Washington, Morris, and Ross, and made by Betsy Ross. The language of the congressional resolution was as follows: "Resolved that the flag of the 13 United States be 13 stripes, alternate red and white; that the union be 13 stars, white in a field of blue, representing a new constellation."

In 1794, with the admission of two new States into the Union—Vermont and Kentucky—two additional stars and two additional stripes were added.

The flag flying over Fort McHenry on September 13 and 14, 1814, when Francis Scott Key wrote the Star-Spangled Banner, had 15 stripes and 15 stars.

It was my privilege a week ago to visit the old historic Fort McHenry at Baltimore. As I wandered over that old battleground it seemed to me that a panorama of my country's history came before me. I could vision Francis Scott Key, confined as a prisoner on one of the boats in the English Fleet, waiting patiently during the 25 hours of bombardment, wondering whether at the beginning of dawn the American flag would be flying; and I could feel the thrill that must have come to him, when, with the first appearance of dawn, he found the flag still there; then he put his whole heart and patriotic soul into the burning words of the Star-Spangled Banner, now our national anthem.

As the Nation grew in size, it became impossible to add one new stripe and also one new star for each State and still preserve the symmetry of the flag. So Congress, in 1818, passed an act providing that the flag should be composed of 13 stripes, representing the original 13 States, and that new stars should be added on the July 4 following the admission of additional States. Therefore, in the flag today the 13 stripes signify the Thirteen Original Colonies and the 48 stars signify the 48 States of the Union.

I want to call your attention, particularly on this day, to the significance of the American flag. Our flag is emblematic of the sovereignty of our Nation.

It represents the ideals, aspirations, and history of our people and engenders a feeling of patriotism and respect.

It flies perpetually over the Nation's Capitol as a sign of national perpetuity.

It flies over the schoolhouses of our Nation signifying the Nation's endorsement of education and the Nation's protection.

It flies over the capitols of all our States and over our courthouses, signifying the administration of justice.

It is the symbol of every right enjoyed by the American people.

It represents the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States.

It reflects the wealth and grandeur and patriotism of this great land of opportunity.

It signifies the law of the land.

It stands for peace and good will among the nations of the world.

It believes in tolerance.

It is the badge of the Nation's greatness and the emblem of its destiny.

At a time like this, when European monarchies, kingdoms, and republics are constantly changing or crumbling, our American flag has a greater dignity, a greater significance, a greater purpose than ever before.

Let me call your attention to this paradoxical statement; that the United States is today the youngest of the great nations on earth, and at the same time it is the oldest continuing Government on earth. Our Constitution and our flag for more than 150 years have remained intact, and the principles that they guarded more than 150 years ago they are still guarding with greater patriotism than ever before. So our flag today represents, in these critical times, our standard of national defense.

I am glad to tell you today that the United States Navy is the most efficient, the most powerful, and the most capable navy in the world. As of January 1, 1941, the United States has 323 combatant ships, consisting of 15 battleships, 6 airplane carriers, 18 heavy cruisers, 19 light cruisers, 85 new destroyers, 78 old destroyers, 37 new submarines, 68 old submarines; in addition to these we have 173 auxiliary vessels, making a grand total of 496 major vessels with many others of every type in process of construction.

The Army now consists of 1,418,000 men. Up till now, the Army has not been fully equipped, but at the present time rifles and machine guns are being manufactured in great quantities. The Army is still, however, short of ammunition and sadly lacking in tanks and all sorts of artillery; there is little antiaircraft and no antitank equipment worth mentioning, but our production is being speeded up at the present time, and with the patriotic wave sweeping over this country, our Army will soon be fully provided with all necessary equipment for the Nation's protection.

No national defense today is adequate with just an army and navy. The European war has taught us fully and completely the value of a sufficient air corps. Under a bill recently passed by the House, 12,856 additional airplanes are provided for the Army. It is the hope of the Department of War that 50,000 airplanes may be maintained in operation. Our Army Air Corps, however, is yet lacking in bombers to train its pilots in handling the complex equipment they would have to fly in case of war.

I desire to call your attention to two things which I think should be remedied. First, is the discrimination which seems to have developed in parts of this country preventing Negroes and other worthy groups, all citizens, from contributing their share to national-defense efforts. This is wrong and should be remedied, as the flag shows no distinction as to race, creed, or color.

The second criticism has been much discussed in Washington and throughout the United States. It is the proposed plan of Secretary Ickes to establish gasless Sundays in our country, apparently in the interest of national defense. I feel sure that the American people would cooperate in the enforcement of this plan, providing the same was wise and necessary, but we are still continuing to sell large quantities of gasoline and oil to Japan and to Russia.

It seems difficult to understand why, if there is such a scarcity of gasoline and oil in this country, we are still selling them to potential enemies like Japan and Russia; to be used by Japan, at least, in her war with China, whom we personally claim to be helping. This is a policy which is so inconsistent that it should not be countenanced by the people of this country. Our Nation is giving aid to China and the democracies, by way of supplies and money, but when we sell oil and gasoline to the enemy of these democracies, we are placing the weapon in their hands with which to defeat the same democracies which we are attempting to aid.

I have visited, in my official capacity, many of the naval air bases, navy yards, cantonments, and other phases of our national defense. Wherever I go I see the American Flag. This flag has never been lowered in disgrace, may it never be lowered in disgrace. It is the purpose of our national-defense program, in its Army, its Navy, and in its Air Corps, to build up a complete and adequate national defense; a national defense that shall be second to none; a national defense that at all times will be able and capable of protecting our country from attack by any foreign foe, in order to preserve every right Americans cherish.

Farm Organization a Bulwark of Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE CANNON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. JOHN H. BANKHEAD, OF ALABAMA

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, as a part of my remarks I include a notable address delivered by Senator JOHN H. BANKHEAD, of Alabama, over a Nation-wide hook-up over the radio, during the National Farm and Home Hour, sponsored by the American Farm Bureau Federation.

While Senator BANKHEAD is a man of many interests, and has rendered distinguished service in many fields, he has contributed more to agricultural legislation than any other man who has ever served in the American Congress. It is not too much to say that but for laws placed on the statute books through Senator BANKHEAD'S indispensable cooperation, cotton would frequently during the last several years have been selling as low as 5 cents a pound; wheat, 30 cents a bushel; and hogs as low as $3 a hundred pounds; and with the buying power of the farm thus depleted, the effect on business and employment and on the country generally can be easily and accurately estimated.

More than any other one man, Senator BANKHEAD is responsible for legislation which, in the last decade, has increased farm income, encouraged farm ownership, assisted in the practical solution of current farm problems, and otherwise contributed to the welfare of the farmer and the Nation. That has been particularly true in the current session as well expressed by President Edward A. O'Neal, of the National Farm Bureau, who said in introducing Senator BANKHEAD:

Like his distinguished father, who preceded him in the Senate, and his great brother, the late Speaker of the House, he has been a stalwart friend of agriculture. Senator BANKHEAD has guided more major farm bills through the United States Senate than any other statesman. Every farmer in the United States owes a debt of gratitude to him for his championship of American agriculture.

The complete text of Senator BANKHEAD'S address follows:

A month ago today the Senate of the United States approved a bill providing for mandatory 85-percent-of-parity loans on the 1941 crops of cotton, corn, wheat, rice, and tobacco. This loan, coupled with conservation and parity payments which will be made to A. A. A. cooperators, will give producers of these great basic crops a parity price for the first time since the farm depression hit American agriculture in the early twenties.

I rate it as the most important farm legislation yet enacted by any Congress of this Nation. Naturally I am well pleased because of the part I had in its enactment.

This broadcast today is the first appearance of the American Farm Bureau Federation on the National Farm and Home Hour since the President signed the 85-percent-loan bill. It is, therefore, a victory celebration in which I am honored to participate.

Without the vigorous support we received from the American Farm Bureau Federation, especially its able president, Edward A. O'Neal, we probably could not have passed this legislation. My own State Farm Bureau president, Walter L. Randolph, was very helpful, as was Earl Smith, of the Illinois federation, and many other States—north, south, east, and west—which revealed that the farmers of this Nation were united in support of it.

If anyone asks me what the American Farm Bureau Federation has done for agriculture this year, I would answer that through its very active support of the 85-percent-loan bill this splendid organization of farmers operating at the grass roots has materially aided in adding more than $700,000,000 to the income farmers will receive this year. On the basis of the best estimates that can now be made, it appears that the 85-percent-loan bill will add around $273,000,000 to the income of our wheat producers this year. It will increase cotton income at least $239,000,000, corn income at least $180,000,000, tobacco income by $18,000,000, and rice income $11,000,000. More than 6,000,000 farm families will receive a direct share of this increased farm income.

This money is sorely needed and farmers are entitled to every penny of it, but the additional income is by no means all; this law has renewed hope to farm people and restored a portion of the old dignity enjoyed by farmers. It is a big step in the restoration of the profit motive to agriculture which is highly important.

The 85-percent-loan plan was advocated by the American Farm Bureau Federation at its convention in Baltimore last December, following similar action by the Alabama Farm Bureau 2 months before. From the adjournment of the Baltimore convention until the law was finally signed by the President on May 26, the Farm Bureau left no stone unturned in its efforts to write this plan into law. Never have I seen the power of organized agriculture more strikingly demonstrated or more effectively used.

Congress is in sympathy with the farmers, for Congress realizes that a sound and prosperous agriculture is absolutely essential to our national well-being and the success of our defense program. Faced with a wartime loss of their export markets, huge surpluses, and low prices for farm products on the one hand, and rising industrial prices and wages on the other hand, farmers were rapidly approaching a great disaster.

Congress wanted to do something to prevent this disaster, but Congress was divided. Some Members favored one plan and some favored another. If there had been no one to speak for the farmers of America and tell Congress what farmers wanted, discussion over the merits of various farm plans might have dragged on until it was too late to save agriculture from disaster. Fortunately, however, American farmers did have an organization through which they could speak to Congress with a united voice, and this voice tremendously helped to solidify Congress.

The Farm Bureau prepared some of the economic reports and statistical tables that were needed to explain and justify favorable action on the bill. President O'Neal and State Farm Bureau leaders from all sections of the United States appeared before at least four congressional committees to explain their position and objectives. When the matter finally came to a vote the Farm Bureau sent personal messages to every Member of the Senate and most of the Members of the House urging that they support this legislation to give farmers the parity they have so long sought and to which they are justly entitled.

With farmers from all parts of the country united and supporting a single plan, Congress approved the bill by a vote of 275 to 63 in the House and 75 to 2 in the Senate. This is the most overwhelming approval Congress has ever given a major piece of farm legislation.

I hope that this victory for organized agriculture will give farmers everywhere a new faith in the value of organization; and I hope that it will convince nonmembers of the need for united action and membership on their part.

United through a sound and constructive organization with able, honest, and constructive leadership, farmers can secure fair and just legislation. Without organization the big victory just won will be lost and farmers will return to the position of being the most important but the poorest paid group in our national economy.

Since the earliest history of our Nation, leaders of public thought have recognized the value of organization and the futility of individual effort in solving the problems of agriculture. The individual farmer has been pitted in economic struggle against highly organized and centralized financial, industrial, and labor groups; and under such conditions the individual farmer could but lose.

We have the 85-percent loan law, but only for 1 year. We must make it permanent. To do so, the congressional leaders from farm States will need every bit of support they can get from organized agriculture, and organized agriculture needs every good farmer as a member, for farm organization is a bulwark of our democracy.

In conclusion, let me say that my interest in agriculture is not confined to the welfare of the farmers alone. Speaking in the Senate I pointed out that our capitalistic economy depends for its very existence upon balance—balance between the various groups of our population. If, through tariffs and other Federal legislation, the Government favors industry and labor at the expense of the farmer, the Government must eventually help the farmer, too. Otherwise, we set up a series of disturbances that can be just as disastrous in their effects as interferences with circulation in the human body. If we clog the channels of trade through favoritism to some groups, we tend to cripple the country; we cause arthritis of the economic system.

Parity for agriculture, therefore, is essential to national parity and security. Stated differently, parity for farmers means parity for manufacturers, bankers, and merchants because all are dependent upon agriculture and economic balance. It all comes together in a safe, sound, and prosperous democracy which is our paramount objective.

Again I congratulate the Farm Bureau and urge its officers and members to push forward with their good work.

The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. H. CARL ANDERSEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 27, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE WORTHINGTON (MINN.) GLOBE

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, the construction of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway project means much, not only to agriculture but also to the Nation as a whole.

I wish to quote herewith an editorial published in the Worthington Globe, of Worthington, Minn., in support of such seaway construction.

I believe this editorial well expresses the average opinion of the people of the Midwest in relation to this great and worthwhile project:

[From the Worthington (Minn.) Globe]

THE GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—ONCE AGAIN, POWERFUL EASTERN INTERESTS ARE OPPOSING THIS PROJECT WHICH MIGHT COST THEM FINANCIAL CONTROL OF THE MIDWEST

President Roosevelt's recent revival of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway project once more has touched off a storm of criticism from eastern interests.

Politicians, carriers' associations, newspapers and syndicated columnists in the East all have been enlisted in the fight against the proposal.

The Midwest, of course, favors the project because it would provide the key by which this huge land-locked area would be able to win itself cheaper transportation rates and consequently higher profits for its agricultural products.

There is an additional important reason right now why the waterway should be constructed, regardless of the eastern criticism. That is because it will make possible the moving of our shipbuilding industry, so vital to our national defense, to inland centers where it would be less vulnerable to attack from a foreign invader.

The East fears this movement inland as it would imperil its tight hold on the economic life of the Middle West. Yet the east and the west coasts not only are naturally endowed for sea travel but benefited from the building of the Panama Canal, so that they can't logically object to this aid to the Midwest.

There is another reason, too, why the construction of the waterway should not be opposed by the East. It will provide a new source of electric power, which many agree is badly needed in the eastern industrial areas.

Although on first glance it would seem probable that the railroads would oppose the waterway, the statements of the presidents of 10 great roads made at the time the project was proposed indicate they too give it support.

Those roads with eastern termini on the lakes favor the waterway because the low cost of deep water navigation will extend the radius of distribution and develop railroad traffic to and from the ports; increase car efficiency through quicker turn-around and resultant greater earnings per car; recover for these roads a just proportion of the total revenue on interchange traffic; and increase traffic in the territory they serve.

Those reasons are as logical toda, as they were when expressed back in 1925.

On these grounds, it would seem that now is the logical time for construction of this project not only because of its value as a defense move in supplying power and providing new interior shipbuilding facilities but also in promoting production in our great agricultural Midwest.

Ernest Lundeen

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. JOSEPH P. O'HARA

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. ERNEST LUNDEEN, late a Senator from the State of Minnesota

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, this occasion has been set aside to give us the opportunity to pay tribute to the memory of our colleagues who have been called away, with acknowledgment of the frailties of life, and a medium of expression of our sympathies to the loved ones and friends of the departed.

The tragic death of the late Senator LUNDEEN was a shock to the Nation in general and to the State of Minnesota in particular. The high honors which came to him in his lifetime far transcend anything which may be spoken or written for him today. These honors are a testimonial in themselves of the confidence, affection, and respect entertained for him by the people of Minnesota.

Senator LUNDEEN was twice elected from Minnesota to the House of Representatives and then elected to the United Sates Senate. During that time of service he impressed himself upon his colleagues as a man of loyalty and courage, who fearlessly expressed his views and convictions—a trait much admired by even those who disagreed with him politically.

He was a typical son of the Middle West. Born in South Dakota, he was reared and educated in Minnesota. He achieved success against great odds, which gave him a deeper sense of sympathetic understanding of the problems of the unfortunate; and in all his career he was ever solicitious of the cause of those whom he represented. His interest in legislation was always in that which he believed to be beneficial to the greatest number of people.

Senator LUNDEEN was a veteran of the Spanish-American War and was a Member of the war Congress at the outbreak of the last World War. He voted against this country's entering that war. As a member of the Senate Military Affairs Committee he opposed involvement of the United States in the intrigues and entanglements which would take this country into war. He loved his country, and the cause of peace had in him its stanchest advocate.

His devotion to his family was exemplary and his untimely death has taken a kind husband and father from the home which he loved so much. Throughout his long public career he had the devotion, advice, and constant companionship of his splendid and intelligent wife.

His death is a loss to the State, his country, to his family, and to his friends; and we join in sharing the grief of his family and extend to them our deepest sympathy.

He is not dead, but sleeps;
Such souls forever live.

Farm Organization an Indispensable Factor in Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE CANNON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 27, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. CLARENCE CANNON OF MISSOURI

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I include an address which I delivered over the radio June 14, 1941, as follows:

We are coming on the air this morning in the first broadcast since the enactment of the farm parity bill. Agriculture is the last of all the industries to win legislation stabilizing income, and the President's signature certifying his approval of this important law climaxes a 20-year battle waged by the farmers of America for their fair share of the national income.

The national income is a big pie from which Uncle Sam cuts a slice for each of his children. Some years the pie has been larger than others, as the national income has increased or decreased. In 1929 the national income was $80,000,000,000. In 1933 it had dropped to $45,000,000,000. This year statisticians predict it will be over $90,000,000,000. So the size of the farmer's piece of pie has varied with the national income—some years larger and some years smaller. But the distressing feature is that for the last 20 years, whether it was large or whether it was small, it has been each year smaller in proportion than the slices received by the other children. Each year industry, labor, mining, transportation, banking, and Uncle Sam's other children have been getting more and more of the pie and the farmer has been getting less and less of the pie. Now, why is this? It is due to the fact that Congress has been passing laws increasing the size of the slices given the other children. Congress passed the fair-trade law, and industry's slice was larger. Congress passed the wage-and-hour law, and labor's slice was larger. Congress passed the coal bill, and mining's slice was larger. Bill after bill has been passed and each bill increased somebody's share of the pie. But you know you cannot give one child a bigger piece of pie without giving some other child a smaller piece of pie. To cut one piece larger, you must cut another piece smaller. And when the others got more pie the farmers always got less.

But now, at last, thanks to Senator BANKHEAD, Senator RUSSELL, and Congressman FULMER, and the members of their committees, and the farm-minded Senators and Congressmen who voted with them; and thanks to President O'Neal, and the Farm Bureau, and especially the loyal, far-sighted members of the Farm Bureau back home on the farms who supported both President O'Neal and the Congressmen—thanks to them all, because all of them had a part in it, and none could have succeeded without the other—thanks to them all, we at last have a law stabilizing agriculture's piece of pie—a law insuring our share of the national income. It is the law we have been working for these 20 years. It prevents cutting the farmer's pie smaller. It increases the size of the farmer's piece of pie to what it was from 1909 to 1914. As a result of this law the price of cotton, which was selling at 9 cents a pound, is today selling at 14 cents per pound. Wheat, which was 68 cents per bushel, is already up to $1.03 a bushel. Corn, which was 59 cents, is now 75 cents. Hogs, which were $5.83, are now $10—all as a direct result of the operation of the new farm law passed by Congress and signed by the President of the United States. And it hasn't hurt the consumer. Wheat has gone from 68 cents to $1.03, and bread is still 10 cents a loaf. Cotton has gone from 9 cents to 14 cents, and no extra charge on a shirt. In fact, it has helped the consumer by helping business, and all business is supported and accelerated by farm buying power.

We have been often told that you can't legislate farm prosperity. But the proof of the pudding is the eating. Here we have a practical and convincing demonstration of the fact that laws will help the farmer as much as they will help labor and industry. Although we have on hand the largest wheat surplus ever known, althcugh there is a cotton surplus in excess of 11,000,000 bales, and notwithstanding we had this year the largest carry-over of corn in the history of the world, this law has legislated 5 cents more per pound into the pockets of the cotton planter, 48 cents more per bushel into the pockets of the wheat grower, and an extra 25 cents per bushel into the pockets of the corn farmer. Farm legislation pays, and pays in cash.

In short, legislation is the only solution of the farm question. Agriculture can never hope to secure fair prices or maintain parity income with other industries in any other way. We must be in position to secure legislation—just as every other industry has already secured legislation—and that brings us to the crux of the whole matter. How can we secure legislation? The answer is simple. We can secure it just as we have secured this law. We can secure it in the same way labor and industry secure it. Through organization—and in no other way. Let us take a leaf out of labor's book. Within my recollection I have never known organized labor to bring any piece of major legislation on the floor of the House which the House did not pass. Why? Because every State and national legislator knows that labor rewards its friends and punishes its enemies—that, regardless of party or partisanship, it supports those who support its legislative program. And until farmers are sufficiently organized to similarly support their legislative programs they cannot hope to secure fair prices or equality of income.

Now, my friends, organization is especially important during the coming year and on until the end of the European conflict. The bill just passed is for one crop season only. It expires next year. It must be made permanent. And still more important, provision must be made to sustain farm prices in the inevitable aftermath which will follow the close of the war. The collapse of farm prices following the close of the World War will be mild in comparison with the crash in farm prices which will follow the close of this war unless permanent and effective laws can be passed to meet the situation.

Vice President Wallace, our former Secretary of Agriculture, who has intimate association with both agriculture and legislation, sounded a stern note of warning yesterday when speaking here in Washington before the national A. A. A. conference, he warned against what he termed "a terrible debacle" for which we must be prepared when peace comes. Beyond the peradventure of a doubt the debacle will come—it will strike with the fury of a cyclone when peace is declared. We have seen it come before and it is certain to come again unless we prepare now to meet it by the enactment of permanent legislation which will maintain farm prices along with industrial prices and union wage scales. We must have votes here in Congress to enact that legislation, and the only way to get them is through your influence—through your cooperation in your local farm organizations. Our government is a representative government. But Congressmen can't represent individual farmers. They have no way of knowing what one busy farmer needs or wants. But as a member of a strong farm organization you can send men here who, like Edward O'Neal, have studied your problems and know your needs and know how to present your case. It is to be regretted that every farmer in America could not have been here these last crucial weeks to follow President O'Neal in his long and strenuous campaign for this bill. It could not have been passed without him and his organization. But the hardest fight is ahead, and he needs more support back in the States—back in the congressional districts. He needs you. We farm Congressmen need you—we need your cooperation and encouragement and support, through your membership in your farm organization. If you are not a member—join now. If already a member, enlist in a membership drive. Bring in every neighbor. In no other practical way can you contribute so much to your own income and your family's standard of living as by building up your home farm organizations and backing their efforts to give you parity prices and protect agriculture in the trying days ahead.

And in no other way can you render a more unselfish service to the Nation. Depressions do not stop with the farmer. They start with the farmer—as they started with him at the close of the last war. But once started they sweep on until they engulf every business in the land. In supporting legislation to maintain farm prices and farm buying power, you are serving not only your own family and your own community and all businessmen dependent on farm patronage, but you are protecting your State and Nation against a paralyzing depression that is as certain as death and taxes unless the farm organizations of America are strong enough to meet the challenge. And whether they are strong enough depends on you and your neighbors. It is your responsibility and your opportunity. As Ed O'Neal would say, God bless you. You've got a big job on your hands. And it's your job.

Amendment to Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD H. REES

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 27, 1941

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a bill in the House today—the purpose of which is to amend the Farm Marketing Quota Act, by striking out the penalty of 50 percent of the loan value of wheat and restoring a straight penalty of 15 cents per bushel.

The Department of Agriculture, in compliance with the act recently passed by Congress, providing for a loan of 85 percent of the parity price—placed the loan value at 98 cents per bushel on wheat produced in compliance with the marketing quota. Wheat not under the quota will carry a loan of about 58 cents per bushel.

I think the penalty of 49 cents per bushel is too drastic. Wheat in the Middle West is now selling for about 80 cents per bushel. It is clear that wheat in excess of the program is therefore penalized about 60 percent of its present market value. I believe this is out of line and hardly think Congress intended to impose such a severe penalty. I am informed that a great many farmers who voted for the quotas did not understand that these penalties would be so drastic.

When the wheat crop was planted the law provided for a penalty of 15 cents per bushel on excess wheat. This provision was in effect until it was changed on May 29 of this year. Farmers had a reasonable right to assume that such penalty would prevail until the crops were harvested. I do not think a penalty amounting to 300 percent of that originally provided should have been imposed at such late date.

I realize that the farmers by a large majority agreed to comply with this legislation immediately after the law was passed. Even at that, the passage of such retroactive legislation does not seem justifiable under the circumstances. The penalties should not have been so excessively increased on this year's wheat crop.

If the farmers want crop control, certain penalties must be provided and those who restrict their acreage and stay within the program are entitled to benefits not shared by those on the outside. I believe, however, that since a loan on wheat of 98 cents per bushel for cooperators has been established we should not go to such an extreme as to penalize the grower of excess wheat to the extent of 60 percent of its market value.

HON. ROBERT F. JONES

OF OHIO

ARTICLE BY JAMES N. BLISSELL, CITY EDITOR, LIMA (OHIO) NEWS

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I insert the column of James N Blissell, city editor of the Lima News, of Lima, Ohio, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that the membership may see Mr. Blissell's observations of the N. Y. A. in Lima. I am sure the membership will be glad to have this report from a fearless, patriotic American editor on this important subject:

(By Jim Blissell, city editor, the Lima (Ohio) News)

Economists use many barometers in gaging the trend of business, such as bank debits, car loadings, sales-tax receipts, electric-power output, etc. Among the newer barometers of recent years have been the W. P. A. rolls and the number of persons on relief.

With business and industry literally crying for help, decided drops have been noted in relief cases and in many instances the W. P. A. has reported that completion of some projects was being delayed because of a labor shortage. The reduction of 43 percent in W. P. A. personnel ordered last week is welcome news. First and foremost, it indicates that industry is absorbing many able-bodied men. Now all that needs be accomplished to meet the back-breaking efforts of private enterprise will be some common sense in the administration of Government programs such as W. P. A. and N. Y. A.

The whole socialistic scheme of things makes the blood of the average American boil. Last week this pillar speculated upon a rumored $75,000 building program here by N. Y. A. to retain workers for defense industries.

It was officially stated from Columbus headquarters that N. Y. A. proposes 10 such buildings throughout Ohio to train 3,000 workers. Official N. Y. A. news releases, with elaborate photographic displays, say the shops will train machinists, sheet-metal fabricators, welders, short-wave-radio assemblers, operators, etc.

Certainly some of the "bull of the woods" machinists who spent years at the bench learning a trade and earning the right to carry a journeyman's card must smile up their sleeves when they learn of the plan to turn out machinists in batches from N. Y. A. schools.

The whole proposition looks from where we sit as just another "make work" program of New Deal visionaries, who shed crocodile tears for sacrifices on the one hand and do a "Coal Oil Johnny" on the other with taxpayers' money.

BIG EXPANSION WORK UNDERWAY

Certainly the starry-eyed visionaries can point to the reduction in W. P. A. rolls, but how about the National Youth Administration? Workmen last week were knocking out partitions in the Dominion Building for a further expansion of N. Y. A. activities there. Some of the N. Y. A. workers who were getting "field training" putting in a new store front in the room on the first floor of the city building were just bubbling over with inertia as they listened to a portable radio on the job blasting forth with Beat Me Daddy, Eight to the Bar, and other jitterbug numbers calculated to inspire men to lofty and noble efforts.

To many the appearance of a radio on such a job might be comparable with the agricultural experiments of years ago when it was found that old Bossy gave more milk when sweet strains of My Darling Nellie Gray were wafted on the evening breeze. To others it is indicative of the like-it-and-be-damned attitude so familiar with those heading up these experimental and costly programs.

Housewives in the Lakewood Avenue sector, where the resident training center is located, inform us that after the girls are given training, many refuse to accept work. One specific case was reported where a girl did take a job for 2 days. During that time she informed the lady of the house that Mr. —— told her, "She wouldn't have to work." She elucidated further that after a 30-day training period the girls are permitted to go home, remain away a month, and return for another 30-day period. This particular young lady, our informant added, admitted to doing nine hitches at the training center.

For the length of time that the program has been in operation, it seems fair to assume that certainly all the potential recipients have been trained in some work or other. As a matter of fact, if this were not the case, the barrage of publicity constantly released by N. Y. A. citing the glories and advantages of the program would be needless.

This latest craze for spending and experimenting is economically unsound on its very surface. In the first place, it presupposes that in not 1 of the 10 cities where buildings are to be erected is there a suitable structure that might be rented. Oh, no. That would never do. As is the case in Lima, hundreds and hundreds of square feet of floor space must be utilized, high rents paid, old tenants displaced for expansion, and juicy leases signed; then, on top of it all, the N. Y. A. will erect buildings itself.

One wonders what would be the reaction were some of these trained program directors and their satellites asked to clean up Hog Creek or the city dump for the same money they are receiving for riding about in station wagons and doling out salt tablets to stenographers.

One wonders the reaction of workmen who will stand side by side with graduates of training schools, the cost of which they have to help pay. The workmen stand to be displaced by the very men whose basic training they paid for.

Industry has not been asleep at the wheel. It would be interesting to know how much in dollars and cents and man-hours it has cost the Lima Locomotive Works, Inc., and Westinghouse, for example, right here in Lima, to train workmen in the past 6 months to a year.

You can bet that the men at the head of these industries are not going to take any N. Y. A. trained short-course machinist and put him to work on valuable jobs without first retraining him in their own methods and on their own equipment.

Another angle which the N. Y. A. propagandists and program planners seem to have overlooked is the availability of machines on which to train their machinists. Every milling machine, drill press, lathe, shaper, etc., in any kind of running order will bring top prices today. Where does N. Y. A. hope to get the equipment for the boys to play with for several months as they tinker and listen to radios?

Several of the big moguls of N. Y. A. hereabout have wondered out loud why this corner is not sympathetic to the program and statements that have been heard that our information was wrong and figures misquoted and misconstrued.

RECORDS WILL TELL THE STORY

If that be the case, we make this proposition: Let some disinterested person examine the records of the N. Y. A. here and let officials give explanations for every question asked and we will print what the probe does reveal and let Mr. and Mrs. Taxpayer be the judge of the worth of the program.

We have contended from the start that this youth movement is a hotbed for deep thinkers and left wingers. It might be well for the Dies committee to spend a little time looking into the background of some of the leaders, utilizing some of the $100,000 which Congressman BOB JONES' insistence made available to investigate members of subversive organizations who are on the Government pay roll.

The warning that the dangers from within are more pernicious and real right now than the dangers from without cannot be reiterated too often.

As Edwin Markham, poet and prophetic genius, phrased it:

"I fear the vermin that shall undermine
Senate and school and citadel and shrine;
The worm of fraud, the fatted worm of ease,
And all the crawling progeny of these.
I fear the vermin that shall honeycomb the towers
And walls of state in unsuspecting hours."

Labor and the National Emergency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

RADIO ADDRESS OF GEORGE MEANY, SECRETARY-TREASURER OF AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address by Mr. George Meany, secretary-treasurer of the American Federation of Labor, on labor and the national emergency delivered June 24:

The organized workers of America carry on their shoulders a tremendous burden of responsibility during the present national emergency.

Our job is to cooperate to the very limit with our National Government in its defense efforts and, at the same time, preserve to the workers of a future America the ways of democracy so essential to industrial advancement and social progress.

The decision of Adolf Hitler bringing Germany into open conflict with her former partner, Communist Russia, in no way lessens the need for America to speedily prepare as never before to fight for her life in a world dominated by force.

Optimists may look upon this new phase of the European conflict as a stroke of good fortune for the democracies in that the pressure on the British may be eased somewhat while Germany is engaged on its eastern front. However, who is there who can say with authority that Hitler will not have full control of the vast resources of Soviet Russia within a very short space of time? If and when this happens, England and America and those who believe in England and America will face a situation graver by far than that which we have faced up to now.

No matter what disagreement there may be among Americans as to what our attitude should be toward this latest development, as to what our attitude should be toward the general European picture, there can be no disagreement as to the purpose of Hitler: World domination achieved by force.

Nor can there be any disagreement among thinking citizens of our country who sincerely believe in our way of life that America cannot long survive as a free nation, governed by the democratic methods of a free people, in a world dominated by Hitler.

No organization in America has a longer record of hostility to Adolf Hitler and his hateful system than has the American Federation of Labor.

Eight full years ago, a long, long time before the people of our country achieved such a virtual unanimity as now exists on the subject, the American Federation of Labor saw Hitlerism for what it was and denounced it repeatedly in the most vigorous language.

I point these things out to give you the background of the American Federation of Labor's forthright opposition to totalitarianism of all types going back over a period of many years.

It is also appropriate to point out at this time that the American Federation of Labor, which demonstrated its patriotism in 1917 and 1918 by its sacrifices and service to the Nation, continues to be the patriotic organization which it has been from the day of its birth 60 years ago.

A little more than a year ago our national Government launched the national-defense program, designed to make our country so strong that no dictator or combination of dictators could succeed in any attempt to destroy our democracy. As an integral part of our national-defense policy, our Government decided that it would give aid to Great Britain and to other nations resisting the Nazis. The United States launched a program of production of tanks, and guns, and planes, and munitions calling for the expenditure of many billions of dollars.

Huge sums were appropriated for the construction of cantonments for our new Army, as well as for the construction of naval air training stations, new factories and plants for the production of the tools without which our Nation could not consider itself safe.

From that day last spring when our national-defense program was launched by the Government of the United States until this very moment—right now—the American Federation of Labor has been giving its most wholehearted support and cooperation to the great effort.

I cannot speak for other organizations but, so far as the American Federation of Labor is concerned, this is where we have stood from the very outset of the national-defense program, and this is where we stand today.

The 5,000,000 members of the American Federation of Labor are workers who realize that they cannot be good trade-unionists unless they are, first of all, good citizens. Realizing that, we have been giving, are giving, and will continue to give to our national Government the most unstinting type of cooperation.

In the last few months we have all seen headlines by the hundreds in which the word "strike" has appeared. We have seen the essays of columnists and the writings of the men who compose the editorials, all seeking to give the impression that labor is striking left and right and impeding the national-defense program.

Contrary to the impression that might be gained from the headlines, columns, and editorials, all the workers of America are not on strike, nor are they all about to go on strike. As an actual fact, millions of organized American workers—members of thousands of trade-unions—are plugging away, day in and day out, giving their very best to the defense effort.

The facts prove that, so far as the American Federation of Labor is concerned, the unions affiliated with our movement have turned in one of the finest pieces of cooperation in all history.

Let us take a look at the War Department's and the Navy Department's building construction programs in which, as everybody knows, the workers involved have been A. F. of L. members. Secretary of War Stimson recently issued a very interesting report. This report dealt with the $1,200,000,000 cantonment construction program of the War Department.

Did the building trades of the A. F. of L. impede the cantonment construction program? The report of Secretary Stimson supplies the answer. The answer is this: Out of a total of 40,607,000 man-days worked on the cantonment program, only 14,875 man-days were lost as a result of labor difficulties.

This percentage of delay was so small that it amounted to only three one-hundredths of 1 percent.

Is this cooperation? Of course it is. I have no desire to make invidious comparisons, but in view of the vicious attacks which have been made upon organized labor it is only fair to point out that neither industry nor any other part of the national community can point to a record of cooperation surpassing—or, for that matter, even approaching—that of the building trades unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor which I have just cited.

On the Navy's air training station and other building construction, the story is much the same. The records of the Building and Construction Trades Department reveal that there was only one stoppage. This was in Boston and it was ended within 2 days.

Now, of course, there is much more to the defense program than just construction work. In the factories and the mills we are turning out a thousand and one different articles in staggering numbers. In this regard the record shows that, taking all defense work from the start of the program through the end of last month, only one man-day of work has been lost by an American Federation of Labor strike for every 2,400 man-days of work performed. Translated into percentage terms, that means that only one twenty-fourth of 1 percent of defense-work time was lost.

Notwithstanding this almost 100-percent record of avoidance of production stoppages, the American Federation of Labor is not satisfied. On May 28, immediately after the President's declaration of an unlimited national emergency, the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor renewed its pledge to avoid strikes, to use to the full the facilities of the United States Conciliation Service and the National Defense Mediation Board and went even further than that. The executive council called upon every union affiliated with the American Federation of Labor to refrain for any reason whatsoever from calling a strike interfering with national-defense production until full opportunity has first been given to the Conciliation Service and the Mediation Board to bring about a peaceful settlement.

Despite the low wages which some employers have insisted upon paying while themselves making enormous profits, despite the refusal of some employers to obey the National Labor Relations Act—in short, despite the fact that workers in controversy with employers usually have legitimate grievances—the American Federation of Labor recognizes that we are not living in normal times. We realize that we must make sacrifices.

Therefore, the American Federation of Labor is requiring its affiliates to forego strikes and to submit their grievances to the National Defense Mediation Board—a board, incidentally, whose establishment was first recommended by the American Federation of Labor.

The Mediation Board has been doing and is doing a splendid job of adjusting labor-management controversies in a fair and expeditious manner. Our unions have been cooperating wholeheartedly with the Mediation Board and will continue to cooperate wholeheartedly with it.

Despite this splendid record of cooperation, we find today that the rights and freedom of the 5,000,000 patriotic American workers in the American Federation of Labor are threatened, right here at home, by the forces of reaction within our own land.

There are today proposals before Congress which are viciously antilabor, which are viciously antidemocratic and which, if enacted, would carry us a long way toward the Hitlerism we are supposed to be preparing to protect ourselves against. These proposals would give Congress the right to compel workers to work without their consent.

Recently there were several strikes which were obviously not designed to benefit the workers. These strikes, on the contrary, were designed to give aid and comfort to those who would destroy our system of government.

One of these strikes was engineered by known Communists and constituted a deliberate attempt to sabotage the national-defense program. This challenge the Government could not ignore and was therefore compelled to resort to strong measures.

As a result of this case and a very few similar cases, some Members of Congress are displaying an almost hysterical determination to place repressive antilabor legislation on the statute books. They do not seem to realize that this is no time to attempt to punish all labor for the sins of a few individuals.

Neither do they seem to realize that the enactment of such unfair legislation—legislation seeking to establish in this democratic Nation a totalitarian principle precisely like those enunciated by Hitler and his gang—would cause terrific resentment and bring about a condition of utter chaos in industry.

Voluntary avoidance of work stoppages is one thing, and, in view of the national crisis, acceptable to the overwhelming majority of American workers. Compulsory servitude, in flagrant disregard of the thirteenth amendment to our Constitution outlawing slavery for all time, is quite another thing and—to be quite blunt about it—would not be tolerated by the American people.

A compulsory servitude law—and no matter how lavish their sponsors may be in the use of sugar coating, that is just exactly what these bills before Congress call for—could not possibly be enforced without the extreme use of police power, and probably not then.

The great national effort in which we are now engaged calls for a spirit of national unity based on the fundamental principles of the democracy in which we all share a common vital interest. We cannot defend that democracy by methods which are repulsive to all who cherish liberty nor by methods which, by their very nature, destroy democracy itself.

This does not mean that the American Federation of Labor recommends strikes in this time of critical national emergency. As I have pointed out in some detail, the position of the American Federation of Labor is quite the contrary. The position of the American Federation of Labor in this hour of crisis is that even wholly legitimate strikes must be avoided if it is humanly possible to do so.

President Roosevelt, in describing the grave dangers which confront our Nation, did not exaggerate. The situation is an extremely menacing one. On this there can be no division—no disagreement.

Organized labor, as represented by the American Federation of Labor, stands foursquare behind the President of the United States. Organized labor knows better perhaps than any other group of citizens what happens to the liberties which we cherish when democracy goes under and totalitarianism comes into power.

The need of the hour is for national unity. Sound management, constructive liberal government and free, loyal labor—all must unite in this effort. We must work and, what is more important, we must work together.

It is for this reason that legislation designed to punish the workers of America because of the sins of a few obstructionists is so very undesirable. Were such legislation ever to go on the statute books of our country, our national unity would be torn to tatters and Adolf Hitler, without having fired a shot, would have won his greatest victory.

Not in any narrow spirit but with the welfare of our country at heart, the American Federation of Labor urges with all emphasis that compulsory servitude legislation ought not to be and must not be enacted.

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 27, 1941

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN HON. COMPTON I. WHITE, OF IDAHO, AND OFFICIALS OF ALUMINUM CO. OF AMERICA

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, for the information of the Members of Congress, I have secured permission to extend my remarks and include a letter received from the local representative of the Aluminum Co. of America and the statement of Vice President I. W. Wilson concerning the policy and operation of his company, the Alcoa, which I insert in the RECORD with my reply to Mr. Hall's letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 26, 1941.

Mr. ARTHUR P. HALL,
Aluminum Co. of America,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR HALL: Your courtesy in supplying me with copy of the statement of Vice President Wilson of your company outling the situation affecting the production of aluminum and the activities of your company which accompanied your letter of June 16 is appreciated.

I am sure the Alcoa is deeply concerned with defense of our country and would not with direct intention restrain the production and manufacture of the vitally essential product to our national defense—aluminum—but the record of your company in establishing and maintaining the prices of aluminum by curtailing production for its especial advantage is open to question as to the subversive effect on the national economy and in the present emergency is detrimental to the public welfare.

With the people of our Nation burdened with business conditions that are operating to increase the national debt and endanger our national economy and the security of our system of government, a grave situation intensified by the growing danger to our national defense, there can be no temporizing with the policies and practices on the part of a private company that brought about the condition in the aluminum industry your letter and the accompanying article attempt to explain. What is said of the aluminum industry and the activities of the Alcoa can be said of the monopolistic companies in all other lines of manufacture and distribution, a trend that if carried to its ultimate conclusion will result in wrecking our national economy and the final destruction of the very companies now operating to secure and retain for themselves unfair advantages at the expense of the producers in this country engaged in our great basic industries, namely, agriculture, mining, lumbering, and fisheries.

No; Mr. Hall, we—you and I—must use our influence to reverse the monopolistic trend and protect the broad principles of unfettered competition that the law of supply and demand can come into full play to restore and establish a parity between the prices of the products of our basic industries and the manufactured necessities used by the people engaged in these industries. Let's join hands in securing the enforcement in spirit and in fact of the Sherman antitrust law.

Sincerely,

COMPTON I. WHITE,
Member of Congress.

ALUMINUM CO. OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C., June 18, 1941.

Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WHITE: There have been so many misrepresentations as to what the Aluminum Co. of America is doing now and arranging to do in the near future to uphold the President and the Congress in the defense program that I am taking the liberty of enclosing herewith a statement made on behalf of the company by its vice president, Mr. I. W. Wilson, before the Truman committee of the Senate on Tuesday, June 17, 1941.

You will be interested in this because the production of aluminum is so vital at this time and you will want to know the facts regarding the situation.

If there is any further information that we can give you as to the past, present, and future production program of the Aluminum Co. of America, we will be very glad to give you any and all information that you may at any time desire.

Yours very truly,

ARTHUR P. HALL.

STATEMENT OF I. W. WILSON, VICE PRESIDENT IN CHARGE OF OPERATIONS, ALUMINUM CO. OF AMERICA, BEFORE THE SENATE COMMITTEE INVESTIGATING THE NATIONAL-DEFENSE PROGRAM

At the hearing Monday, Secretary Ickes made statements challenging the good faith of the Aluminum Co. of America in its efforts to aid in this country's defense program. We welcome the opportunity to refute these accusations and we believe that when the facts are known no fair-minded person can fail to agree that the Aluminum Co. has done everything within its power, and more, probably than any other corporation in the United States to uphold the President and the Congress in building up our defenses.

We first want to tell this committee some of the details of what this company has done, and is doing, to increase its production of aluminum.

In 1938, when our plants produced 286,881,690 pounds of aluminum, and our total shipments were only 175,525,773 pounds, the Aluminum Co. of America finished the year with an inventory of 277,538,066 pounds of aluminum, or more aluminum than normally would be used in a year.

As late as April 3, 1939, Congress had only authorized the Navy to build 3,000 planes, and the Army 6,000. Such a program required no expansion of production facilities, particularly when the Aluminum Co. of America already had more than a year's supply of metal on hand. Yet, late in 1938, the company did inaugurate a program which, with the additions since made to it, calls for a capital expenditure of over $200,000,000 of the company's money, and which has resulted in an increase in the number of its employees from 25,000 to about 50,000.

The Aluminum Co. of America is now producing well over double the amount of aluminum produced in 1938 and when its present program is completed the production of 1938 will be almost tripled. The expansion of the production of aluminum is not as simple a matter as is the expansion of many other industries. As this committee is well aware, the production of aluminum requires enormous quantities of electric power. It takes not only large sums of money, but many years to build the extensive hydroelectric developments necessary to get blocks of power in the magnitude required. An aluminum plant without electric power is useless.

In addition to the acquisition of the needed power, this increase in the production of aluminum has already required the doubling of the production of alumina, the tripling of the steamship tonnage used to bring bauxite from South America to this country, and the doubling of the production of bauxite as well. A further expansion of all these facilities is a necessary part of the existing program.

This expansion included large additional facilities for manufacturing fabricated forms. Within a few months the company's capacity to produce strong alloy sheet and extruded shapes will be 6 times that of the beginning of 1938, while our ability to produce aluminum forgings will be 16 times that of the beginning of 1938. All of these products are of vital interest to the aircraft industry.

An inquiry has been made concerning the Aluminum Co.'s attitude with respect to the Fontana power project which will require 3 years to complete. Some months ago a declaration of intention was filed with the Federal Power Commission for this project in the belief that the Commission would not require a Federal license. Such a license permits the Government to take over the project at the end of the license period on terms that might be confiscatory. The Commission, however, made a ruling that would necessitate taking out such a license.

The company felt then, and still feels, that in the light of its other huge expenditures for the defense program, it cannot, with proper regard for its financial stability, put up its own money to develop this project in the face of the Government's power to take over the property at the end of the license period. Notwithstanding this feeling, the Aluminum Co. has informed O. P. M., and also T. V. A., that it stands ready to take out a license and develop this project if the Government will assist in financing the development; or the company will sell the project to T. V. A. so that Authority may develop it; or, if neither of these alternatives is acceptable, the company is ready to cooperate in any other way that will make the power from this development available for the production of aluminum. The company now reiterates that position. This matter is, and for sometime past has been, under consideration by Government agencies, and the Aluminum Co. is ready to proceed in any manner that they may determine.

We have been criticized on the theory that estimates by various governmental agencies were in some way mistakes attributable to the Aluminum Co. of America. This we emphatically deny.

Many of the things that have been said before this committee concerning aluminum seem to be based on the assumption that it is the function of a private industrial corporation—in this case the Aluminum Co. of America—to estimate not only what it will produce to meet the defense needs of the United States but also to set itself up as an authority for what those needs are. Under this assumption we should not only have been able to tell how much aluminum will be required, for instance, to build the number of airplanes needed to defend the democracies but to forecast how many of these planes will be needed.

We have not presumed to tell Congress, the Army, or the Navy how many planes are needed for defense. Our function as to forecasts is, and can only be, to tell what we will produce, and how far we can expand under the instructions and requests of the Government, and then to produce such aluminum. There has never been a single month when we have not exceeded the amounts of such forecasts.

We understand that the present estimates of O. P. M. call for the production in this country of at least 1,400,000,000 pounds of aluminum per year. Last October the Defense Commission advised the company that it should increase its production by an additional 100,000,000 pounds per year, or, thus, to a total of 850,000,000 pounds per year. The company thereupon submitted to the Defense Commission a program of further expansion which would have increased production by more than 100,000,000 pounds per year within a period of from 6 to 8 months. Since then O. P. M. has been advised by the company, again and again, that if O. P. M. would procure the necessary electrical power the company would increase production by such further amounts as the Government wishes. But it has not yet, to this very hour, been possible to determine at what place, or in what amounts, electrical power will be made available, and until this is known the company cannot proceed with the construction of the necessary plants in which to produce the additional aluminum desired by the Government.

Mr. Ickes stated Monday to this committee: "I have a profound conviction that the Aluminum Co. of America would prevent the necessary expansion of our aluminum manufacturing facilities, regardless of the consequences to the country or the world, in order to get them all within its own domination and control." He further stated, referring to the Aluminum Co. of America, "It did its damnedest to prevent us from making this contract for power with the Reynolds Metals Co."

We want to state without reservation that the Aluminum Co. has no desire to prevent the necessary expansion of the aluminum manufacturing facilities in this country, or to get them all within its domination and control. We are interested in but one thing: That there be sufficient aluminum produced to meet the defense needs of our country. Furthermore, the Aluminum Co. has never in any way done anything to make it difficult for the Reynolds Metals Co., or anyone else, to go into the aluminum business, and has never endeavored to prevent the Reynolds Metals Co. from obtaining power.

The company has no desire to use the present emergency for the purpose of increasing its own position in the industry. This is shown by the fact that the company has repeatedly offered to put all of its technical resources at the Government's command, to design and build plants for Government operation, if it so desires, and to furnish the technical staff to make this possible or, if the Government prefers, to operate for the Government under a management arrangement. The company has also offered to use its own resources, as far as they will go, in financing any expansion program adopted by the Government, in addition to the $200,000,000 it has already used for expansion. No company could offer to do more.

Monday Secretary Ickes referred to a request of February 4 from O. P. M. for an additional 65,000 kilowatts of Bonneville power, and explained why he would not allot it to the Aluminum Co. He also said that later he was again asked to allot 65,000 kilowatts of additional power to the Aluminum Co. and gave another explanation as to why he would not do that. Secretary Ickes failed to point out and perhaps he did not know that the Aluminum Co. has continuously, over the last 6 months or more, told the governmental agencies that it would make all the aluminum for which power could be obtained.

In the face of that record; in the face of the fact that the Aluminum Co. has already doubled and will shortly triple its 1938 output; and in the face of the further fact that the Aluminum Co. is spending over $200,000,000 of its own money to advance defense, it is hard to understand how Secretary Ickes could state to this committee Monday that, "when the story of this war comes to be written, it may have to be written that it was lost because of the recalcitrance of the Aluminum Co. of America."

Secretary Ickes may know how wars are lost, but you gentlemen know that wars are won by using as quickly as possible every available resource for the production of war materials.

Allegations have been made that the Aluminum Co. of America is a monopoly and is a party to agreements with various foreign companies, or foreign agencies, under which it is claimed production of aluminum has been restricted in this country. These and other similar questions are now pending in the courts against the company and its officers. In view of the fact that these suits are still unadjudicated we feel constrained to remain silent in the face of these charges, believing it to be improper to discuss, or make any representations, publicly regarding matters which are still pending before the courts for decision. Suffice it to say that all of the principal officers of the company have vigorously denied that any such agreements exist, and they likewise have denied such charges are justified. I can assure you that it is no easy matter to be compelled to keep quiet in the face of charges that we regard as unfounded, but the proprieties of the situation have unfortunately made this necessary.

The Aluminum Co. of America was the first company in the world ever to produce aluminum at a price which brought it into commercial use. It pioneered the industry. It is still the foremost company in the aluminum industry, in spite of the fact that it has had the most severe competition from foreign companies, at least one of which is Government-owned.

The Aluminum Co. of America has given the United States leadership in this industry, both from the standpoint of knowledge and technique, as well as quality of product. Until Germany came into the fruition of its enormous armament program in 1939, the productive capacity in the United States was the greatest of any country in the world. In pioneering this industry, the principal job of the Aluminum Co. of America has been to find new uses for the metal. The problem of the company, therefore, has heretofore been not the production of aluminum but the finding of people who would buy the metal and use it.

Let me assure you gentlemen that the sole desire of the Aluminum Co. of America is to be allowed to use its every resource in the production of aluminum for the defense of the country. We urge that we be allowed to do so.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE CANNON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

RADIO ADDRESS BY EDWARD A. O'NEAL

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the address of Mr. Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, in concluding the National Farm and Home Hour program over the radio Saturday, June 14, 1941.

President O'Neal said:

It is indeed a joy to those of us who have been fighting for farmers over the years to hear tributes to our Farm Bureau organization such as those which have been paid it today by Senator BANKHEAD and Congressman CANNON. In all the years that I have been working for agricultural equality I have never heard more forthright statements on the necessity of farm organization. I am deepiy touched by the tribute they have paid my organization.

I hope the farmers of America will heed the good advice given by these two distinguished leaders of the Congress, who know whereof they speak. Through organization and with their leadership we are making progress in our long struggle to bring about a fair balance between agriculture, labor, and industry, the three great groups that make up our Nation. I believe the overwhelming majority by which Congress recently passed our commodity loan bill, which will give farmers parity for the first time in more than 20 years, is a clear indication that the people of this country are beginning to recognize the place of agriculture in our national economy.

We are going to press forward until we get a permanent farm program that will assure farmers of full parity every year on all of their crops, both basic and nonbasic. In this endeavor I know that we shall have the sympathy of both Congress and the President of the United States. After signing the loan bill the President wrote me a letter in which he said: "I know that I may count on your assistance and that of your organization in bringing about the necessary changes to strengthen the present farm program so that the objectives of parity for agriculture may be reached and held."

Farmers, I'm sure, are delighted to receive this evidence of the President's reliance on farm organization and his strong desire to reach the parity goal—a goal from which the American Farm Bureau Federation has never wavered. Congress has certainly shown its overwhelming desire to restore farmers to parity, and farmers are deeply grateful.

To the farmers of America I want to say that in a highly organized democracy such as we live in today, the objective of parity can only be accomplished through organization. Unity must be our watchword and we must demonstrate our unity through membership in strong, independent farm organizations. I am happy to say that a great deal of unity already exists between our great national farm organizations. Last week 15 representatives from each of our big 3 farm organizations—the National Grange, the National Council of Farmer Cooperatives, and the American Farm Bureau Federation—met in Chicago to draft a statement of policy for agriculture in the national emergency. This statement, which expresses the views of the great majority of the farmers of the United States seems so significant to me that I am going to read it as the concluding part of my remarks.

STATEMENT OF POLICY OF FARM CONFERENCE ON THE NATIONAL EMERGENCY

"Agriculture recognizes the seriousness of the present national and international situation affecting the lives, liberties, and security of all our citizens, our democratic ideals and institutions.

"During this acute emergency it is imperative that we have national unity and a willingness to toil and sacrifice on the part of all citizens and all economic groups. We have already demanded of our boys that they make heavy sacrifices. This is no time for any group, whether in industry, labor, or agriculture, to seek a selfish advantage.

"True patriotism and the security of all demand that all groups should contribute their utmost to produce everything essential to national defense with maximum speed and efficiency. Adequate defense requires that there be no stoppage or delay in production and distribution of essential materials or services in industry or agriculture. National safety demands that immediate action be taken to provide adequate means for continuing operations whenever disputes arise, until differences are composed. We recognize the rights of labor and agriculture to organize and to bargain collectively, but the emergency requires immediate, effective authority and action to eliminate all acts or threats of violence, destruction of property, intimidation, coercion, and illegal collusive practices whether in industry, labor, or agriculture.

"The production of food and fiber is essential as a part of the defense program. Agriculture, therefore, is as vital an arm of national defense as any industry engaged in the production of war materials. Agriculture must be accorded equal recognition with industry and labor, and be properly represented on all national-defense agencies by persons who are familiar with agricultural problems and who have the approval of national farm organizations.

"The emergency requires that personal and group selfishness be subordinated to the common good. Therefore, it is in the interest of all the people to develop and maintain a fair economic balance between farm prices, industrial prices, and the wages of labor on a level that will assure the maximum production and consumption of goods and services. Wherever price controls are applied, they must conform to this fundamental principle.

"In order to prevent dangerous inflation and an undue accumulation of debts as a result of the enormous expenditures for national defense, we urge that, insofar as practicable, the costs of the defense program be paid from current income. This requires a tax program with a broad base, in which everyone will take part in accordance with ability to pay. In this emergency all unwarranted profits of industry, labor, and agriculture, should be recaptured by appropriate taxation to help pay the cost of the defense program.

"In order to avoid undue centralization of governmental control and to safeguard the welfare of agriculture as a vital arm of national defense, it is imperative that farmer participation and farmer control be strengthened in all national agricultural programs, that all unsympathetic influences be eliminated from agencies set up to serve agriculture, and that, in line with congressional policy, such agencies be directed to recognize and encourage farmer-owned and farmer-controlled cooperatives and other organized farm groups.

"To the attainment of these objectives we pledge to the President and the Congress of the United States our fullest cooperation and support and to that end we request our executive officers to constitute a committee to take whatever action may be necessary to effectuate this program." What Is Behind Sudden Move To Beat Down Prices of the Necessities of Life?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JED JOHNSON

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 24, 1941

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, during the past several days rumors have been afloat about the Capitol that a strong effort will be made by some of those Members of Congress representing industrial centers to fix the price of all farm commodities. It is also rumored that legislation is now in the making and will actually be presented here during the next few weeks to give Mr. Leon Henderson, Commissioner, Division of Price Stabilization, Office for Emergency Management, power to fix the prices of all the products of the farm.

For some time very few Members of Congress gave any credence whatever to such reports. The proposal is, of course, absurd. However, the rumor has been so persistent that I cannot refrain from expressing my opposition to any such proposed legislation now or in the future.

What seems to be a forerunner of this drastic proposed legislation is a resolution sponsored by the able and distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CASEY]:

Resolved, That there is hereby established a committee to study prices paid for the necessities of life, to be composed of five Members of the House of Representatives.

Just what the author has in mind or considers the necessities of life is, of course, a matter of conjecture. It cannot be denied, however, that the farmers of the country who till the soil from morning until night, year in and year out, furnish the necessities of life. They certainly furnish all food and clothing to peoples of all classes everywhere. Food and clothing must be admitted to be the two most essential necessities of life. Therefore it is only fair to suggest that this resolution is aimed primarily at the farmer. It might be well to consider just what is behind this sudden desire of some to investigate and, if possible, beat down prices of the necessities of life.

All of us know that for the past dozen years the farmer has been producing the necessities of life considerably below the actual cost of production, and now that a few commodities and some livestock have recently risen slightly above parity, a few of our professed friends from the industrial sections of the East have become very much alarmed. They seem fearful lest the farmer might at last secure a reasonable profit above his actual cost of production for some of his farm commodities that make up the necessities of life.

I note also that in section 2 of this same resolution describing the duties of the proposed committee that "it shall investigate the problems facing the purchases of goods in the markets of the country."

I cannot support such a resolution at this time, nor any of the similar resolutions and bills that are to follow, which I have every reason to believe is to be aimed at agriculture. If a committee of Congressmen is to be appointed to investigate any wrongdoing, I shall insist that the resolution be broadened to include more than a mere investigation of the necessities of life and the purchase of goods in the markets of this country. Certainly any resolution should be broad enough to investigate profiteers who are taking advantage of the present emergency for their own personal gain. There is no use fooling ourselves there is a lot of profiteering going on at this time. Why not have a real congressional investigation of every phase of profiteering? Why not find out why some of the shoe manufacturers have taken advantage of the present emergency to raise the price of shoes sold to the Army more than 33⅓ percent? We might investigate the raincoat and overcoat manufacturers and those persons and concerns who are securing contracts of various kinds under the national-defense program. We might do well to investigate certain of the $1 per year "patriots," some of whom are reported to be interested in Government contracts. Let us see that all profiteers and would-be profiteers get a good, sound investigation.

Another thing Congress might well investigate is the price of everything the farmer must purchase to be used on the farm. The farmer would like to know why the price of his binder, plow, cultivator, mower, rake, and hoe—in fact, all of his farm machinery—has increased from 25 to 50 percent during the past few months. Let us make the investigation thorough. Surely the things that the farmer is compelled to buy in order to make a respectable living and feed the world should come under the caption of necessities of life.

American Farm Bureau, American Federation of Labor, and National Catholic Welfare Conference Express Support for House Joint Resolutions 59 and 76

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 27, 1941

STATEMENTS OF EDWARD A. O'NEAL, PRESIDENT, AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION; PAUL SCHARRENBERG, AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR; AND REV. R. D. McGOWAN, NATIONAL CATHOLIC WELFARE CONFERENCE

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, it is a distinct honor for me to be able to include with my remarks three splendid statements from three of the outstanding organizations of our country in support of my resolutions to create an outstanding commission to develop now a program that will basically solve unemployment and prevent a depression from resulting after this period of defense spending is over.

The statements are as follows:

STATEMENT OF EDWARD A. O'NEAL, PRESIDENT, AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION, TO COMMITTEE ON LABOR, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JUNE 27, 1941

For several years, the American Farm Bureau Federation has been advocating a national conference or series of conferences of the leaders of agriculture, industry, labor, and government to iron out their differences and formulate a constructive program that will restore and maintain a fair economic balance between these great economic groups.

In December 1938 at the annual meeting of the Federation in New Orleans, a strong resolution was adopted urging the President to call such a conference; "to call together representatives of industry, labor, and agriculture selected from a list of those recommended by the duly selected leaders of the three major economic groups, to discuss a program of action designed to promote economic balances between these groups on a basis that will permit full utilization of our great productive resources." The resolution further urged "that in view of the serious effect of the present maladjustment, these representative leaders be kept in session until they have agreed upon such a program."

I desire to insert in the record the full text of this resolution.

From time to time we have reiterated this recommendation. At our last annual meeting in Baltimore, last December, the following resolution was adopted:

"Domestic unity

"Agriculture will do its part in promoting domestic unity and domestic harmony. Such unity and harmony between groups has always been important and now it is vital. For the past decade and more the farmer has not enjoyed parity with industry or with labor in the prices of his products. The American Farm Bureau Federation has always favored a common understanding and a common approach to this problem by the three large groups which comprise our economic life.

"It is now of especial importance that we solve our problems in conference rather than in conflict. We again invite and challenge the leaders of industry and the leaders of labor to join with agricultural leadership in a conference or conferences to solve our common problems, and establish economic balance."

During the past few years we have held numerous forums in which leaders of agriculture, industry, and labor have participated. Many of us have participated in the well-known Fortune magazine round-tables. My experience with these discussions by representative key leaders of our great economic groups leads me to believe that much constructive progress could be achieved if a means can be found through which the representative leaders of agriculture, industry, labor, and Government can sit around the table and discuss the great fundamental problems and issues that are so vital to the welfare of the whole Nation and formulate definite policies and measures to restore and maintain a fair economic balance in our economy.

For that reason, I wish to strongly endorse the method of procedure set forth in House Joint Resolution 59 by Congressman VOORHIS, of California, which provides for the establishment of a national commission to be composed of representatives of the Senate and House of Representatives, the executive branch of the Government, and representatives of farmers' organizations, labor unions, business associations, and church organizations.

Perhaps three representatives of each would result in too large a commission. I believe that the executive officers of the national farm organizations, labor organizations, business organizations, and religious organizations would provide the most effective type of representation. This would have a very important advantage in that these men, duly elected by their respective organizations, could speak with authority for vast segments of our population, and through the machinery of their organizations, could quickly and effectively carry back to a very large segment of the people, the conclusions and recommendations of the commission. They could quickly mold public opinion to support whatever program is worked out.

That is the main reason why I do not like the type of commission proposed in House Joint Resolution 76, which provides for a governmental type of commission composed of representatives of the House and Senate and six other members to be appointed by the President. I am skeptical of the results which might be attained by such a body. We have had a great many investigations and studies by governmental agencies of many kinds. All too often they conduct extensive studies and file their reports which are valuable and informative, but that is the end of the matter.

I want to see some constructive action emerge from such a study. I do not believe we are going to get the kind of action we need without enlisting the interest and participation of the responsible leaders of these great organized economic groups in our Nation.

No one group can solve its problems by itself. The agricultural problem cannot be solved by farmers alone; the farmer is dependent upon workers for his markets and upon business for the distribution of a large part of what he sells and what he buys. The problems of labor cannot be solved by labor alone; the farmers and those directly dependent upon them provide the largest single market for products of labor. Neither can industry alone solve its problems. It can increase its efficiency and control its production and prices, but farmers and workers constitute their market.

If we are to achieve a fair economic balance that will permit the maximum utilization of our goods and services and the maximum income for all the people, we must act together in the spirit of unity rather than conflict.

Important segments of industry organized to control production and prices of their products to raise them and maintain them at levels relatively much higher than the rest of the economy. Then labor organized to raise its wages and shorten its hours and maintain these unit wages as far as possible during depression periods. Agriculture in self-defense and for self-preservation resorted to production control to try to get its prices up to parity with industrial prices and industrial wages. But we cannot keep this process up indefinitely. Artificially high unit prices for goods and wages tend to restrict consumption and to prevent the maximum utilization of goods and services.

We believe the national interest will best be served if industry will place greater emphasis upon volume production and total profits rather than depending upon the profit on the unit of production, and that the best interests of labor, as well as the Nation, will be served by placing much greater emphasis upon maintaining an adequate income for labor earned through increased production rather than keeping the chief emphasis upon hourly wages.

American agriculture stands ready to meet industry and labor on this basis in producing for abundance, but agriculture cannot practice abundant production while industry and labor practice extreme scarcity. We have been doing that too long already; that is one of the main reasons why the purchasing power of agriculture during the past 20 years has been at such low ebb—the farmer has not been able to exchange his goods on a parity basis with the products of industry and labor.

We cannot have the maximum interchange of goods and services between our great economic groups until we restore and maintain a fair economic balance, so that these goods and services can be exchanged on an equitable basis.

When this great emergency period is over, we are going to need such measures to preserve a fair balance and to maintain the largest utilization of goods and services possible. We should begin now to prepare for the grave problems of reconstruction and readjustment which will follow this emergency. We must not allow our economy to collapse as it did after the other World War. We must not repeat the tragic mistakes at the close of the other World War, when the bottom dropped out of farm prices and enormous supplies of farm products which had been built up by farmers to help win the war were dumped on the market with disastrous results. We have learned how to conquer and to harness the destructive forces of nature. We can and should learn how to conquer and utilize the great economic and social forces in a way that will best promote our economy and preserve our ideals of democracy and our democratic institutions.

We are a great and powerful Nation. We have the resources of materials, machines, money, and men to provide an abundance for our entire Nation, the like of which has never been seen. We have demonstrated already what we can do as a free people working through democratic processes and ideals.

We must begin now to meet the grave problems that lie ahead in the spirit of unity in order that we may preserve our freedom and our democratic institutions and maintain a high standard of living.

STATEMENT IN BEHALF OF HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTIONS 59 AND 76 BEFORE THE HOUSE LABOR COMMITTEE, JUNE 25, 1941, BY PAUL SCHARRENBERG, NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE REPRESENTATIVE, AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR

The American Federation of Labor favors the passage of House Joint Resolutions 59 and 76 for several reasons.

It has been said that experience is the best teacher. Our experience of the last World War sheds a calcium light upon this hearing. We entered the last World War with high and noble purposes. We made victory possible and did not ask nor did we receive compensation of any kind. It is not necessary to dwell upon this point. Our record in that respect is well known. Indeed, it speaks eloquently for itself. The point we want to stress is that we took too much for granted. We very generally assumed that after we had licked the Kaiser this world of ours would be a better place to live in and that everything would be all right after victory had been won. Certain qualifications should be noted as regards the official attitude of the American Federation of Labor. The St. Paul convention of the A. F. of L., which met in June 1918, while the war was still in full progress, appointed a committee on reconstruction to thoroughly investigate the problem of reconstruction and to take such steps as might be found possible to safeguard the interest of the soldiers and sailors and workers during the period of reconstruction.

Shortly following the signing of the armistice, this committee on reconstruction submitted a comprehensive report which received the full approval of the A. F. of L. executive council and was subsequently endorsed by the annual convention in Atlantic City.

Several State federations of labor also drafted reconstruction programs. It was my privilege to serve as secretary of the reconstruction committee appointed by the California State Federation of Labor. I vividly recall the energy and enthusiasm we put into the job of planning for a better future.

Unhappily, the political psychology of those days gave us the "return to normalcy." So the various reconstruction proposals were placed on the shelves and the men who had burned the midnight oil to produce these inspiring declarations became sader but wiser men.

The years following the signing of the peace treaty brought untold misery and privation not only to the demobilized soldiers and sailors but to millions of Americans in all walks of life. So-called normalcy finally ran our Nation "head on" into the economic disaster of 1929.

And now we are, shall I say, deeply involved in another World War. As you know, the American Federation of Labor, through its highest officials, has given a solemn pledge to give service to capacity in the present unlimited national emergency. In the language of my distinguished chief, President William Green: "We, the workers, have as much at stake in this world-wide battle for human freedom as any other group in our Nation. We pledge our cooperation, our services, and our devotion."

There are different opinions as to the ultimate result of this war, but we all agree that some day, sooner or later, there must come an end.

Shall we then let history repeat itself? Shall we then again, virtually overnight, throw millions of workers out of munition and airplane factories? Shall we again witness the spectacle of ghost towns designed for shipyard workers, who have suddenly received their dismissal notice? Shall we again add to this great army of newly unemployed the soldiers and sailors who are suddenly returned to private life?

It is to prevent such a catastrophe that the American Federation of Labor lends its support to the resolutions introduced by Mr. VOORHIS.

Social and economic forces are already operating to shape the post-war future. Either we must give serious thought to this matter now, or one day we shall awake to the fatal realization that we are too late.

The patriotism that resists world aggression and defies autocracy is worthy of all praise, but it reaches its highest plane when guided and supplemented by the wisdom that profits by experience and plans for a better future.

The resolutions under consideration may need revisions. The A. F. of L. does not urge their adoption without amendment. For example, we ourselves shall probably suggest amendments. We believe that the proposed membership of 24 for a national commission is top-heavy. We know that in practice a commission of 24 is not generally a smoothly operating body.

However, we do most earnestly and sincerely urge favorable action upon these resolutions. We do so not because of the idealism which inspired these resolutions, but because of their practicability. We support these resolutions because we believe them to be highly constructive in character and excellently designed to benefit not only a part of society but to bring to all the people greater hope for a better day, a brighter life, greater liberty, and a larger degree of prosperity and happiness.

REV. R. S. M'GOWAN, ASSISTANT DIRECTOR SOCIAL ACTION DEPARTMENT, NATIONAL CATHOLIC WELFARE CONFERENCE

Joint Resolutions 59 and 76 provide for a commission to study post-defense unemployment and recommend a program to deal with it.

In the normal course of the abnormal events of our time, the unemployment will be staggering when the defense program subsides. We may soon be using even as much as half of our physical and human productive capacity for defense. If we do not plan right and execute right, we shall have tremendous unemployment when the half, or less, given over to defense, is released to civilian needs. Ironically we shall then, unless we plan now, prove ourselves capable only of employing the people and producing a full supply of goods when foreign war threatens, but incapable of peacetime organization for the peacetime welfare of all the people. That will be the most tragic fate that America could meet.

Both of these joint resolutions provide for a mixed commission of Government representatives and private citizens. Including private citizens is wise. Hardly anyone contemplates that legislative measures, however necessary, are enough. While governmental representatives should be on such a commission, if for no other reason than to plan the needed laws, nongovernmental representatives should be included if for no other reason than to plan action on the nongovernmental and economic field.

Joint Resolution 59 seems superior to Joint Resolution 76 in several important respects. In two of these matters Joint Resolution 76 might be interpreted to mean what Joint Resolution 59 explicitly says.

One is that under Joint Resolution 59 the commission is to study and recommend plans for present unemployment as well as post-defense unemployment. The other is that the commission is specifically to consider both governmental and nongovernmental action. If Joint Resolution 76 is made the basis of this committee's report, it should be amended to cover these two points and not leave it to the commission to decide by interpretation.

For it is not only true that present unemployment needs specific study and handling. It is also true that things can be done during the defense program which can at least cushion the shock of post-defense unemployment. For example, the bad balance among prices and the bad balance among incomes are commonly known to have been the chief causes of unemployment, regardless of the many ramifications of these two causes in the investment market, the financial system, the financing of Government loans, the tax system, foreign trade, etc. By proposing things for the period of the defense program the commission will be better able to propose things to be done afterward, and at the same time propose things that will ease the shock when the defense program subsides. Besides, who knows whether the defense program will not last many years, and how much need there is of doing a tremendous amount to guide the defense program so that we shall not be utterly swamped afterward?

Moreover, legislation on this matter is no cure-all. Few think of legislation as such unless they commit themselves to a Communist or Nazi-Socialist state. Joint Resolution 76 would no doubt be interpreted to include recommendations regarding nongovernmental steps. But it is better to be specific.

Joint Resolution 59 would, however, provide a better commission. Joint Resolution 76 provides a commission of only 12 members and Joint Resolution 59 a commission of 24. When one remembers how great the problem is and how many phases of it have to be treated, the conclusion is plain that any commission would have to divide into subcommittees for more minute consideration of a number of subjects. For example, the problem of prices and parity between agricultural prices and industrial prices and among industrial prices themselves; for example, the cooperation of business, labor, agriculture, and government to secure such prices; for example, the same cooperation for right incomes; for example, taxes; for example, foreign trade; for example, the financing of new enterprises; for example, the system and costs of distributing goods; for example, public works and their place in a program of full production and full employment; for example, the fitting of defense production into production for civilian needs. These are some of the high lights. No doubt a commission in outlining its work will find still other points for minute consideration. A commission of 24 is small enough for such subcommittees. A commission of 12 is, I think, inadequate.

Joint Resolution 76 does not provide for representation of the executive department of the Government, and Joint Resolution 59 does. The executive department is making studies on this matter, chiefly through its Resources Planning Board. That Board, able as it is, cannot do the whole work. Even if it drew up sound plans it could not get the people to accept them out of hand. That makes a general commission necessary. But the executive department has, in fact, great resources of information and experience which forbid its exclusion from such a commission as this. It is true that the commission might simply ask for the compilation and presentation of the information that the executive department possesses. But that would not harness the experience of the executive department. Neither would it allow full use of the executive department's interpretation of the information.

Joint Resolution 59 has another distinct superiority over Joint Resolution 76. Joint Resolution 59 provides that most of the nongovernmental representatives on the commission should be appointed from the people's own economic organizations. Joint Resolution 76 says nothing about who they should be. Joint Resolution 59 is in this respect a great step forward. If we are to make our economic life produce what the people need and get it to them, a large part of the planning and execution has to come through a decent cooperation of business and labor, agriculture, and the consumers. A decent cooperation—indeed, any sort of cooperation—is impossible without its being mainly an organized cooperation. Isolated efforts of lone individuals to cooperate would themselves result in organization. Joint Resolution 59 provides that public representatives on the commission shall come from the economic organizations of business, labor, farmers, and consumers. These organizations the people themselves have voluntarily created and do now voluntarily administer. They are close to the problems that this commission will have to deal with. They are working with those problems day by day. They are in a key position in the execution of any plans this commission would recommend—certainly in all the nongovernmental phases of a program of action, and probably also in several of the recommendations for legislation. To leave them out would be a serious error.

Indeed, the error might turn out to be disastrous. As I read the history of our time, we have turned our back on individualism and threaten now to go collectivist, and the threat of going collectivist arises from the failure or the excessive slowness of the business, labor, farmer, and consumer organizations to work together and to work with government, and of government to work with them, to solve this very problem of unemployment. Collectivism in either its Communist or Nazi form is suicidal. The remedy, granting all right legislation and administration on things that government alone can handle, is the governmentally assisted cooperation of the people's own economic organizations. Joint Resolution 59 recognizes the place of these economic organizations, which even now are going through the process of being educated in working together. Joint Resolution 59 will give them further training and will let them, with the help of Congress and the executive department, work out a program of their own that, so far as their place is concerned, will let us end unemployment and yet not seek to end it by the slavery and war of collectivism.

Joint Resolution 59 has another advantage which at first reading, I must confess, left me cold. The commission would include three representatives of religious organizations—presumably Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish. The more, though, I have thought it over the better I have liked it. What made me cold to it at first was the thought that religion has the purpose of teaching morality, including economic morality, and inspiring people to live up to it, while this commission will necessarily have to consider and plan detailed laws and detailed economic proposals upon which religion, as such, has no competence. But the more I thought it over the more convinced I became that religion ought to be represented.

First, the religious representatives would formally express the morally right thing in economic life. That would be a great advantage, for if a thing is morally wrong it is hopeless in every other way. Second, they might serve to reconcile conflicting interests on the Commission by emphasizing that ending unemployment is a religious obligation. And finally religious representation on the Commission would help, I think, in the distinctly economic and legislative phases of its work, since in each of the three religious bodies there are priests, ministers, and rabbis who have become expert in the economic and legislative means of ending unemployment as well as in the moral laws of economic life.

A special reason why they should be on the Commission is that we reached the state of permanent unemployment, and may reach collectivism, only by denying the religious truth that economic life has something to do with the dignity of every man and the brotherhood of all men. Giving an eighth of the Commission to representatives of religion is a symbol of the hopes of a new time that will be different from the past and yet not be a collectivist night.

The only objection to a commission on unemployment that I can see is that so many of the men in the Senate, the House, the executive department, and business, labor, farm, consumer, and religious organizations are so busy at present work that they can give little time to the future. Joint Resolution 59 provides, however, for alternates to sit for the regular representatives in their absence, and lets us have a continuing Commission of delegates and proxies to continue the work to the end.

Yonder Is the Hill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, this is the season of the year immediately following Father's Day—June 15—when tributes to fathers are very much in vogue.

Among the heartfelt tributes to fatherhood is a poem written by Lewis A. Harding, an outstanding citizen and attorney of Indianapolis, Ind., entitled "Yonder Is the Hill."

This poem expresses the affection of a loving son for his father, the late James L. Harding, who sleeps in the little country cemetery at Rossburg, Decatur County, Ind.

Mr. Harding, my constituent, the author of the tribute, holds three degrees from Indiana University, has taught in high schools and universities, and is widely known as a public speaker.

The poem is as follows:

Yonder is the hill my father saw,
Yonder the road he trod;
Yonder are the self-same woods that draw
Life from the land of God!

Yonder was the school my father had,
Yonder the place he knew;
Yonder was his vale of youth in glad
Light from the realm of blue.

Yonder he is on the vision now,
Yonder the old-time lad;
Glamour of the sickle, team, or plow,
Making his welkin glad.

Yonder he is in the fields of flowers,
Near where the maples bow,
Chasing the gay butterflies for hours,
Yonder or yonder now.

Yonder he was at the brim of life,
Coasting the hill he knew;
Yonder he was, facing peace or strife,
Laying his life out true.

Yonder he is now upon my sight,
Filled with his fire of youth;
Yonder he seeks in the House of Light,
Finding the Way and Truth.

Yonder he was with a lover's soul,
Walking the paths of spring;
Yonder he soon found his lover's toil,
Maiden of worth for king.

Yonder he is in a humble cot,
Guarding a precious bed;
Shedding then swift to an older tot,
Tears; for the babes are dead.

Yonder he was at the grave of those
Roses of love at birth;
Loosing a mother's appalling throes
Clutching her out of earth.

Yonder he is at the break of morn,
Stirring his household folk,
Growing till seven and two were born,
Shielding his home an oak.

Yonder he is among common kings,
Doing the best he can;
Yonder he is in the maze of things,
Making his way a man.

Yonder he was in the toil of day,
Shriven by deaths and pain;
Yonder he was with his heart of play,
Singing an old refrain.

Yonder he was under stormy sky,
Weathering rain or snow;
Yonder he was at the rainbow nigh,
Calm in the matchless glow.

Yonder he is in his years of gray,
Mould for a Senator;
Yonder he is at the end of day,
Sensing his call from far.

Yonder he lies 'gainst the fenceless blast,
Stricken by passioned stroke;
Yonder he lies as his life was cast,
Fallen the solid oak.

Yonder he was on the hilltop blessed,
Laid in his grave so still;
Yonder to hear in the silent rest,
Rain and the whippoorwill.

Yonder he is in forgetfulness,
Far from the pulse of man;
Yonder, O Lord, in quick restfulness,
Quitting earth's course he ran.

Yonder, yes yonder his manly form
Only we see no more;
There it went under in sorrow's storm
Close to the old church door.

Yonder he was then and there he is,
Heaven or here or there;
Yonder he is with the chums of his,
Thunderous, dark and fair.

Yonder he is now and here he was,
Yonder he was and is;
Yonder he is now and there he was,
Ever he was and is.

Yonder he is now for ay with me,
Climbing the Rossburg hill;
Yonder he comes over land and sea,
Rousing the world so still.

Yonder he is, O yes yonder now,
Yonder with saints of his;
Yonder with glory and peace of brow,
Yonder he ever is.

Yonder then nearer he gleams again,
Climbing the hills of gold;
Yonder he walks with the saved of men,
Heavenly scene untold.

Lo, from yon hills does he straightway fly,
Down to the place I stand;
Folding me close he uplifts me high,
Into that Eden land.

Yonder, then yonder I walk with him,
Glory in old and new;
What a voice—vision—and what a vim—
Father! — is — is — this you!

I am thus heir of the heights sublime,
Into the heavens hurled;
Borne by the strength of this father of mine
Gone from the life-time world.

Yonder — anew — is the hill he saw,
Yonder — the road he trod;—
Haunts of the heart that forever draw
Up from that sacred sod.

ARTICLE BY WALTER LIPPMANN

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Walter Lippmann, entitled "Russian Policy and American Defense."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TODAY AND TOMORROW

(By Walter Lippmann)

RUSSIAN POLICY AND AMERICAN DEFENSE

If it were certain—if, indeed, it were probable—that the Nazi and the Soviet Armies will destroy one another, it would still be dangerously unwise for the United States to sit back and relax. There would still be needed our utmost power and effort to restore some kind of order and sanity in our world. But, in fact, the notion that Nazi Germany and Soviet Russia will exhaust one another is wishful thinking of the most reckless sort.

Our policy and our attitude must be based not upon the gambler's hope in the highly improbable but upon a stern calculation that in European Russia the German Army is much more powerful than the Russian. The measures we take now should be based on the assumption that Hitler's forces will be tied up in Russia only for a relatively short time, and that in this short time we must fortify and reinforce our position in both oceans.

The American policy should be based not on wishes, emotions, or ideologies but on the fundamental fact that we have to defend our vital interests in two oceans and that we possess a one-ocean navy. The avowed strategy of our enemies, as set forth in the Japanese-German-Italian pact of last September, is to render the American Navy impotent in the Atlantic by tying it up in the Pacific. By this device, which has thus far been highly successful, the defense of the Western Hemisphere against the European Axis has come to depend almost entirely upon Great Britain, with no real support from our own sea power.

The position is intolerably dangerous. For if the British resistance were broken for lack of reinforcements, the American naval position in the Atlantic would be desperate, and in the effort to save it the American position in the Pacific would have to be sacrificed. Thus our fleet, now standing guard in the Pacific, would fail to hold what it is now guarding, and it would be confronted with the infinitely difficult task of policing defensively a whole hemisphere against surprise attack in both oceans by superior forces striking from better situated strategic bases.

Since we have to defend ourselves with the Navy we possess, not with the Navy we intend to have in 1946, and with what forces we can create in the near future, the fundamental object of our policy must be to unlock American sea power, which is now almost completely immobilized in the middle of the Pacific Ocean. We cannot afford at this critical time to have the most powerful navy in the world, our own greatest weapon, pinned down by the diplomacy of the Axis.

It is of vital importance, to be sure, that the whole position in the southwestern Pacific—in China, Malaya, the Netherlands Indies, the Philippines, and Australia—should be made invincible. But though the American Navy, as it is now placed, has protected that position, we must ask ourselves very carefully now whether what looks like the protection of the Pacific is not becoming a snare and a delusion. It would be just that if it turned out that we had allowed this powerful fleet to be immobilized at Hawaii while the position in the Atlantic was allowed to go from bad to worse. For in that event the fleet would have to be withdrawn from the Pacific to protect this hemisphere from direct attack. Thus the fleet which is wholly occupied in guarding the Pacific would no longer be able to guard the Pacific.

A way must be found to guard the Pacific and at the same time to liberate American sea power for much freer action in both oceans. The American Navy, we must realize, is by the ingenuity of the Axis diplomacy, locked up so that at the crisis of this great struggle it may be able to do little harm to the Axis and no great good to us. Pinned down as it is in the Pacific, it is superior to Japan. But it would be unable to fight Japan if Japan struck only if the British position in the Atlantic crumbled. Then if that happened, this great navy would have to give the Japanese a free hand while most of it rushed off to save a desperate position in the Atlantic Ocean. And with a free hand Japan would then be able to coerce us into dividing our fleet so as to get some protection in the Pacific.

This problem—the basic problem of American defense—is not at all insoluble, and indeed immense progress has been made recently toward making it feasible to solve it decisively. A system of defense, based primarily upon air power and submarines, has been organized in the region from the Philippines to Singapore, and since Japan's great and irremediable weakness is her lack of air power, the position in the southern Pacific is not nearly so vulnerable as it was a few months ago. The firm attitude of the Netherlands Indies in negotiating with Japan reflects this radical improvement in the position.

This relieves to a considerable degree the demands upon the American Navy. For it is no longer the only force available to check Japanese expansion southward and Japanese closing of the road to free China. This has justified such transfers of American ships from the Pacific to the Atlantic as have been recently under way.

But while there can be no question of leaving the Pacific, other moves may now be possible which will give the fleet still greater freedom of action—still greater freedom, that is to say, to go wherever it is most needed without surrendering anything of importance in the Pacific. These possibilities arise from Germany's war against Russia. For now Russian Siberia is in a position where, unless there is a collapse throughout Russia, Siberia can no longer collaborate with the Axis. If regardless of what happens in European Russia, the Russian Army, Air Force, and Navy in the Far East do not fall under Axis control, then our whole position in the Far East—that of the American Navy, of the Chinese armies, of the British and Dutch—will be greatly improved. For with the Russians in Siberia, the new defenses in the south Pacific, the reinforcement of China, and the increased freedom of the American Fleet, we shall have come a long way from the days when Mr. Matsuoka signed the triple-Axis pact last September.

When we ask ourselves what should be our Russian policy, we should not be children and fall into quarrels about words, ideologies, or vain schemes to intervene in the war in European Russia. Our Russian policy should be that of adult men asking to serve the vital interests of the United States, and that means that we should concentrate our Russian policy on Siberia: First, in order to prevent Siberia from falling under Axis control; second, as a means of stabilizing the Far East, and, above all, as a means of disrupting and dislocating the triple Axis so that American sea power may no longer be immobilized.

America First Rally at Dubuque, Iowa

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURTON K. WHEELER

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 28 (legislative day of Thursday, June 26), 1941

ADDRESS BY THE MOST REVEREND FRANCIS J. L. BECKMAN

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a Nation-wide radio address by His Excellency, the Most Reverend Francis J. L. Beckman, Archbishop of Dubuque on the occasion of the America First rally at Dubuque, Iowa, on June 21, 1941.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Duty can be a stern and terrible thing. In every man's life there are obligations and responsibilities which may not be shirked except at the expense of others. The discarded burdens of irresponsible people but add to the load upon other shoulders. A neglected duty today may bring disastrous consequences tomorrow, and even at this fateful hour decisions are being made which may profoundly affect whole generations of the unborn.

And so, my dear friends, tonight finds me heavy-hearted but determined, at this microphone. As a prince of the church, this time, not alone as a citizen, do I bring my message—a message delivered in line of bitter duty and intended primarily for the children of that flock over which I am bound as shepherd to watch zealously. If in addition, I can bring some comfort by means of this broadcast to millions of my fellow-citizens—that shall be.

To begin with, let us be clear on one point: On the day that our Congress repealed the arms embargo with the pretext "it would keep us out of war"—on that day our people were tricked into the parlor of the interventionists. On that occasion I joined my plea with those of my countrymen who were valiently striving to prevent repeal of this law because they were far-sighted enough to see in such action a first step toward war. But over our earnest plea to the Congress the lying tongues of the hypocrites prevailed. With "measures short of war" they proceeded diabolically, step by step, maneuvering us to the very brink of military involvement which is our position at this moment.

Who would have dreamed 5 years ago that we would thus be led again by the propagandists? And the climax of all this trickery—that monstrous perpetration upon our people who found no vote for war or peace at the November polls. The same bloody brigands who had their way in the last war saw to that. The democracy of which they prattle so effusively was for all present purposes, if I may borrow the phrase, "sold down the river" on November 5. What a great laugh these Judas Iscariots and Benedict Arnolds must have enjoyed next day at the expense of the trusting millions; and, tragically, what a great laugh at the expense of all our beloved America stood for.

Yet it is not enough that our people should be humiliatingly subjected to the vile indignity of the lie, but for those who cry the truth now come the slurs and the revilings. From the temples of the moneyed mighty the flood of denunciation rolls forth: "These are not of Christ; these are not of democracy—bundists, Communists, pacifists—these are all of the same stamp; disregard them—crucify them." But, oh, take comfort, people, for if Christ Himself were this moment to return and confront these modern Herods, and Pilates, and Neros for their crimes before the world, He, too, would be crowned by them a bundist.

Therefore, proudly conscious of your own strength, you dear fathers and mothers, you of all faiths and earnest patriotic convictions, you Americans stand up courageously with Christ to your persecutors and make your louder voice for peace prevail. Even the valiant English would understand that in thus acting we, the united 83 percent, are merely at long last exercising our prerogative as a democratic majority. If our letters and our telegrams are not enough, let us represent ourselves personally to the governmental authorities. This criminal betrayal of our people at the hands of the few must never be consummated; for, indeed, the future of all morality, of confidence in government and the democratic process hinges on the proof that our people still do the debating and the deciding. Imagine, the suicidal stupidity of risking our own democracy at home while vainly trying to impose it abroad.

It has been said that there are two sides to this question, and our interventionist brethren accuse us of "ostrich" tactics. To them we would answer and appeal in all earnestness: "What proof have you that your side of the matter is the just one? The American people took your advice 24 years ago and emerged from the chamber of horrors wiser and sadder after Versailles. Now it is our turn to have our way."

Mr. President. I address you humbly and with all the dignity which becomes your high office; in the name of the 83 percent whose will has been grossly disparaged, also in the name of my spiritual children over whose welfare I am gravely concerned, Mr. President, I respectfully address you:

You have given the people of these United States your solemn pledge that the youth of our land will not be sent to fight in any foreign wars. We choose to believe that that pledge was given unequivocally and without mental reservation of any kind. To repudiate that pledge, Mr. President, would be to break down the last vestige of public trust in Government. For if we cannot trust your word, then in whom of our governmental leaders are we to trust? As a churchman, therefore, I solemnly adjure you not to break faith with our people.

I realize, Mr. President, the extreme difficulty of your position; for on the one hand you are faced with a small but formidable group who control the economic life lines of the Nation, and on the other—the people. Little people, to be sure, with little power of themselves, but, united in peaceful democratic existence behind an impregnable defense they could constitute an invincible moral weapon with which to beat the very brains out of communism, fascism, nazi-ism, and all "isms" everywhere. Take heart, Mr. President: free yourself of those who are evilly attempting to influence you against the majority will. In this you will most certainly have the united support and acclaim of all our people.

Their immediate destinies and the destinies of millions everywhere at this moment lie in your powerfully equipped hands. In temporarily surrendering this power, Mr. President, the people expect and have every confidence that you will use it in conformity with your pledges. Yours is indeed the opportunity of a whole era in history. The role of a peacemaker is the role of a true child of God and one appreciated by all mankind save those whose interests dictate war. For my part, Mr. President, I would rather go down fighting the cause of peace, suffering any abuse and persecution, than to stand idly by while millions of our youth are prepared for the slaughter. I repeat, with the great prelate of the east, that the continuation of this senseless war truly means the end of our civilization, with complete moral, spiritual, and material collapse at the end of the long road.

No, Mr. President, this time we promise you that the opposition of our people will not be broken down. Your pledges will be kept because we will help you keep them. This time the golden calf must go unworshipped, the sacrificial altars unadorned. Our boys are staying home, and in your own words "they are going into training to form a force so strong that of its very nature it will keep the threat of war from our shores." May God bless and guide you in this critical hour.

What the Great Interior Is Thinking in Regard to the War Issues

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 20, 1941

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, with war provokers, mainly on the eastern seaboard, trying by every hook and crook to force the President into war, the Gallup Institute of Public Opinion comes along with another poll on my proposed constitutional amendment to give the people a right to vote on participation in foreign wars—the sixth poll it has taken on that subject—and the result, as on all former occasions, shows a majority of the American people to be in favor of that proposal, which is as fundamentally democratic as any of the guaranties of the Bill of Rights. Deeply and ineradicably embedded in the convictions of the American people is the thought that those who have to suffer and, if need be, to die, and to bear the unspeakable burdens and costs and griefs of war, should have something to say as to whether we shall enter foreign conflicts across the seas. This conviction is almost universal among the women of our country, and why should it not be? Women go down into the shadow of the valley of death to bring our boys into the world. Why should they not have something to say as to whether their own flesh and blood shall be hurled into the hell of a foreign conflict?

While the war provokers, and their stooges, the columnists, are trying, unpatriotically and I think disrespectfully, by all of the arts of cajolery and bulldozery to induce the President to take the fateful steps into war, the great interior of the country remains calm and sane. By the great interior I mean all of the vast expanse of the country from the Alleghenies to the Pacific coast. There is no saner spot in all of that section than my home State of Indiana. I was born and brought up among those people. I am bone of their bone and flesh of their flesh and I know how they feel about the climactic issues of the times. Illustrative of how they feel, and typical of the sentiment of the great interior, was the poll taken recently by the Indianapolis News, one of the really great journals of America and of the world, which showed 95 percent of our people to be opposed to entering the European war and 92 percent of them opposed to convoys, because they believe convoys would lead to war.

In the great interior there is unity—unity in favor of national defense and unity against going into the European war. The unity for the first of these proposals—national defense—is 100 percent perfect. For the last—staying out of European wars—it is at least 95 percent, and the 95 percent are determined that the 5 percent are not going to drag us into the war. That is flat.

The determination of the great interior that America shall stay out of a shooting war and that there shall be no expeditionary force into foreign lands has become set and solidified during the last few weeks and it is now stronger than ever before.

If I were to undertake to interpret the composite mind of the great interior I would say that some of the thoughts to which our people universally subscribe are these:

First. They are Americans first, last, and all the time. They want our policy to be an American policy.

Second. We already have gone too far in undertaking to manage the affairs of the world. Ankara, Damascus, and Singapore are outside our bailiwick.

Third. Britain is entitled to such aid as we can give her, but not to the extent of our entanglement.

Fourth. We are woefully lacking in military equipment and, in any program to aid Britain, we must bear in mind the staggering deficiencies in our own requirements for defense.

Fifth. Too many provocative speeches are being made by our war-minded statesmen and too many inflammatory articles and editorials are being printed.

Sixth. America's best policy, both from the standpoint of its own future and its opportunity for service to humanity, is to keep out of the war. If we enter the conflict we become just one more belligerent, taking over a fight we did not start and matching our inexperience and lack of equipment with the strength of the most efficient and highly mechanized war powers in the world. If we stay out we will inevitably become the logical leader in reconstructing a new and better world out of the ashes of the present conflict.

These six points, I believe, truthfully represent the line of thinking of the great interior. I find that out there the people, while they do not understand some of the moves that have been made, have faith that the President will not be stampeded by the war promoters. They are quoting with assurance his final word of the late campaign at Boston, on October 30, when he said:

> And while I am talking to you, fathers and mothers, I give you one more assurance. I have said this before, but I shall say it again, and again, and again, your boys are not going to be sent into any foreign wars.

The people of the great interior support the President's attitude as expressed in that speech, and they are back of him in his efforts to keep this country out of foreign wars. They are enthusiastically sustaining him in his purpose to build up our defenses so that no foreign foe would ever dare to violate the peace of the United States or any other country in the Western Hemisphere.

The predominant thought of the great interior approves my proposed constitutional amendment giving the people a right to vote on sending our men into foreign wars and regrets that the amendment is not already a part of the Constitution. Letters pouring in at my office plead for the adoption of the amendment and indicate that there would not now be so much uneasiness throughout the country if it were a part of the Constitution.

By unanimous consent of the House, I present for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a clipping from the New York Times of Friday, June 20, giving the results of the Gallup poll, as follows:

MAJORITY FAVORS WAR REFERENDUM—56 PERCENT WOULD HAVE PEOPLE VOTE ON GREATEST OF ALL ISSUES, GALLUP SURVEY FINDS—ONLY 6 PERCENT ARE UNDECIDED—ANALYSIS REVEALS THE INTEREST TAKEN BY THE PUBLIC IN LUDLOW'S PROPOSAL

(By George Gallup, director, American Institute of Public Opinion)

PRINCETON, N. J., June 19.—The campaign for a national referendum, or vote of the people, on the question of war is being pushed by isolationist groups in Congress. Claiming that the American people have had no opportunity to vote officially on this greatest of all issues, these groups propose a national roll call in which all eligible voters would participate.

The country has been divided on the war referendum idea, with a slight majority in favor, as shown in sporadic checks by the American Institute of Public Opinion. The size of the majority has varied from time to time, running as low as 51 percent when the war broke out to as high as 60 percent in the beginning of 1940. The latest survey on the subject, completed early this month by the American Institute of Public Opinion, shows the following:

"Should a vote of the people be required before Congress can send men to fight overseas?"

	Percent
Yes	56
No	44

Only a small proportion of voters—6 percent—expressed no opinion on the issue.

The referendum proposal was first placed before Congress by Representative LOUIS LUDLOW, of Indiana, who has sponsored it at nearly every recent session. At one time a House resolution to bring the bill to the floor for consideration failed by only a few votes, and the bill has continued to be the center of wide controversy and interest both in and out of Congress.

If a national referendum were taken today on the question whether the United States should go to war now, there can be little question that it would show a large vote against entering the war.

The institute's latest measurement of war sentiment, published May 16, showed the following vote among those with opinions:

"If you were asked to vote on the question of the United States entering the war against Germany and Italy, how would you vote—to go into the war or to stay out of the war?"

	Percent
Go in	21
Stay out	79

Hess, Nazi Buchmanite, Plots in Britain To Switch War Against Russia—German Peace Terms Revealed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEE E. GEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 28, 1941

ARTICLE FROM IN FACT, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article from the little publication, In Fact. It makes interesting reading:

[From In Fact, New York, N. Y., of June 30, 1941]

HESS, NAZI BUCHMANITE, PLOTS IN BRITAIN TO SWITCH WAR AGAINST RUSSIA—GERMAN PEACE TERMS REVEALED

Simultaneously with Nazi declaration of war on Russia, In Fact has received information from London and from diplomatic officials in Washington telling the secret of Hess' flight, revealing the plot of British appeasers and Buchmanites to switch the war into an Anglo-German war against Russia, and the peace terms which Hitler offers to achieve this end.

Hess, third most important Nazi, it is confirmed, brought a proposal of war and peace—war against Russia which Britain was asked to join, and peace which would repay Britain for aiding Hitler.

The peace terms, In Fact learns from a Washington source which obtained them from the Yugoslav minister, are as follows:

1. Restoration of France with the exception of Alsace and Lorraine.

2. British Empire to be left intact.

3. Restoration to Germany of German East and German West Africa and certain other former colonies.

4. Britain to make peace with Germany and join in the offensive against Russia.

5. Hitler to be given a vast territory from Prussia to the Black Sea, including Kiev, and Ukraine granary, and Odessa.

(At the same time In Fact obtained these peace terms, June 22, the United Press Madrid correspondent obtained a similar set of terms which included "division of Europe into German and British spheres of influence" and "German expansion eastward at Russia's expense.")

In Fact learns from London that the attempt to change the character of the entire World War is still being made, all the principals in the drama being Buchmanites.

Buchmanism, or moral rearmament, is a sort of religion founded by a Pennsylvanian named Frank Nathan Daniel Buchman; it has made great headway in British Tory circles, among Washington pro-Fascist officials, among employers who want loyal labor without paying increased wages, and, strangely enough, among certain American labor leaders—who will be named here.

Hess was revealed as a Buchmanite in a broadcast from London by Collier's representative, William Hillman, but Hillman missed the real story. He reported: "Hess went to Britain as a penitent seeking peace, as a Buchmanite moved to confess his sins and mistakes and those of his Nazi associates and try to plead with the British to help him put an end to the slaughter of men. Hess aimed at peace as a true Buchmanite, who is supposed to stand up and confess his sins, and he has not spared himself or his fellow Nazis."

HESS' MISSION TO BRITISH HITLERITES AND BUCHMANITES

The fact now revealed, despite Churchill's reneging on his promise to make a full statement to Parliament, is that when Hess asked to be directed "to the estate of my friend the Duke of Hamilton," he was getting in touch as planned with one of the foremost leaders in Britain of the pro-Hitler, Tory, Buchmanite groups. May 10, when he landed, Hitler was already deep in plans for the invasion of the Ukraine, as he had predicted in Mein Kampf and openly threatened in prewar speeches.

Amidst all the ballyhoo and propaganda following Hess' flight it now is known that there were a few straight facts—that Hess expected to get gasoline and return in 2 days; that he was deliberately sent to make peace with Britain for the purpose of switching the war.

Another fact, that the landing was made purposely on the land of the Duke of Hamilton, is significant. In Haxey's "Tory MP," which exposes the British ruling class as pro-Hitler, the Duke of Hamilton is hardly mentioned, but one of the most notorious Fascists in Britain is listed as the Marquess of Clydesdale. As In Fact revealed (May 26) the Anglo-German Fellowship was a holding company Hitler set up in Britain for Nazism, with 28 lords and 24 members of Commons as leaders. They counted Lord Lothian a member and Lord Halifax (who just got a degree at Harvard) as an agent whom they sent to visit Hitler (London Times, December 3, 1937). The Astors, Vickers, Lever the soap king, Lazard Bros. the bankers, and Thomas Cook were members. But Clydesdale was mentioned along with the two others as most influential in Nazi affairs in Britain. Since Clydesdale's father died after Haxey wrote his exposure, it is this same pro-Nazi who is now known as the new Duke of Hamilton.

This Hamilton has been known as a sympathizer with Buchmanism as well as Hitlerism. His sister-in-law, Lady Prunella Douglas-Hamilton, is a Buchmanite volunteer worker. The duke is the fourth largest landlord in Britain.

BUCHMANISM, THE ORIGINAL APPEASEMENT MOVEMENT

Neville Chamberlain and almost all the appeasers of Munich, journalists of the Beaverbrook and Rothermere press who advocated fascism, and the Nazi movement in Britain were filled with Buchmanism. This was natural. The entire idea of this American "religion," which is also known as M. R. A. and Oxford Group, is appeasement.

In America the Buchmanites plead for unity and for peace between capital and labor, between employer and employee; they are against strikes and list among their adherents many notorious labor-fighters, such as, Harry Chandler, of the Los Angeles Times; Louis B. Mayer, of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer; Paul Shoup, of the Southern Pacific; Elmer Howlett, of the Merchants & Manufacturers Association. Incredible as it may appear, Buchmanism also has a number of union labor leaders on its list.

A few weeks ago 50 members of Parliament passed the following resolution: "That this house, observing that the organization led by Dr. Buchman has made no public utterance in condemnation of Hitler and other aggressors; believing that its activities have been harmful to the British cause in many countries * * * urges that the president of the board of trade revoke the license granted * * *." A. P. Herbert, writer and Oxford's member of Parliament, had previously protested the use of "Oxford" by Buchman, but 33 members of Commons, 25 lords, 12 baronets, 21 leading journalists were Buchmanites, and Buchman got his incorporation (Parliamentary Reports, Hansard, June 13, 1939).

BUCHMAN FOR HITLER, MUSSOLINI, FRANCO

The Buchmanites boasted in 1939 that the surrender of Czechoslovakia to Hitler was their work.

Buchman spoke glowingly of Mussolini and openly endorsed Hitler. "I thank heaven for a man like Adolf Hitler," he said (Time, September 7, 1936). He also declared, "Human problems * * * could be solved with a God-controlled democracy—or should I say theocracy—and through a God-controlled Fascist dictatorship." He also said, "Spain has taught us what Godless communism will bring." Zion's Herald (Methodist) replied: "God-controlled fascism! The terms are mutually exclusive. As well talk of a God-controlled hell. When God controls, fascism is thereby ruled out."

Among Buchman's converts were several Nazi baronesses, Nazi leaders, American Wall Street men who (Dr. Shipler, editor of the Churchman, reported) were the most vicious anti-Semites; Jewish rich men, including Louis Mayer and other Hollywood employers; and, strangely enough, labor leaders.

Despite Buchman's open declaration for Hitlerism, fascism, appeasement, and reaction, he has been able to mail out thousands of endorsements from William Green, president, American Federation of Labor; David Dubinsky, of the International Ladies Garment Workers; Daniel J. Tobin, president, Brotherhood of Teamsters; James B. Carey, national secretary, C. I. O.; and George Harrison, vice president, A. F. of L.

In Fact wrote Dubinsky, Tobin, and Carey, saying they were probably unaware when they endorsed Buchmanism that Buchman had endorsed Hitler; also that Buchman's labor appeasement was intended to "soothe labor, disarm labor, stop strikes, make peace between the lion and lamb (capital and labor) with the lamb inside the lion. If you know anything at all about M. R. A., you know it is antilabor."

Both Dubinsky and Tobin have not replied. Carey, whose name appeared on Buchmanite literature 2 years ago, writes In Fact: "You are more than mistaken should you say that I have endorsed the moral rearmament movement of Dr. Frank Buchman."

The latest broadside issued by Buchman is entitled "You Can Defend America." It pleads for teamwork in industry, which every labor leader knows means not asking for better wages or working conditions. The Buchman broadside repeats the stale lie that "France failed in the factory before she failed at the front." The appeal is a typical National Association of Manufacturers' propaganda hand-out against labor. But with it went a letter from A. F. of L. President Green saying he hoped it would be "in the hands of every union man in the country * * * (and all citizens) to strengthen their spirit for endurance and sacrifice."

The Hess appeasement campaign in Britain is the most important Buchmanite movement to date. In Fact has no information on the degree of its success, but many Washington observers, pointing out that Winston Churchill was the principal organizer of the numerous international invasions of Russia from 1918 to 1923, believe that Hitler would not have attacked Russia this week without assurances from important sections of the British upper class—Tories and Buchmanites—that they will try to switch the war at an appropriate moment to aid fascism.

An Aluminum Plant for Arkansas of Tremendous Benefit to that State and the Economy of the Southwest—Excerpts from O. P. M. News Release and Recommendation

HON. CLYDE T. ELLIS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 28, 1941

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, at long last it appears that aluminum is going to be produced in the State of Arkansas where 95 percent of the Nation's bauxite deposits are located. For decade upon decade our rich bauxite deposits have been hauled out of my State, and about all we have received in return has been a hole in the ground.

Late yesterday the Office of Production Management announced that it has recommended to the War Department the immediate construction of a huge aluminum plant somewhere in Arkansas capable of producing 100,000,000 pounds annually.

Furthermore, the O. P. M. announced in the same statement that the chief source of power will be from the Grand River and Brazos dams and from the sour-gas fields of Texas, Louisiana, and Arkansas, practically all of which will be delivered to the plant over Rural Electrification transmission lines.

In this announcement I see a fourfold victory for the people:

First. The Aluminum Co. of America's monopoly is being broken in spite of that company's previous indications that there would be no shortage of aluminum.

Second. The national-defense program will be greatly accelerated.

Third. This is a victory for public power. Private utility companies have fought the public power program consistently, claiming they can furnish sufficient power for any industries for Arkansas. These companies collapsed in their efforts in this instance, and R. E. A. came to the rescue through its connections with certain public power projects. The transmission system that will be built to this plant, wherever it is located, will anticipate, and include, the huge power projects under construction and projected on the White and Ouachita Rivers.

Fourth. This plant will greatly benefit the economy of Arkansas. Next to Mississippi, we are the most agricultural of all the States, and thus far in this war, as in World War No. 1, the trend had been to locate industries in the North and East at the expense of the South and the West.

The location of an aluminum plant in Arkansas in connection with her public power development marks the beginning of a new day for the Wonder State. This, however, must be only the beginning of a great industrial program for a State whose undeveloped natural resources rank her No. 1 in the Nation and whose average per capita income, because of the lack of such development, is third from the lowest of the 48 States.

The present aluminum capacity in the United States is 800,000,000 pounds annually. That of Germany alone is over 1,000,000,000 pounds. The 100,000,000-pound increase from Arkansas is part of her program to increase the Nation's capacity to 1,400,000,000 pounds annually.

The recommendation by Director William S. Knudsen was based on a joint report by the Federal Power Commission and the Office of Production Management. I quote a significant statement from the O. P. M. release:

> New aluminum plants should be located where they will be economically sound after the emergency.

O. P. M. also stated that—

> It is contemplated at the present time that all the new plants involved in these recommendations will be Government owned but privately operated under a lease arrangement.

The recommendation pointed out that 67,500 kilowatts of the power is to come from the "Brazos and the Grand River hydro developments and the Gilmer and Arsenal Hill Diesel plants now under construction."

The text of the recommendation also contains the following statement:

> The aluminum plant should be located in relation to these ultimate sources of power supply. Production of additional 100,000,000 pounds annually will be possible (in Arkansas) when new gas-fired steam plants have been built.

It is significant that each of these new plants will depend ultimatetly upon public sources for its power. It is important to observe that the public power developments of this country which have been fought constantly by the private power octapus are coming to the aid of the country in this critical hour and that private power developments are wholly inadequate and cannot be depended upon.

The Development of Our Domestic Resources of Strategic Metals—Adverse Effect of Reducing the Tariff on Tungsten Proposed in Reciprocal Trade Agreements With Argentina

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 27, 1941

STATEMENT OF HON. COMPTON I. WHITE, OF IDAHO, TO THE COMMITTEE FOR RECIPROCITY INFORMATION

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, in the period since our Government has gone into our western mining States to make wholesale withdrawals of public lands, to establish forest reserves, grazing districts, national parks, and Federal monuments, the development of our mining resources has been serious retarded. Restrictive measures on corporation financing by the Securities and Exchange Commission has further reduced the opportunities to develop new mines.

During the same period and more recently mining in Canada has made great advances due to the liberal and constructive policy on the part of the Canadian Government, which is being reflected in the increased business prosperity of the Dominion, while mining in our Western States has languished under the handicap of lack of roads to open up isolated areas in the national forests and Government-owned lands due to the indifference and neglect of Government officials and the downright opposition to mining development in some departments of our Government.

Canada, by its constructive and liberal policy in the development of its mineral resources, has surpassed us in the production of gold and greatly increased its production of other metals found in the Dominion. It has taken the emergency of a threatened war to direct the attention of our Government to the vital necessity of developing our own resources of mineral and strategic metals. At this late day the long-sustained campaign of a few western stalwarts in Congress to overcome bureaucratic indifference and opposition is becoming effective with most encouraging results.

The activities of the United States Geological Survey and the Bureau of Mines have succeeded in uncovering immense sources of supply of strategic mineral in our Western States. With this accomplished when we are on the eve of a period of expansion and mining development to provide an adequate supply of sorely needed and vitally important strategic minerals to be mined within our own borders, this development program that has been worked out with so much technical skill and expense by one branch of the Government, is menaced by a program of another Government agency, the Department of State, in the negotiations being undertaken with Argentina to reduce the tariff on tungsten.

In this connection I insert my statement made to the members of the Committee for Reciprocity Information of the Tariff Commission urging that tungsten be removed from the provision of the agreement to be negotiated with Argentina and also for the continued protection of our livestock industry:

STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE COMPTON I. WHITE, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE FIRST DISTRICT OF IDAHO

Secretary WHITCOMB. Representative WHITE, of Idaho.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, coming from the State of Idaho, I come before you to discuss two of the commodities that are being considered in the proposed trade agreement to be entered into between the United States and the Republic of Argentina.

I may say at the outset that I am in sympathy with and voted for the policy of the reciprocal trade agreement, not to go back into history and discuss the national issues of the tariff and all that, but I will say that I have long felt that some scientific, impartial, and nonpartisan system should be adopted, and I think this is the nearest approach that has ever been attempted in this country. It is a great constructive measure, and I am in sympathy with it, and I have defended it, in my own district from unreasonable attack.

I appreciate the need of expanding our own markets to increase prices and prosperity in our country through our international trade, and I realize that under monetary and financial conditions today we must have some exchange of commodities, either manufactured articles or the raw materials, and I think that the policy that has been adopted by our Department of State in this administration is one of the most constructive that has ever been undertaken.

I say that at the outset of this presentation, I think that in considering these commodities and the mechanics of the program, care must be exercised that we protect our own interests and our own commodities, for the best interests of the American people.

Now, I want to come to you first to talk about tungsten, and I am going at this point to earnestly urge your committee to remove tungsten from the consideration in these negotiations just as you removed lead from the considerations in your trade agreements with Canada.

We are now on the verge of a great expansion in this branch of the mining industry, to produce the strategic metal so vital to our steel industry, to our manufacturing industry, and to our national defense—tungsten—and that particular need has long been recognized by the Government and by our branches of the Government in charge of these particular industries, particularly the Bureau of Mines.

In a program to foster this industry the Bureau of Mines, at considerable expense to the Government, has gone into the mining sections of the Western States to make its investigations and to do actual exploration work, at considerable cost, with very favorable results. We are in a position now, if we have any means of protecting this infant industry, to build up a supply for our own need from our own resources.

I have before me a release from the Bureau of Mines from which I desire to quote. This, by the way, is the result of explorations made at considerable expense in my own State of Idaho in a very isolated area. Over two or three mountain ranges, if you please, mining companies have penetrated that country; they have built roads in there; they have opened up a new country; and very unexpectedly the Government itself, operating through the Bureau of Mines, has found great deposits of tungsten. I read from the report issued by the Bureau of Mines, released Monday, March 31, 1941:

"A high-grade deposit of tungsten ore, vital defense material, has been discovered jointly by engineers of the Bureau of Mines and geologists of the Geological Survey.

"The ore was found in the yellow-pine district, Valley County, Idaho, a district well known for its antimonial gold ores, but not previously known to contain tungsten ores.

"Since the maximum dimensions of the ore deposit have not yet been determined, the two agencies reported to the Secretary of the Interior, Harold L. Ickes, no estimate of the reserve tonnage of this strategic mineral is available now, but sufficient information already has been secured to indicate that the discovery may be one of great importance."

This report was made, you will note, on the last day of March. It is now near the end of June and those investigations of that particular district by extending diamond-drill bore holes down through these large deposits, have been very satisfactory.

We have in sight in this particular deposit a very large supply of tungsten ore. The O. P. M. has given priorities to steel material that will be needed in the opening up of this deposit, and all progress is being made in bringing this deposit to production.

In addition to that I may state for the information of this committee that the Bureau of Mines is conducting extensive investigations in five other States, and is finding large deposits of low-grade tungsten ore. The tungsten ore we are dealing with in Idaho is high-grade.

Now, in view of all these circumstances, and in view of the fact that we are importing a large amount of tungsten from other countries—and here I want to give you definite information on the matter—I want to state that from China we import $587,779 worth. I do not have it by tons. From Malaya, $113,063; Mexico, $89,352; Bolivia, $77,342; and from the Argentine, at present, $50,324.

Under present war conditions the reduction of the duty on tungsten ore and concentrates would not result in increased imports, and at this time it would be most harmful to American producers. When the emergency is over, in fact, it may result in our mines being closed down indefinitely. That is something for you gentlemen to consider very seriously.

We will need tungsten for our defense long after this present emergency is over, and by decreasing this duty you will not stimulate imports. You would simply discourage and in fact bar the development of our resources and the work that our Government is undertaking. It can go so far; the Government can prove this tungsten, it can explore the ground, but it takes private initiative and private capital to develop the mines, to bring them into production. And I hope that you gentlemen will just remove this item of tungsten from the articles that are being considered under this trade agreement.

Now, coming to the matter of beef, I want to say a few words and call your attention to a few salient points in connection with our cattle-growing and livestock industry. I do not think there is any industry on which our farming is at present more dependent than the stock-growing industry, for an outlet for some of the products of the farms. You can take it around the circle. I may point to something that I learned not so very long ago, that down in Florida, where they have an excess of sugarcane for grinding, they are not permitted under these quotas to manufacture into cane sugar. They are buying up cattle and using that as material for fattening these cattle and to put them in shape for the market. That is only a minor thing, but when we come to think of our forage, our hay land, our beet-pulp byproduct, that is being used to fatten sheep and cattle; when we think of the byproducts of the flour mills, bran and shorts, and of the wheat manufacturing industries going into feed for cattle, and our corn in the great corn States going into the feed lots to fatten cattle, I say positively that the cattle industry in this country is one of the most important outlets for the raw materials produced on the farm.

And I want to say this to you, that we all appreciate and understand that agriculture has been in a depressed condition for a long time, and the other branches of industry have been taxed pretty heavily to support and assist agriculture to a stable position, and one of the bright spots in agriculture at the present time is the market for cattle and meat. As I pointed out, it is an outlet for the products of other raw materials of the farm, and it would be a serious mistake, as I see it, to bring cattle back into the same position or below the cost of production, which we generally understand the farmers are struggling against in producing the other agricultural products in this country, a condition which the Government is going to step in and attempt to relieve by making very liberal appropriations.

Now, when the production of cattle is helping the situation on the farms to the extent that it is, it would seem to me that by bringing in importations, that will bring the price of cattle down and bring them below the cost of production; that such a program is unthinkable. I hope that you gentlemen will give this matter the most careful consideration, and that you will particularly take into consideration what our domestic market and a fair price for cattle mean.

I want to call your attention, from my own personal experience, to the conditions that prevailed in 1933. I remember going into the market with 100 head of good fat cattle. In fact, I cut out 13 Shelly cows, as we called them, a cow that was not good for a cutter. We hear talk today about canners, but you know a good cow that has produced several calves and is now ready to be turned off, she may be fat and in good shape, but still she is a cutter and falls in that class.

I took these cattle into the yards, into the Union Stock Yards, in November 1933, just the day that the processing tax went into effect on hogs, if you remember, and what do you suppose I got for 100 head of cattle—fat steers and calves and cows, all in good shape, an even 100 head? Well, I got $10.20 a round. I got $1,020. Now, do you think that anybody could say that $10 per head for cattle—and many others got prices within that range—would return the cost of production? Why, they hardly paid for cutting the hay crop that went into the feeding of the cattle, or the wages of the man that fed them, to say nothing of the taxes on the land.

The cattle industry, gentleman, is the basis of the prosperity of the farm in the West. It is the basis of the whole farm economy. A man in the dairy business must turn off his male stock; he must find an outlet for this product, and that is one of the most profitable things under present conditions of the dairy industry; that is, the return from the sale of what you turn off in the way of beef, whether it is male calves, whether it is veal, or steers that you raise or whether you turn off your milk cows or whatever you have. On every farm in the West where they have a farm of any size they keep a little herd of cattle. They may be in the dairying business, they may be in the livestock business, it may be a wheat ranch, but still they keep a few cows; and when the wife wants a new dress or they want to make a payment on the automobile and particularly when they must pay taxes they can sell a steer, and I will tell you, when you go into this cattle matter you are going right to a very responsive spot in the whole national economy.

Chairman RYDER. We are very glad to have your statement. You understand, do you, that neither cattle nor beef are included in this, but that it refers only to canned meat?

Mr. WHITE. Well, we are dealing with the matter of the finished product of the cattle industry. The canned meat comes into direct competition with the byproduct of our dairying and cattle industries because we must turn off our surplus cattle, our bulls and calves. We do not use a bull over two seasons, and we must also turn off our superannuated cows, no matter how fat they are. They are good food, they are good meat. Do not get in your mind the idea that they are not fit for food. And we must turn off our male stock.

I hope you gentlemen will take into consideration the welfare of the farmers and livestock industry, for as I said—and let me emphasize it—you are touching a very vital spot in the national farm economy.

Chairman RYDER. We shall give full consideration to your presentation and to the Senator's.

Memorial Day Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER C. PLOESER

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 28, 1941

ADDRESS OF JOHN J. GRIFFIN, OF ST. LOUIS, MO.

Mr. PLOESER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an address delivered on Memorial Day at Festus, Mo., by the Honorable John J. Griffin, of St. Louis, Mo. Mr. Griffin has devoted much of his time during the past decade to educating our people to the dangers of the un-American activities that have been carried on in this country. His address follows:

MEMORIAL DAY SPEAKER CALLS AMERICA TO UNITE AGAINST DESTRUCTIVE FORCES—JOHN J. GRIFFIN DESCRIBES ENEMIES WHO ARE BORING FROM WITHIN TO DEFEAT DEMOCRACY'S PURPOSE

As we gather here today, it is with the hope that all they who are assembled for the same purpose, throughout the Nation, may obtain strength from the spirit of those who have gone on to rededicate themselves to these same principles of liberty and freedom, in order that we may become a united Nation, united in purpose as well as in deed, to overcome the forces that are at work in our Nation today to make a mockery of the sacrifices of those whom we honor.

It is essential that you and I, as well as the millions assembled throughout the Nation today at gatherings such as this, lay aside all differences of opinion. Forget the fact that we are Jews or Gentiles, Catholics or Protestants, Democrats or Republicans, and become a united people, possibly with different views on religious, social, and political lines, but with united views on patriotic and national lines.

Therefore, with this object in view, let us proceed. First, I might tell you, if you will pardon the personal reference, that just a year ago today I made the principal address at a ceremony similar to this at Jefferson Barracks, and as I stood on the platform overlooking "God's acre" where the remains of our Nation's heroic dead were mingled with God's earth, I paid my respects to the enemy forces within our shores. The result was, the following morning the German Consul in St. Louis notified our bank that he could not do business with a banking institution that had an official such as I connected with it. The answer he received from Byron Moser, the president of our bank, was that we were an American institution; that we intended to remain as such and if it ever became necessary for us to exchange ideals and principles for enemy dollars, we would close the doors of our bank.

I sincerely trust that the same German Consul has his agents here to make notes of my remarks, and if not that he will have the opportunity of reading them from the copies of your local newspaper files.

SATAN IN HUMAN FORM

In my opinion, and I think it is an opinion that is shared by man, Satan himself has come out of the depths of hell and has taken human form to carry on the fight of anti-God that is raging in Europe. Hitler, in my opinion, is possessed of the evil one.

Nazi-ism is not a national political party—it is a religion; a religion that claims its leader is God; a religion that denies the existence of a Supreme Being, but in its hypocritical pronouncements calls that Being to witness its acts; that hypocrisy is merely for the purpose of deluding the unthinking people, or is merely a smoke screen to hide the real purpose behind the movement.

Nazi-ism, communism, and fascism all three have the same aims and objects, and those aims and objects are to destroy in the minds and in the hearts of the people a belief in a God and a hereafter. They are not anti-Jews or anti-Catholics or Anti-Lutheran, or anti any particular religion; they are anti-God. The leaders know and understand that under the totalitarian form of government that a belief in a God and a hereafter, and a belief in justice, decency, and honesty cannot exist in the same sphere with our principles.

Is this a far-fetched statement? If you think so, let me quote the exact words of the leader of the German Nation:

"The religions are all alike, no matter what they call themselves. They have no future—certainly none for the Germans. Fascism, if it likes, may come to terms with the church. So shall I. Why not? That will not prevent me from tearing up Christianity root and branch, and annihilating it in Germany."—Adolf Hitler.

NAMES ANTI-AMERICAN GROUPS

In carrying on their work in America, their system of propaganda is very insidious, very clever, but nevertheless as the records of other countries show, it is very effective. In this country there are in excess of 500,000 Nazi agents and their sympathizers; the agents in the pay of the German Government, the sympathizers, the unpaid, unwitting, simple tools of the "fifth column," and the bundists, a standing army in our midst to do the job of destruction demanded by their employer.

In addition to that group, you have in excess of 1,000,000 members of the Communist Party who pay dues into that organization. They are organized in America as a standing army and with their sympathizers are here for the purpose of destroying our democracy.

These paid agents of the enemy government will be found in every walk of life. You will find them in the schools, colleges, and universities as teachers and professors.

You will find these paid and unpaid agents in the youth organizations of the country. They are instructed to join every organization, whether it be political, social, or religious, in order that they might carry on the propaganda of destruction.

CREATE UNREST AND STRIFE

We find these same paid agents and emissaries of hell in labor organizations, creating unrest, strife, and turmoil in order that they may do the job for which they are paid, and that is, prevent our preparedness program from becoming a reality by fermenting strikes and placing in the hearts and in the minds of the workers hate and prejudice.

We find them in the halls of finance, where again they are doing the job and doing it well by fermenting hate and strife in the ranks of capital with the hope that they will be able to turn capital against labor as well as labor against capital.

We find them in the social life of the country, some in low places and some in high places in government, either by having themselves elected to office or securing appointments to office.

We find them in the pulpits in the churches of our country, men who are supposed to be teaching the doctrines of peace and justice.

PURPOSE TO PREVENT UNITY

They are working for one purpose and one purpose only; that purpose is to prevent this country of ours from being a united country with a united people and a united purpose in mind.

There is one other element at work in this country, who, knowingly or unknowingly, aid the purpose of the subversive elements and the "fifth column," and are doing the job well; that is the element who are writing, publishing, printing, distributing, or selling this flood of indecent, filthy, obscene literature that has come upon us as an avalanche in the last few years. In addition to this group there is another group, the writers, producers, and promoters of this flood of indecent and filthy entertainment that has engulfed us in the past several years.

There must be a guiding hand and a directing force in America for all of these paid and unpaid "fifth columnists" and subversive elements that are spreading the doctrines of nazi-ism, communism, and fascism. That directing force will be found in the offices of the consuls of the governments they represent, consulates who have increased their staffs from 50 to 500 percent at a time when we have no business relations or traffic with their country.

It is your duty and your obligation to support your Government in ridding this country of these leading geniuses of evil, and return them to the countries from which they came, so that they may live under the type and kind of government they are trying to force upon us but which we do not want.

It is your duty and your obligation to drive out of our educational systems every individual who is not an American at heart and who is not teaching American principles and ideals to our youth.

MUST LIVE FOR COUNTRY

If any of you who are here today are members of organized labor, I would say to you, that unless you drive out of your organizations these subversive elements, who are at work, you are a traitor to the cause of labor.

You are untrue to the many who have preceded you and have given their lives, their energies, and in many instances their life's blood in order that labor might have the exalted position that it holds in American life today.

As I talk to you today, I can feel surrounding us that great army of silent Americans who have died in order that we might live, and I am sure they are trying with all possible force to pierce that great void where time blends with eternity in order to bring to you and to me a message, and that message would be:

"It is a blessed, a holy, and a sacred thing for one to die for one's country; but it is just as blessed, just as holy, and just as sacred for one to live for one's country." So in order not to prove false to them, let us give no consolation to the enemy. Let us from this day forth be a united people, united Americans, united for the preservation of the only nation upon the face of God's earth today where liberty and freedom reign, and where the worship of God is man's prerogative.

The Tired Congressman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LUTHER PATRICK

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 2, 1941

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker, day after day from this floor the Speaker has heard speech after speech regarding the tired executive, the tired toiler, the tired teacher, the tired soldier, the tired sailor, the tired minister, the tired mother, the tired nurse, and so on far into the session; but today, Mr. Speaker, you who are yourself a Congressman, are about to have the opportunity to hear the song about the tired Congressman; and here it is:

THE TIRED CONGRESSMAN

(By L. Patrick)

The day had worn itself into a sodden gray,
The sun had let his head down in the west,
The Congressman was on his weary homeward way
To take unto himself a needed rest.
The phone had roused him from his sleep at early hour
To bring him news about a gruntled friend,
A group of men who brought the dope on local power
Moved in to help him his full morning spend.

The headsman of the herd that moves his daily work,
Committee of his constant pride and boast,
Had held him over past the call of whip and clerk
And he had missed the roll he needed most,
Full many chartless chore and many a barren call
The fretful afternoon had seen him do
Now he was headed home for his cot out in the hall
To sleep away the pain that he'd been through.

But news awaited him when last he reached his gate,
The wife had heard it first and was impressed,
A U. S. Senate seat was vacant from his State,
A seat that he could get—and take a needed rest.

The Resources of the Range

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD T. TAYLOR
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 28, 1941

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, today marks the anniversary of an important milestone in our public-land history. Seven years ago Congress passed the Taylor Grazing Act, providing for Federal control, management, and guardianship of the public domain. My friends and colleagues have honored me many, many times during my long years of service in this House, but no greater honor than the one which linked the Taylor Grazing Act with my name. The letters I get from Colorado and nine other Western States stamp this law as the magna carta of American conservation. As everyone knows, the Magna Carta was the Great Charter of English liberties, delivered on June 19, 1215, by King John at Runnymede on the demand of the English barons. Those two words have for the past 726 years been applied to any fundamental constitution that secures personal liberty and civil rights. The comments I hear are to me a great satisfaction that democracy is at work in what used to be the open range of the West. And when our evenings are interrupted with news of bombings, sinkings, blitzkriegs, and international furore I think of the words of a great British general. After he had successfully pushed the Italians back and finally accepted their surrender in Africa, he told his troops, in effect:

If only nations could spend the same energy and ingenuity on constructive work instead of on destruction, this world would be a mighty fine place, in spite of the gnats that get in your hair and the sand that gets in your teeth.

Mr. Speaker, if more people in this country could witness the constructive work going on out in the range country of the West, there would be a wider appreciation of this land we are so proud to call America.

The whole world conflict today is largely a conquest for resources. The dictator must have resources upon which to base his excuse for continued fiendish conquests and human slaughter.

To get them he uses the most infamous instruments of human destruction ever devised in all history, crushing and maiming many millions of innocent and peace-loving people, pillaging and destroying more property and causing more human privation, starvation, misery, and suffering than all other wars combined in all time.

In the light of these world events today, our American way of life and our American resources take on a new and important meaning. The public range, one of our vital resources—one which until 7 years ago was being trampled to the dust through unwise competition and an utterly inadequate public-land policy—is now in the forefront of real national conservation.

We Americans are in a sense idealists; but in a greater sense we are a practical people. Every American father wants his son to have a better chance than he had. In the western range country more than 20,000 American citizens have joined hands with the Federal Government in a cooperative effort to maintain production of meat, leather, and wool on a high productive level while, at the same time, they are preserving and improving the great public-range resource so that their sons may have a better place in which to live.

Today, as on each of the former birthdays of that law, I desire to report on some of the activities and accomplishments of the Grazing Service and the Department of the Interior in the great conservation program that had its first real impetus when, on June 28, 1934, President Roosevelt affixed his signature to—

An act to stop injury to the public grazing lands by preventing overgrazing and soil deterioration, to provide for their orderly use, improvement, and development, to stabilize the livestock industry dependent upon the public range, and for other purposes.

In these critical times, it seems fitting that we should inquire into some of the basic American activities that contribute to our all-out defense effort.

From the isolated cattle ranch, tucked away in the oasis of the desert, to the factory and the assembly line, America is marshaling her forces of production in the greatest common job in our history. Democracy is in action with the determination that those things for which our fathers fought shall not be taken from us. Great edifices in this, our Capital City, throughout our country, symbolize the stuff America is made of and remind us of earlier hardships and triumphs. In the West, we see another side of America in her mountains, valleys, rivers, dams, storage reservoirs, and in her subterranean vaults of coal, oil, copper, iron, and other minerals essential for the assembly line. These storehouses of wealth are but a part of the raw materials upon which we rely for normal peacetime needs.

The West harbors still another resource—a resource that is indispensable to the livestock industry and to our national economy, as well. I speak of the public range which, by its vastness alone, seems like something ethereal. It is this land—the outpost of western civilization—a hundred and fifty million acres of public domain, which Congress finally recognized as of public import when it passed the Taylor Grazing Act.

We are all dependent upon this range in one way or another and have an interest in its proper use, management, and preservation. From it we obtain a goodly portion of the 17,000,000,000-odd pounds of meat which Americans consume annually. The western range is our source of meat for strong soldiers, of wool for warm uniforms, and of leather for sturdy shoes.

SEVEN YEARS OF RANGE CONSERVATION UNDER THE TAYLOR ACT

Much has been crowded into the 7 years of democracy on the range. In that time the 75 years of bitter cattle and sheep wars have been turned into a mutual crusade for better range and a healthier western economy. Seven years ago the 20,000 cattle and sheep operators in 10 States began to see each other's problems in the light of the common good. Instead of settling their differences with intrigue, bloodshed, and Winchesters, they compromised around the council table. The spark to this change in custom was furnished by the very able Secretary of the Interior, who called upon the users of the range to assist in, and become a vital part of, the framework of a decentralized administration. Feuds of many years have been forgotten in this mutual cooperative effort to save the resources of the Federal range and bring order, system, and stability to the land and to the livestock industry.

Recently I had an interesting talk with R. H. Rutledge, a western man whom Secretary Ickes selected to take over the job of Director of the Grazing Service which was organized in the Department of the Interior to administer grazing districts established under the Taylor Act. Mr. Rutledge and I, and my good friend Secretary Ickes, have a dream in common. We see the western range as a new frontier—a challenge to our own generation, a key to the proper and coordinated use of range and cropland, a healthy and stabilized agriculture based on wise use of our natural resources, a place where great reservoirs of wealth may be wisely used and adequately protected; the conservation of our youth, our land, and our communities—sinews of national strength and solidarity. This is a heritage for which every thinking man today wants to fight in the American way—a heritage that we shall preserve for our children and our children's children. The people of the West have accepted the challenge and I am happy to report that, already, a large part of this dream has become a reality.

ISSUANCE OF TERM PERMITS

Mr. Rutledge and I were talking, as we frequently do, about people and things of concern to the western-range livestock industry. He told me—and I was exceedingly glad to hear it—that on July 1 of this year about 60 percent of all the livestock operators using federally owned land in grazing districts will receive 10-year grazing permits. This is a forward step in the goal to stabilize and permanently make solvent the livestock industry dependent upon the public range. Most of these stockmen have been using the Federal range during these first 7 years under temporary grazing licenses. In effect, these licenses and permits are agreements between the livestock operator and Uncle Sam that the allotted range will be properly utilized.

I want to take a moment here to tell you that in the case of the Dewar test case appealed from the State Supreme Court of Nevada, the Supreme Court of the United States, on May 26, 1941, upheld the Secretary of the Interior in his plan to collect grazing fees under temporary grazing licenses pending the accumulation of necessary information to warrant the conversion of these licenses into 10-year grazing permits. This decision has set at rest any doubts regarding the legality or propriety of collecting and using these grazing-fee moneys for the construction of much-needed range improvements and for the general conservation and development of the range lands. The highest tribunal in our land has thus put its stamp of approval on what we of the West proposed and intended and our President and the Congress has approved.

Considering the fact that there are more than 20,000 cases involving 12,000,000 head of stock and a total land area of more than a quarter billion acres, and that the Grazing Service has obtained this information on 60 percent of the users, I think there is one Government agency that is making good use of the funds we provide from the Federal Treasury.

No one need tell me or any of the range stockmen the significance of the issuance of term permits in lieu of temporary licenses. I know what work has been involved in reaching that point where it is possible to foresee 10 years of grazing use. Individual applications to use the range had to be given careful attention; agreements as to numbers and boundary lines had to be reached; range and property surveys had to be made; coordinated use had to be developed between intermingled private and public properties; maps had to be prepared, in some instances of areas never before mapped; protection and improvement had to be provided for overused and depleted areas; temporary licenses had to be issued in recognition of operators' rights to use the range until an analysis warranted the issuance of term permits. The point the Grazing Service has now reached is a far cry from the time not so long ago when there were something like a million nomadic livestock roving tramp herds on these same ranges—stock belonging to nonresident owners or men whose only wordly possessions were their flocks and the meager necessities of a camp which they packed on the back of a burro or two. These men paid no land taxes; they cared not how they overgrazed or left the range when they moved along to greener pasture; they utterly destroyed the range of the local ranchmen. Orderly use has replaced the confusion and devastating abuse of free, unregulated range.

THE NEED FOR RANGE REGULATION

I have said to the House before that my father was a cattleman all his life, that I was born on the range; my home was on the range until I was grown, and my home has been in the range country all my life. Those of you who are westerners by birth or adoption know that the western livestock industry, with all its thrills of round-ups and branding time, faced a chaotic condition a few short years ago. The country which Coronado found covered with grass 400 years ago, so thick and luscious that it never failed to become erect after it had been trodden down, is definitely on the comeback trail. In winning the West the white man viewed an apparent endless resource of grass with a belief that it never could be exhausted.

Overconfidence in plenty resulted in waste, which was followed by overuse of what remained. Free range and less grass resulted in poorer stock, economic loss, and loss of topsoil that will take years to replace. When grain prices soared as a result of the first World War, lands intended by Nature for grazing were plowed up and planted to wheat and other cereal crops, only to fail when the rains did not come. Trees were cut down; sod broken. Livestock were crowded onto already crowded public grazing lands and these lands were overgrazed to a point where little vegetation remained and wind and water erosion attacked the unprotected surfaces.

Generations of misguided use, uncontrolled range competition, and the ups and downs of booms and depressions, droughts and hard winters combined to place the established livestock operator of 1934 in a precarious position. Up to this point he found the going a little more difficult each succeeding year. The western livestock man was not entirely to blame for this situation. Prior to 1934 the public range was free to all who cared to use it. This lack of a public-land policy suitable to these wild lands virtually compelled destructive competition. The stockman who depended upon the range for a livelihood was forced to use defiant and abusive methods if he stayed in business. With the protection and control afforded by this act he has demonstrated his ability to practice conservation of both land and stock.

HOME RULE ON THE RANGE

Today 56 Federal grazing districts, embracing over 140,000,000 acres of public land, have been established in the States of Utah, Nevada, California, Colorado, Oregon, Idaho, Montana, New Mexico, Arizona, and Wyoming. In the administration of these grazing districts the Grazing Service has the valuable assistance of advisory boards composed of local stockmen who are elected by the range users themselves.

These advisory boards are made up of men outstanding in their community—men who know how to deal only one way, and that is fairly and squarely. These men bring home rule to the range. They speak out for the over 20,000 livestock operators whose interests they represent.

These boards tackle their job in characteristic fashion. They personify the democratic principles upon which our Nation was founded—the right of the people to participate in framing the policies necessary to the public interest.

Right here I want to mention an example of public service rendered by the advisory board of the Magdalena grazing district in New Mexico. The seven men serving on this board today are the same men whom the licensees have elected and reelected every year since the district was organized in 1935. To me there could be no greater tribute than is shown by this neighborly appreciation of the licensees in this district. Indeed, this is a tribute to integrity, experience, and sound judgment which all of us in this great body can well understand.

"Home rule on the range" has worked so well that livestock organizations in 1939 sponsored an amendment to the Taylor Act in which the advisory-board system was made a permanent part of the grazing-district administration. Secretary Ickes promptly endorsed this proposal. He said:

> I'm sure I don't know where we would have gone without them. They have kept us on the right track, and I can see no greater contribution to a public service than that rendered by the advisory boards. Not only have they aided the Federal Government in solving important public questions but they have also unselfishly served the thousands of stockmen whose livelihoods are so closely linked with this great conservation measure.

The net result is that each of the 20,000 licensees on the Federal range is an active conservationist. The system brings the stockman and the Federal Government together in a mutual effort for a better livestock business and stability to the forage resources.

Last year, representatives of these boards formed an independent organization to better serve the interests of the men they represent in all matters and to coordinate activities of their industry for quick and positive action in time of emergency. A few months ago, this group of men—two advisory board members from each of the nine administrative regions—met to consider proposed revisions in the Federal Range Code. The Grazing Service sought their advice, and they were requested to recommend new rules, or changes in present rules, which seemed necessary to meet the problems inherent in grazing districts. I want to say that Secretary Ickes has shown unusual interest and fine understanding of the stockman's problems. As a matter of fact, I am told that the rules under which the licensees operate are rules which they themselves have proposed.

RANGE CONSERVATION AND REGULATION PAY DIVIDENDS

Benefits to the stockmen from regulated grazing and improvement, and proper use of these western range lands, are everywhere in evidence. Calf and lamb crops are heavier than in the old days, and the production of beef, wool, and mutton is greater; grass stands are stronger, permitting the full number of grazing animals on a given area; there are decreased death losses from predators and poisonous plants; stock water and trailing facilities are becoming better each year. Stockmen are supporters of this plan of home rule on the range. They know that when a certain range is allotted to them there will be feed on that range when they arrive. It will not have been taken off by trespassers or tramp herds.

Recently, I made a special effort to get some evidence of the improved range and livestock conditions in the grazing districts. I learned, for instance, that sheepmen in the Crooked Creek Valley, north of Lakeview, Oreg., reported a 100-percent lamb crop last year for the first time in the history of their business. In this State, more than 100 water holes have been constructed by the Grazing Service and, as one fellow put it, it has been made possible for them to "lamb" right in the middle of the desert without the risk of running short of water. Lambs marketed in Oregon the past 2 years have averaged 8 to 10 pounds heavier than previously. Ranch values are up 40 to 60 percent over 5 years ago. One prominent stockman near Burns estimated that his range privilege is worth at least half of the total value of his ranch set-up. Ranches that were going under the hammer 10 years ago are now contributing to the local tax structure.

Today the stockman who has qualified by dependent property and prior use of the range to graze a definite number of stock and definite range, has a definite asset. It has vastly improved his credit facilities. Banks and loan companies know that the man who has an established livestock business and grazing privileges on the public range contributes to the economic stability of his community and, indirectly, of the entire country. With the "tramp operators" removed from the picture, one of the most speculative influences in his business has been removed. One man in Utah considers the Federal-range rights his property demands worth an added 75 cents per head for his 3,000 sheep. There are evidences everywhere that property values have increased in line with the legitimate range rights attached to the private property upon which grazing privileges are based.

RANGE VALUES ARE BEING APPRAISED

I understand that the Grazing Service is now making an appraisal of the value of range privileges in grazing districts. This appraisal is authorized by section 3 of the Taylor Act, which requires that a reasonable grazing fee be determined from time to time for each locality. Grazing-land values are being studied in the light of all factors involved. The study includes information on commercial leases and tax data in each State concerning privately owned range; cost-and-income records from 500 typical ranches involving the use of approximately 5,000,000 acres of private range land; and complete analysis of about 250 typical ranches in grazing districts that are composed in part of public domain grazing privileges. The element of what the livestock men may afford to pay is an important feature when the values on private lands are then compared with the values of public land in the various grazing districts.

Naturally, I wanted to know what the picture looked like in Colorado. The study seems to show an extremely favorable range situation in my State—production of beef, lamb, and wool is relatively high. The many years of better breeding and better livestock practices have borne fruit. This, I think, is an indication of the healthy conditions of stock and range that now exist in all of the 10 Western States.

STRUCTURAL RANGE IMPROVEMENTS

While values such as I have just mentioned are evidenced in many indirect ways, there are other increased values in the form of structural improvements which are on the range for anyone to see. I speak of such things as stock-water reservoirs, stock trails, fences, and similar improvements put on grazing-district lands by the Grazing Service through the facilities of the Civilian Conservation Corps and by the expenditure of 75 percent of grazing-fee moneys, which, by law, are returned to the States and counties in which grazing districts are located. As one of my cowboy friends put it:

The public domain has sure had a face lifting these last 5 years.

For example, in the arid Western Range States, where stockmen formerly had to adjust their plans to meet the whims of the weather, the Grazing Service has built 1,248 stock-watering reservoirs, developed 580 springs, and drilled 223 wells for thirsty stock. C. C. C. enrollees have constructed 4,187 miles of fence on the range—enough to fence the Atlantic seaboard from Labrador to the Florida Keys. These boys have built over 9,000 miles of truck and stock trails and nearly 2,000 miles of stock driveways. They have eradicated destructive rodents on about 10,000,000 acres. They have rid the range of poison plants, reseeded depleted areas, constructed corrals and cattle guards, and many diversion and check dams. The list of accomplishments of these C. C. C. camps is so long I cannot go over it all at this time, but I do want to point to the significance of some of these things and tell you what they have meant to the range itself and to the stockman whose livelihood depends upon it.

In the case of truck and stock trails, the livestock operator can now truck his lambs and his calves to shipping points from formerly inaccessible areas and save the time and "shrink" of a long drive. Too, he can take advantage of good prices while they are good. In my own State of Colorado I know of a truck trail built by the Grazing Service enrollees across a canyon connecting 2 range areas used by 120,000 sheep during different seasons. It used to be that sheepmen had to hire extra men to force the sheep over steep and dangerous ledges in this area. Losses were inevitable—one operator lost 35 lambs while attempting to get over the 2½-mile distance. Camp equipment had to be trucked 60 extra miles to get from one side of the canyon to the other. The C. C. C. camp stationed in the locality built a trail called the Beaver Creek Truck Trail across the canyon. Operators now cross easily with their sheep in 2 or 3 hours, with no loss of stock and little or no loss in weight. Camp trucks now cross over the new trail through the canyon in second gear in 15 or 20 minutes. Throughout the Federal range territory these truck trails serve as access roads to main highways and shipping points. They reach into the back country and also serve for the transportation of mineral ores and other raw materials essential to our national defense.

Another range development typical of the many undertaken by the Grazing Service through its long-term improvement program is the Gypsum Valley improvement—again, in Colorado. When I came to Colorado in the eighties, Gypsum Valley was a veritable garden spot. However, as livestock numbers in the area increased, stock were crowded onto the valley range and at the lower end, near the only permanent water in the area, there was, twice yearly, a great concentration of stock. Here the forage was eaten off or trampled out and it was not long before erosion attacked the unprotected surfaces. Starting at the source of water—the Dolores River—erosion fingered its way 9 miles up the valley and exacted a heavy toll of forage plants and topsoil.

The Gypsum Valley problem was one of the first tackled by the Grazing Service C. C. C. camp at Redvale, Colo. First, a truck trail was built across the full length of the valley. This trail is the key to the whole project. It made possible safe and economical transportation for work crews who were to develop the entire valley; it allows easy and efficient range management by stockmen and Grazing Service officers; it permits the quick and satisfactory handling of livestock and feed.

The problem of erosion was next given attention. Small check dams, made of logs, brush, and stone, were constructed, which hold the soil and head off a great portion of the erosion in the valley. Next, stock-water developments were built in the upper portion of the valley so that the entire area might be equally utilized. Four large reservoirs were constructed in quick succession. Finally, drift fences were built at the upper end of the valley to control the movement of grazing stock. Stockmen cooperated wholeheartedly in this development and, while there is still work to be done in Gypsum Valley, an upward trend is marked and definite, and another sorely depleted area is well on the way to its former state of productivity.

These range improvements speak for themselves. A full reservoir on arid range land, where, before, there was no water at all, tells a story of true significance which the range stockman can readily appreciate.

Division fences hold stock from overgrazed areas until the grass can grow again. That is conservation. Truck trails open up new range country and permit trucking to market, instead of trailing, at a saving of feed, time, and expense. Fenced driveways reduce "shrink" en route to the shipping point. Revegetation means more grass and less erosion. Elimination of poisonous plants from the range, like the control of predatory animals, removes one of the stockman's worst hazards.

RANGE PREPAREDNESS

I am proud of the progress that has been made in range conservation on the public lands. We want to keep our people on the land. We want our land to keep the people. These objectives cannot be realized if soil is permitted to wash away and the salt of the earth to be on the march because of wasted resources. The Grazing Service is proving that there is room for a happy people and a sound economy in the public-domain States. Western stockmen realize the real, lasting value of proper use of the range and, by refraining from expanding their numbers when prices improve, are allowing this forage to improve both in quality and quantity. This is a cushion against possible lean years of low prices or extreme drought. Care is being taken that the mistakes of the last World War are not repeated. Range and livestock are today in much better condition than they have been in a number of years. It is imperative that we maintain this improvement in order to be able to produce the maximum needs of our civilian and military arms of defense. In this resolve, the Grazing Service has the support of all who are directly or indirectly concerned with the problem. A resolution passed at one of the western livestock association meetings this spring reads as follows:

We endorse the principles involved in the Taylor Grazing Act and administration thereof, for it is proving an effective control of tenure and a wise use in the interest of conservation and stabilization of the livestock industry.

A new chapter is being written in the history of the land policy of our Nation. While improving and protecting the range resource, the Grazing Service has allotted the range for the orderly use of more than 12,000,000 head of livestock on lands belonging to Uncle Sam. Today there is less conflict, less selfishness, on the range. The present generation of range livestockmen who inherited a declining resource look to the future with courage and confidence. Government by the governed has meant a fair and unbiased apportionment of grazing rights. The recovery of the range itself is the first step in the stabilization of the western livestock industry. The younger generation of ranch-raised men and women are encouraged to remain in their home communities and carry on the business of their parents because the future looks bright. With the bloom of the desert and with range wars in the discard, we see the grizzled stockman, who helped write the colorful history of the West, counseling his children to carry on. The mistakes of the past are fast being put right.

I have been shown and permitted to use a letter recently written by Mr. Owen O'Fallon, of Gunnison, Colo., to Mr. Russell B. Rose, regional grazier, Grand Junction, Colo. The letter contains so many constructive and useful suggestions that I feel it is of sufficient interest to justify my including it in my remarks, as follows:

GUNNISON, COLO.,
May 31, 1941.

MR. RUSSELL B. ROSE,
Regional Grazier,
Grand Junction, Colo.

DEAR MR. ROSE: I am writing to tell you of my appreciation and confidence in the Grazing Service and the work you people are doing for the ranges and stockmen in this Colorado Grazing District No. 3.

I was born and raised on a ranch, and all of my some 35 years in business have been connected with livestock and ranching. I am with a considerable number of the stockmen in this district and a good many from other sections, and very nearly all with whom I have talked have about the same opinion of the Grazing Service as my own. Our livestock experience in this part of the country, as you know, has to do with open-range operation for a considerable part of each year.

The first forward step under the Taylor Grazing Act was the regulation of the grazing privileges on the range, this regulation being accomplished with a minimum of trouble and fuss. The great factor in this work was the fact that administrative personnel, as far as my knowledge goes, were, without exception, men who knew the stock business from actual experience and were able to understand the stockman's problems and talk his language. Then the stockmen had, and still have, a voice in the proposition through the advisory boards of actual users of the range, elected by vote of the bona fide range users—the ideal set-up for complete understanding of any range problem and for the resolving of this problem for the greatest good to the greatest number.

Under these conditions there is no chance, under human control, except for improvement in the condition of the ranges, which can do nothing but benefit the livestock business; for instance, the range-improvement program of the Grazing Service. In my own unit, which is a common-use unit, sheep, cattle, and horses all use the same territory. Through the rodent-control program, prairie dogs, gophers, etc., are being eliminated, thus increasing the forage for wild game and domestic stock by the amount taken and destroyed by these rodents, which is pretty accurately estimated from 15 to 25 percent.

Then the water-development program—in the lower foothills and desert, so-called, there were great tracts of public land where forage grew, but could not be utilized for the reason that watering places were so far apart stock or game could not graze except for comparatively small areas around these watering places. Result: These areas were overgrazed and great stretches left untouched. On the desert the Grazing Service, with C. C. C. labor and with range-improvement funds, has built, and is still building, small reservoirs to catch and hold water from snows and flash storms for the use of livestock and game in these unused areas, thus making unnecessary and not to be tolerated overgrazing on the areas around the old natural watering places. In the foothills small natural springs are being developed, fenced, and the water carried to troughs so animals may get clean water to drink without trampling the spring to a mudhole unfit for anything to drink from.

A new and unique water-development experiment completed last fall on the unit on which my stock are grazed produced most gratifying results and opened an almost unlimited field for such projects in the foothill country. The labor was performed by C. C. C. enrollees under Grazing Service supervision. The cost, I am told by your people, was $34.50. No material went into this project except some rock which was picked up on the hillside.

This project is in a typical part of the sparsely watered belt between the higher hills which are much better watered, and the river valleys where the livestock are fed in winter. This belt is also the principal winter feeding ground for deer, elk, and sage grouse. Domestic stock have been able to get little use from this section because of lack of water and game use restricted for the same reason. The site of this project was absolutely dry when the work started, the nearest water being miles away. The presence of two small clumps of willows some 75 feet apart and a small area of wire grass and the fact that these growths do not exist where their roots cannot reach water, led me to urge the Grazing Service to try to find water there. Two small test pits were started, one by each willow clump. Before much depth was attained, water appeared in each hole and at a depth of 8 feet a good flow of water was coming into each pit. Trenches were then dug to carry the water to an earth tank scooped out with a tractor equipped with a bulldozer. The pits were filled with loose rock to prevent caving and to obviate the possibility of animals falling in, the trenches treated the same and the earth tank riprapped with flat rock to prevent animals from miring and a beautiful tank of living water appeared where the sun had never shone on water in the memory of man. This spring there were innumerable tracks of deer and sage grouse around the tank, and on one trip there a pair of ducks rose from its surface. This tank of water will service an area in a unit carrying some 1,200 cattle, 5,000 sheep, and by wildlife people an estimated 5,000 deer and elk and one of the best sage-chicken areas in the country. Not only will it benefit the stock which water there, but it will relieve the grazing load on the entire unit by opening up the additional area now available for use. Almost countless spots with identical original conditions are scattered through the dry belt.

This is just one instance of the work of bettering the range condition being done by your Service.

Range reseeding just really getting under way, contour furrowing to spread water from the spring runoff, drift fences, eradication of poisonous weeds, among others of the range-development program, are giving wonderful results.

I firmly believe I may say without fear of successful contradiction that the Grazing Service operating under the Taylor Grazing Act, with the cooperation of stockmen and advisory boards of stockmen, has in its short life already done more to better the wildlife conditions, stabilize and protect legitimate livestock operations, protect and rehabilitate the ranges than all Government agencies and private effort, including sportsmen's organizations, combined, have done since North America was settled. The gospel of the Grazing Service, to its everlasting glory, is range improvement instead of merely range conservation. More power to you, say we all.

Very truly yours,

OWEN O'FALLON.

As the years go by we live a little more in retrospect. In conclusion, I will depart for a moment from the theme of this address and speak of our home in the West, with a few personal reflections. I have personally known all of the 21 Senators and 29 Representatives that Colorado has sent to Washington since our State was admitted into the Union on August 1, 1876. Eight of those Senators and 12 of those Representatives served before I came to Congress. I have served in Congress with all the rest of them. I can proudly say that Colorado has never had the slightest occasion to bow her head in shame for anything that any of them ever did either in his official or private life. They have all been loyal, conscientious representatives of our State. But they have been about as widely diversified as possible in their capabilities and fitness for those positions.

During the many public positions with which I was honored, including 12 years in the Colorado State Senate, before coming to Congress, I formed a firm conviction that what Colorado and the West most needed in Washington was actual service and not oratory; not grandiose statesmanship or national reputations, but practical results and constructive help in the reclamation, conservation, and development of our vast possible resources. That was my ideal of what real Western statesmanship should be.

I am profoundly grateful to the people of western Colorado for their confidence and loyal support during all these years. They are primarily and jointly, with me, entitled to the credit for whatever success I have achieved in Washington. They have given me the opportunity to be of service in securing the many benefits and the development and upbuilding of the West in general, and my home State in particular.

When I came to Congress on March 4, 1909, I had the secret ambition of becoming one of the most really useful, constructive and practically beneficial Members that the West has ever sent to Washington and I have always cherished and earnestly tried to measure up to and realize that fond hope for nearly a third of a century.

Two Billion Dollars and 40 Years in Philippines

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 26, 1941

STATEMENT BY MAJ. GEN. WILLIAM C. RIVERS, UNITED STATES ARMY, RETIRED

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, Maj. Gen. William C. Rivers, United States Army, Retired, I am informed was loaned by our Army to the local Philippine Government to work for 11 consecutive years with the Philippine constabulary. He is a keen student of Philippine-United States of America relations. Under permission to extend my remarks I now wish to submit for the RECORD a statement which I have recently received from General Rivers:

NEW YORK, N. Y., June 22, 1941.

To the Honorable FRED L. CRAWFORD,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have read the recent interesting speech of Judge John W. Hausserman, of Manila, before the Bar Association of Cincinnati. You had the address inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for June 19 instant. Hausserman has lived in the Philippines since he was discharged as a soldier of the Kansas regiment there, when our War with Spain terminated. Judge Hausserman is an able man, who has had great success in commercial life in the islands. He is popularly known as the Gold King.

I would like to mention one or two matters which Hausserman does not speak of in the Cincinnati speech. Judge Hausserman speaks with enthusiasm of the Philippines as an asset to the people of the United States. He favors our retaining authority over the distant and scattered archipelago. He makes no mention of the distance out to the Philippines nor to the difficulties attending an attempt to permanently defend those islands.

The Filipinos as a whole earnestly desire the independence we often promised them. My conviction—after years of residence in many parts of the Philippines—is the islands are an economic and strategic liability to the people of the United States. No doubt a relatively small number of Filipinos and others who are interested in the cultivation of sugar in the Philippines would be pleased if the United States held the islands under some sort of dominion government. In fact, John Gunther states in his book Inside Asia that he visited the Philippines and says the sugar men oppose independence for the islands and desire to see the independence act of our Congress revoked. As long as we hold the Philippines the greater part of the sugar from the islands, and other products, comes into the United States free of duty. This is unfair to the many farmers in Michigan and other States who are engaged in sugar growing themselves.

Japan is squarely between the United States and Manila—and on the straight, short route to the Orient. It is 4,500 miles out to Japan; to Manila it is 6,000 miles, 1,500 miles farther. President Theodore Roosevelt wrote Taft in 1907, "The Philippines form our heel of Achilles." Our Admiral Yarnell said a few years ago to a committee of Congress that in order for us to go freely to the Philippines, if we were at war with Japan, "You would need a fleet twice the size of the fleet of Japan." More than once Admiral William D. Leahy said to committees of Congress, "The defensive line of the American Navy reaches from the Aleutian Islands to the Hawaiian Islands, to Samoa and to the Canal at Panama." And, speaking on a large increase for the fleet, Admiral Leahy told the House Naval Committee, "The Navy when it is increased by the authority in this bill will be seriously inadequate to the task of sending a naval force to the Philippines."

It is well known that taxes of the Filipinos pay the expenses of the government of the Philippines—and pay for all improvements. Yet, the American taxpayers have paid about $2,000,000,000 in the past 40 years on account of the Philippines—in putting down the insurrection, keeping American soldiers and extra war vessels in the islands, building residences for our High Commissioner at Manila and Baguio, for maintaining over the broad expanse of the Pacific Ocean a transport service and so on.

Our trade with the Philippines and with China has been a great disappointment, with the balance in both countries against us. Our trade with Japan is more than our trade with China and the Philippines combined. In the trade with Japan there is a great balance on our side also.

I believe Japan will not annex the Philippines after 1946. Japan is so near the Philippines that she will in any event always get much of the trade with the Philippines.

I hope the Filipinos will get their independence. Also, I hope we will grant the Filipinos a continuation of trade privileges for a few years after 1946. With a fair start, the Filipinos will govern themselves well. They work hard and are ambitious and anxious to succeed.

Yours faithfully,

WILLIAM C. RIVERS,
Major General, United States Army, Retired.

The National Park Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD T. TAYLOR

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 28, 1941

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I have always been keenly interested in the preservation of our attractive national scenery for two main reasons. In the first place, no patriotic westerner with a long view into the future can fail to recognize the value of our national parks in the Nation's economy. Our Federal parks protect the noblest scenic masterpieces in the United States and the most significant and sacred of our historic shrines. These areas form a background of the best our country has to offer, against which we citizens carry on our own individual and our national lives.

In the second place, I have a special personal interest in the National Park Service itself, since its history is so interlinked with my own public life. I have taken an active part in the creation of many of our national parks and monuments. In the early part of 1906, I joined with many other public-spirited citizens of Colorado in helping to secure establishment of the Mesa Verde National Park on June 29 of that year. Mrs. Taylor and I, with a guide and pack horses, visited that most attractive and weird region when there was not another human being within its present boundaries.

I took my seat in Congress March 4, 1909. In 1910 was launched a movement to create a bureau in the Federal Government charged with the duty of coordinating the national parks, which had grown in a somewhat Topsylike manner. People were becoming aware that they had ownership in a magnificent national heritage and were visiting the parks in increasing numbers. The new Glacier National Park had just been established, others were projected, and a coordination of national-park activities was imperative.

I am confident my personal vigorous appeal to President Taft in May 1911 had much to do with the Executive order which he issued on the 24th of May that year creating the Colorado National Monument in central western Colorado which has become one of the most popular monuments in our entire country.

The first effort to secure a parks bureau was headed by Dr. J. Horace McFarland, president of the American Civic Association—an organization that still, under its new name, American Planning and Civic Association, stands solidly for national-park integrity and against commercial aggression and nonconforming uses.

I remember that the then Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Walter L. Fisher, supported the project strongly, and that President Taft sent a special message to Congress urging the establishment of a parks bureau. Beginning in 1910, for three successive Congresses bills for this purpose were introduced by Judge John E. Raker of the House and Senator Reed Smoot.

But the time was not quite ripe and it was not until 1916 that a bill to establish the National Park Service, introduced by Congressman William Kent, was enacted into law. That was on August 25, 1916. I took a very active and enthusiastic part in the passage of the law creating the National Park Service. I felt then and I have believed ever since that it was one of the greatest measures ever enacted in Congress for the conservation and preservation of our scenery for the instruction and pleasure of all of our citizens and all foreign visitors to our country. I was a member of the Public Lands Committee in those days, and sat in at the hearings on the bill. Even then I was interested in financing. I was afraid at that time, for instance, that in the future one park, such as the Yellowstone, might make more money through its revenues than it needed, and so I suggested that the revenues be devoted to the Service generally, giving the Department discretion in the use of the funds. And I worried for fear the Washington end of the Service would grow too large. Later, when the bill was under consideration on the floor of the House, I made this statement:

> We, the committee, want to have a systematic distribution of improvements and the expenditure of money under the Service.

We have gone a long way since then in both budgeting and understanding park needs.

In 1921 I became a member of the Appropriations Committee and ever since have followed with closest interest the activities of the National Park Service.

Even before passage of the Organic Act setting up the National Park Service, steps were taken in the Department of the Interior to coordinate park administration. Franklin K. Lane had become Secretary of the Interior in President Woodrow Wilson's Cabinet in 1913. He was a man who knew and loved the national parks, and recognized the need for a central administration. He appointed as an assistant a fellow Californian, Adolph C. Miller, to give especial consideration to park matters. In 1915, Stephen T. Mather succeeded him as Assistant to the Secretary of the Interior in charge of national parks. Also a Californian, an outdoor man who knew the national parks from actual mountaineering experience, his appointment marked the beginning of a new era in park administration.

The tale is told—I do not vouch for it, but I like it—that Steve Mather, not liking certain conditions he encountered in a national park, so wrote his old friend of college days, Secretary Lane. The Secretary, the story goes, wrote back:

> DEAR STEVE: If you don't like the way the parks are being run, come down and run them yourself.

Whatever the motivation, Mr. Mather did just that. A practical businessman, he was also an idealist, his idealism being of the same brand as that which inspired the fathers of the Yellowstone idea. Most of you probably know the story of the establishment of Yellowstone National Park, but it will bear repetition. Indeed, its repetition is especially timely now, as it is the story of men voluntarily giving up land ownership and potential wealth that others might benefit.

I wish I could have been with the party that for a month in 1870 explored the country that is now Yellowstone National Park. Especially would I give much to have sat in at that campfire just before the party broke up, when they discussed preempting the wonders they had seen and ways and means of dividing them for maximum personal gain. One member of the party, Judge Cornelius Hedges, of Montana, opposed any filing of claims upon the Yellowstone. There should be no private ownership of any portion of that spectacular region, he said; rather, the whole of it should be set apart as a great national park. Eventually the others agreed. Nathaniel Langford, a member of the party who later became its historian, wrote in his dairy on September 20, 1870:

> I lay awake half the night thinking of it; and if my wakefulness deprived my bedfellow (Hedges) of any sleep, he has only himself and his disturbing national-park proposition to answer for it.

In 1872 Congress passed the act establishing the Yellowstone National Park as "a public park or pleasure ground for the benefit and enjoyment of the people." Thus a new concept of land use and the first national park came into existence.

Throughout the years the idealism upon which the Yellowstone was founded has been inherent in national-park management. Hand in hand with that idealism has gone a practical administration that has given the people of this country the world's outstanding scenic and historic park system.

The people of Colorado have always been especially interested in the development of the marvelous scenery of our State. Many of us worked for several years to secure the creation of the Rocky Mountain National Park. At that time there was vigorous opposition in Congress to the creation of any more national parks or monuments. Senator Thomas, of Colorado, and I were joint authors of the bill creating that park, and I had a long struggle in the House before succeeding, but I was finally successful in passing the bill through the House. President Wilson signed the law creating the park on January 26, 1915, and presented me with the pen, with an eloquent little speech. President Taft presented me the pen he used in signing the Executive order creating the Colorado National Monument, and President Hoover presented me the pen he used in signing the Executive order creating the Black Canyon of the Gunnison River as a national monument. I have preserved those pens, with many others, and also about 100 gavels that have been presented to me as chairman of the Appropriations Committee, which I intend to deposit in some historical museum in Colorado for safekeeping in perpetuity.

To those of us who were in at the birth of the Service, who know of the advances made in park administration during the next dozen years, the name of Stephen T. Mather is synonymous with conservation. He was a successful businessman who, having made for himself a sizable fortune, in middle life turned his talents to what he loved best—the preservation of our superlative natural heritage. Accepting the directorship of the National Park Service in the spring of 1917, with totally inadequate appropriations due to the war situation, he gathered around him a group of enthusiastic young people, who worked longer hours and were more underpaid, I venture to say, than any other similar group in the Government before or since. Among these was Horace M. Albright, another Californian, who went on Secretary Lane's staff with Adolph Miller in 1913. I shall say more about him later. I was a most profound admirer of Stephen T. Mather. He was one of the most public-spirited and noble characters I have ever known, and I was also a genuine admirer of Secretary Lane. In fact, he was a western man, and all of the West admired him. It was a common facetious saying in Colorado that President Wilson's Cabinet was composed of Secretary Lane and nine other fellows.

From the beginning Mather spent of his personal fortune as he did of his energies—in the latter being the first of several park men who literally gave their lives for the furtherance of the cause of national parks. He strongly believed that he should use his talents and wealth for the public good. No doubt many of you have heard him say that as he made his modest fortune out of the western lands through mining borax ore, he felt it fitting that some of his money should go back to the scenic lands of the West.

Through Mr. Mather's enthusiasm—backed by intense personal effort—an appropriation of $50,000 was secured from Congress which, supplemented by a donation of $20,000 from the National Geographic Society, made possible the purchase of the magnificent Giant Forest in Sequoia National Park. Without his efforts, trees thousands of years old would undoubtedly have been chopped down to serve as grapevine posts or pencils. He himself purchased other lands in Sequoia which he donated to the Government.

Again, it was Mather, with the Sierra Club and other friends, who bought the Tioga toll road in Yosemite National Park at a cost of $15,000—and then had to get authority from Congress to give it to the people; who purchased a private holding in Glacier National Park that interfered with effective administration; who spent $28,000 of his personal funds to construct a clubhouse for the rangers of Yosemite; who paid the salaries of additional needed employees in the Washington office. There is no telling how much he spent of his own money or the total amount he inspired others to contribute to national park work.

Of even greater value to the National Park Service, as setting the standards of integrity we so well recognize today, was his handling of Federal funds. Following the methods by which he had succeeded in business, Mr. Mather refused, when asking for appropriations, to pad the initial estimates. Most of you are familiar with the time-honored—or should I say dishonored—method of padding. A quarter of a century ago it was expected that any bureau chief naturally would ask for half again or twice as much money as he needed, in the hope that when Congress got through trimming he still would have the funds he really needed. Old-line Government people urged Mr. Mather to follow this procedure. He refused, admitting of no argument. He had run his business on business lines, he said, and so long as he managed the affairs of the National Park Service he intended to follow correct business practices.

For a year or two he took an awful trimming, but he stood steadfast on principle. And members of the congressional appropriations committees soon came to respect the estimates and justifications of the National Park Service as completely honest and aboveboard. We have not always agreed with the Service's point of view on particular points in debate, but we have never had cause to question honesty of motive. The procedure instituted by Mr. Mather prepared the Park Service for budgeting by the Bureau of the Budget. And here I want to pay tribute to Representative Louis C. Cramton, of Michigan, who, for many years, as chairman of the subcommittee handling Interior Department appropriations, was very largely helpful in building the present financial structure of the Service.

Mr. Mather had a tremendous capacity for friendship, and through it and his own enthusiasm he drew into the circle of national-park friends leading citizens everywhere. Conservationists, sportsmen, outdoor enthusiasts, writers and publishers, politicians and statesmen, professional people through him came to know and evaluate properly the place the Federal parks play in the pattern of our national life.

During his administration of the national-park system many new areas were added. Among these were the Rocky Mountain, Hawaii, Lassen Volcanic, Mount McKinley, Acadia—which was first established as the Sieur de Monts National Monument in 1916—Grand Canyon, Bryce Canyon, and Zion National Parks; and the Aztec Ruins, Capulin Mountain, Carlsbad Cave, Craters of the Moon, Dinosaur, Fossil Cycad, Glacier Bay, Hovenweep, Katmai, Pipe Spring, Scotts Bluff, Verendrye, Wupatki, and Yucca House National Monuments.

Mr. Mather's last and greatest contribution to the cause of national parks was his life. Suffering a stroke after an unusually heavy field schedule, Stephen Mather resigned on January 8, 1929, and died the following year. Of him Judge Louis C. Cramton said on the floor of the House when news of the great man's death reached us:

> There never shall come an end to the good that he has done.

Let me interpolate here that the same year another fine park man, W. B. Lewis, superintendent of Yosemite National Park from 1916 to 1927, and an assistant director of the Service from 1928 until 1930, literally died in harness. His death was the result of overwork in the early hard days of Service establishment, when men strained to carry on the heavy load until it literally broke their hearts.

Working closely with Mr. Mather throughout his service with the Government was Horace M. Albright. A Californian who was educated in the Colleges of Commerce and Law of the University of California, he joined the staff of the Secretary of the Interior in 1913. As assistant to Mr. Mather before the Service was organized, and as assistant director afterward, his was the guiding hand in legislative and organization matters, in working out new contracts with the concessionaires who had operated in many of the parks on Government franchise for years before the Service was established. In March 1919 Albright submitted his resignation, but finally agreed to continue in the Service in a field post.

Mr. Albright was a worthy successor to Mr. Mather. He had a natural adaptation for that service and he was a man of really superb executive ability. Our country is greatly indebted to both Mr. Mather and Mr. Albright and to Mr. Albright's successor, Arno B. Cammerer, who was one of the most lovable, public-spirited, kind-hearted, and fine citizens I have ever known. In July he was appointed Superintendent of Yellowstone National Park, largest as well as the oldest park in the system. As the first civilian superintendent of the Yellowstone in 32 years, he took over the supervision of the park from the Corps of Engineers and cavalary units of the United States Army and organized a civilian administration.

While carrying on this important work for nearly a decade, he spent approximately half of each year, including the winter months, in general duties as Assistant Director—field—still spending some time in Washington each year on legislative and financial matters. His brilliant defense of park legislation always made an excellent impression upon committee members, with whom he traveled extensively in the West.

Upon Mr. Mather's resignation in 1929 his mantle as Director of the National Park Service naturally fell upon Horace Albright, collaborator with him on all big park projects since 1915. The executive ability shown throughout his years with the Department came to full flower during this period. Under his able direction many new and pending projects came to fruition.

Always a student of American history, Albright turned his attention to preservation of historic sites and structures and sought transfer of the military and battlefield parks and other historic monuments from the War Department to the National Park Service of the Department of the Interior. With the aid of friends in Congress, he made rapid progress after getting legislation directing the National Park Service to restore George Washington's birthplace at Wakefield, Va. He had the conviction that unless all Federal parks, scenic and historic, all memorials and cherished sites of national significance, and even the District of Columbia parks, were under the National Park Service its influence would never be as strong in conservation as its policies and personnel could make it. Also, he felt that with historic and some scenic and scientific regions scattered among other departments there was always danger that the National Park Service might itself be merged with some other bureau and thus lose its identity altogether. So he was everlastingly courting mergers of other park administrations in other departments with his own in the Interior Department.

President Hoover, in 1932, in his first reorganization plan—which was opposed by Congress—proposed the consolidation of most of the Federal park areas in the national-park system. A year later Mr. Albright's program was incorporated in the first reorganization proposal submitted to Congress by President Roosevelt, and became effective in August 1933.

I have always been profoundly grateful to Mr. Albright and to Secretary Wilbur for supporting my earnest effort to secure the establishment of the Black Canyon of the Gunnison River in my district as a national monument, and we finally succeeded in presuading President Hoover to sign the order creating that monument on March 2, 1933, it being one of the very last acts of his official career.

This park reorganization, however, was never completely satisfactory to Mr. Albright, because it was expanded to include some national cemeteries, public buildings, and other holdings which he felt could not be administered with parks without getting far away from the primary objectives of the organic act of Congress creating the National Park Service.

Another field of activity which interested Albright was personnel selection and organization. He devoted special attention to reclassification of his employees and gained recognition of his Bureau as in the most important group. A firm believer in the merit system and the policies of the Civil Service Commission, he sought able, well-trained men through insistence on examinations, both oral and written, designed to obtain capable employees with exceptional personalities.

The first national historical park was established during Albright's administration, and also the first national monuments of historic interest in the East under Park Service jurisdiction. Interpretation of national parks, after 10 years' trial on a temporary seasonal basis, became a definite part of national-park administration with congressional approval. I know of no single factor that gives more pleasure and understanding to visitors to the national parks than does this interpretive program.

Throughout the years, from the very beginnings of the Service, business had been wooing Mr. Albright. In August 1933, he finally capitulated and resigned as Director. Let me say here, however, that his interest in national park affairs has never waned. His old friends in Congress and elsewhere in the Government still count him one of their strongest allies when park interests are threatened. He is a trustee of Mr. Rockefeller's corporations restoring Colonial Williamsburg and of his Jackson Hole Preserve, Inc. Albright also is president of the American Planning & Civic Association.

When Mr. Albright became Superintendent of Yellowstone National Park in July 1919, Arno B. Cammerer, formerly with the Fine Arts Commission, was appointed assistant director of national parks, a position later changed to associate director. Later he served in the same capacity to Horace Albright.

During that period Mr. Cammerer devoted much of his official and private time to the promotion of the great eastern national-park projects, which as Director he saw come to fruition. His lavish expenditure of energy during this period laid the groundwork for the physical break that recently proved fatal. He covered nearly every inch of the lands now included in the Shenandoah, Great Smoky Mountains, Mammoth Cave, and Isle Royale National Parks; assisted in laying out their boundaries, advised the associations, commissions, and State governments on securing lands or funds for the purchase of lands; and was personally instrumental in securing huge donations for that purpose. Most of you know the story of the $5,000,000 Rockefeller contribution to the purchase of the Smokies, and of other large gifts. He also labored energetically on the Florida Everglades, never losing hope through years of discouragement. I trust this park may soon be established, as another living memorial to him.

Perhaps the most difficult part of his task in connection with these eastern parks was standing firmly against pressure from enthusiastic backers who oftimes attempted in all honesty to circumvent boundary agreements or conditions of gifts in their eagerness to secure full park status. Eager as Mr. Cammerer himself was to secure the same end, he stood adamant against any short cuts to parkhood that were not in full accord with the intentions of Congress and of contributors to the project, or that would impair the future development of the areas. A man of strong friendships, it was not easy to oppose his friends; to seem to impede progress on the projects. But Cammerer was as noted for his unswerving sense of duty as well as for his loyalty to his friends. Hurt though it must have, he acted on conviction—and future events proved him right.

Inevitably, when Albright resigned, Cammerer succeeded to the directorship—a position for which 10 years of intensive training had admirably fitted him. On the day he became director, August 10, 1933, the President's reorganization of Federal parks, for which Albright had worked so long, took effect. The day before, the Service had administered 63 areas. The reorganization increased the areas to 128, including the unit of the National Capital Parks System. Also added were the functions of various independent establishments. The administration and control of public buildings, included in the reorganization, was held by the Service until July 1, 1939, when it was transferred to a more appropriate agency.

Here you must bear with me for a personal sidelight. Back in July 1916, when the bill to establish the National Park Service was being debated on the floor of the House, I had urged that jurisdiction of all national monuments be placed under the supervision of the Interior Department's prospective new bureau. Even if my arguments did not prevail then, it was gratifying to have my judgment vindicated in 1933 in President Roosevelt's reorganization.

Close on the heels of reorganization came the rapidly expanding emergency relief programs, undertaken in cooperation with C. C. C., P. W. A., C. W. A., E. R. A., N. Y. A., and other agencies. In this connection increase of service personnel was no small part of the problem to be met. On June 30, 1939, there were 13,151 persons on the Service rolls, as against 2,000 on June 30, 1933. Handling such an increase in so short a time put an enormous burden upon the small staff of the service, both in Washington and in the field.

However, I want to emphasize that no funds spent on emergency activities could have been expended to better advantage than on national-park development. The rapidly mounting visiting list had resulted in the urgent need for many new facilities. From 1916 to 1940, travel to the areas under the supervision of the National Park Service increased from 358,006 to 16,741,855, partly, of course, through establishment of new areas and transfers of others. A recent check with the Service developed the fact that preseason travel at this time is away ahead of the same period last year. During the depression years, C. C. C., P. W. A., and other available funds were God-sends to the park administrators.

In addition to the vast increase in duties and responsibilities brought to the Service since 1933 through reorganization and emergency activities, two new programs undertaken as regular functions during Mr. Cammerer's administration are of especial interest to the various States and their political subdivisions. The first, providing for the preservation of historic American sites, buildings, and objects of national significance made possible, for the first time in the history of the United States, a broad program of study and preservation of our historic resources. The Service has cooperated with the States and with local and private agencies in the designation of our sacred national shrines as historic sites, and in making agreements with accredited organizations for their development and administration, when not owned by the United States.

The other important new program was the Nation-wide study of public park, parkway, and recreational areas and facilities, undertaken in 1936, which is proving of inestimable value to the States and will be the broad basis for an adequate recreational sytem for the entire country, with coordinated planning between various agencies.

All of these new duties, added to the already arduous work of National Park Service administration, took their toll, and finally Arno B. Cammerer, in April 1939, suffered a severe heart attack which led to the submission to the Secretary of the Interior of his resignation as Director. When relieved of the duties of Service Director, he continued as regional director of region 1, with headquarters at Richmond, Va.

Mr. Cammerer's friends in Congress regretted deeply the necessity for his retirement, yet were glad, under the conditions, that he took what promised to be the safe path for him for many years. We also rejoiced when Secretary Ickes appointed as Director of the National Park Service a man steeped in park and conservation faith, a friend of all three previous directors, a man who had worked with them all for more than a score of years. We look forward to as happy associations with Director Newton B. Drury as we had with his three predecessors. He has a great history to live up to, but I am told by many who know him well that he will do all of that, and make a record of his own. I wish the new Director, Mr. Newton B. Drury, success and that he may fully measure up to the patriotic and wonderful standard of his distinguished predecessors.

As regional director, Cammerer continue to overwork, with little thought of conserving himself. His love of the work was too great. Only a few months ago he was in Florida, to push the Everglades project; then shortly afterward he went to Mammoth Cave, to solve problems concerning the change from limited to full national-park status. Away again on park business—and a collapse. Then the long journey, from which there is no return.

We need men like Cammerer in the Federal Government, and we should take steps to save those we have from death from overwork. Continued overburdening of willing workers is, in the long run, national waste.

During Mr. Cammerer's directorship two other Park Service men of long and valuable service also died in harness of heart trouble. Charles Goff Thomson, Superintendent of Yosemite National Park, carried such a heavy load of work during a period of intense and unusual activities, despite orders from his physician to rest, until a tired heart gave out. Frank Pinkley, Superintendent of Southwestern Monuments and dean of the Park Service, literally died with his boots on—collapsing a few minutes after making the keynote speech at a southwestern conference.

I mention these tragedies only to point up my statement that the National Park Service is one of the hardest working Government agencies, with a personnel which feels an undying devotion to the cause of conservation.

This review of the work of the past directors of the National Park Service would not be complete without a tribute to Associate Director Arthur E. Demaray, one of the many career men and women of the National Park Service, and to the many distinguished Members of both Houses of Congress, too numerous to mention, who supported the Service's conservation programs and promoted legislation to effect them.

Mr. Demaray has been with the Service since its formal organization in 1917, and even before that worked on park problems. For nearly 20 years he has participated actively in the administrative work, with emphasis on budgetary matters, and since 1933 has been Associate Director. As Associate Director, and for several years previously, much of Demaray's time has been spent in handling the affairs of the national-park system as Acting Director. No man knows better than he the widely diversified problems of the Service, for he has handled every angle of the work. He is favorably known to Members of Congress, through personal contacts and committee hearings. The Service is fortunate in having such a career man on its staff.

Just one more statement, and I will be through. I want to express the hope that our American people, during the grave crises with which we are confronted, will maintain a balanced outlook on life. In this we have only to follow the example set us by the brave British. Let us not be panicked into believing that there is no place in our present scheme of existence for any enjoyment—that we should not think of play, or vacations, while the world is in such a turmoil.

Such an attitude would, in the long run, defeat the national purpose. We must bend every energy to the great effort of maintaining democratic freedom; of keeping our solemn pledges to supply materials to our friends across the seas. But we can make these efforts more successful, keep these pledges more effectively, if we retain our balance. The more intense our efforts, the more need for relaxation. So let us take every opportunity we have for recreation in the great outdoors, to store up new strength, new energy, with which to attack the problem before us. Above all, let us keep our morale high, our confidence supreme, no matter what the immediate situation. Thinking back upon some of the scenes commemorated in our military and other historic parks will remind us that had our forefathers given up when defeat seemed inevitable, our history would have been very different—and the world might never had evolved the national-park idea.

I have often said that the National Park Service was the nearest and dearest to me of any of the public bureaus in Washington. I hope the approaching twenty-fifth anniversary of the official birth of the Park Service on August 25 this year may be a happy occasion for all of the Park Service people and their friends throughout our Nation and that each quarter of a century thereafter may be celebrated with increasing pleasure and enthusiasm for countless generations to come.

W. P. A. Sewing Projects

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 28, 1941

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker and members of the House, due to the fact that there is definitely evidenced a reduction in W. P. A. funds for the coming fiscal year and that through this reduction of appropriations it will be necessary to curtail projects and reduce in numbers the people who, through necessity, have been upon the W. P. A. program, there should be some correction. Also in California sewing projects are being closed in order to meet the reduced appropriation requirements.

I feel that it should be brought to the attention of membership of this House that the sewing projects are the last type of W. P. A. project that should be closed. An investigation of the type of person who is employed on the sewing projects indicates that these women are not able to secure employment in a private capacity and there certainly is no place available for them on the preparedness program. Consequently it seems to me that if there is to be a reduction that projects other than the sewing projects should be closed.

Our Government is placing contracts for shirts, coveralls, and various types of garments for the men who are now serving under the Selective Draft Act. It would seem to me that if there were closer cooperation within the governmental agencies that instead of placing all of the garment contracts in private industry that certain types of these garments could be made to advantage by those women who are employed upon the sewing projects of the W. P. A., because we have been given to understand by the press that the textile manufacturers are far behind in their orders for garments. It occurs to me as being an economic fallacy to use the taxpayers' money for private contracts and appropriate money for relief requirements when by using contractual privileges within a reasonable degree the sewing projects could be made self-supporting and further keep these women gainfully employed.

While we are making our contributions to England, which is a very splendid and a necessary thing to do, we must never overlook the economic necessities for taking care of our own people at home if we are to expect national unity and patriotism. We should not lose sight of the fact that while the defense program has created many new positions which eliminate the necessity of many of our men remaining on the W. P. A. rolls, there are many localities throughout the United States in which there are no defense projects, and it is the duty of this Congress to provide means for taking care of conditions of this character because industry is still refraining from employing men in the later-year brackets.

It is my contention that we as a legislative body should look into this situation very carefully and see that there is adequate appropriation to take care of the W. P. A. necessity.

The following resolution from the Board of Supervisors of San Bernardino County, in California, indicates the concern of that body pertaining to the closing of the sewing projects:

Whereas we have been notified of a cut in the case load of the W. P. A. sewing projects from about 400 to 188, and of the closing of the sewing projects at Bloomington and Upland; and

Whereas these projects are the only opportunity for a women's work-relief program other than in professional classifications; and

Whereas with the abolishment of S. R. A. and the failure of the legislature to provide a direct relief program for the women on W. P. A. sewing projects, they must of necessity become county indigents, supported by the charity of the county, and an additional burden upon the local property taxpayers: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the San Bernardino County Board of Supervisors respectfully recommends that the W. P. A. authorities, when cutting the case load of W. P. A., give preference to women on W. P. A. sewing projects, those working in other classifications having better opportunities for employment in private industry; and be it further Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to Senator HIRAM JOHNSON, Senator SHERIDAN DOWNEY, and Representative HARRY R. SHEPPARD.

The O–9

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VICTOR WICKERSHAM

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 28, 1941

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker, William R. Cannady, 21-year-old Granite youth, a third-class fireman, was aboard the submarine O–9, which was declared lost. I have known and liked this young man all his life. He was my friend. His parents, Mr. and Mrs. Porter Cannady, are my best friends. His grandfather and grandmother, Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Cannady, were my closest friends. Death and tragedy have stalked into the life of this family many times in recent years, and it grieves me much to think that this fine young man and those other 32 fine American citizens were sent to their death in an antiquated sardine can such as that rickety submarine O–9, which dropped into that deep hole off Portsmouth, N. H. That primitive relic of the last war had about as much business in deep water as an electric-light bulb in a pressure machine. If they were going to dive it at all, the Navy officials should have chosen the bed of some not too deep river or some shallow inlet such as the closer reaches off Cape Cod. We have got to train men, of course, but that is not training them; that is drowning them in a treacherous, black, watery grave. Only God can excuse such gross negligence and carelessness on the part of officials in charge.

There is something about a man or a few men trapped in a situation that can only mean slow death that has quicker appeal than the story of many more men killed suddenly and savagely in battle. Think of the horror of the slow death of these 33 young men. Think of the brutality of such an incident. Yes; think of the faces of the mothers, fathers, or wives and children, or may I say "widows and orphans." Think of the stunned expressions of the girls they were about to marry. They line the shore at the spot nearest the watery grave and stand helplessly by, their faces asking the same mute question of every sailor, officer, or reporter who comes ashore from the scene. And out there where the searchlights play upon that black and tumbling water, with the buoys bobbing darkly to mark the location, with the divers, the winches, the derricks, the grim faces of the officers forming a pattern of desperation, as the hours pass and hope slides away without anybody's having the courage to mention the fact that it's getting late—yes; too late. It is wicked enough even when there is normal excuse. This is dangerous work, and accidents will happen. But because it is dangerous and because accidents do happen they should at least send our lads into such risk in something more substantial than a zinc outmoded strawberry crate that was new 23 years ago, before most of the young men were born. We do not face that amount of emergency—not yet.

I think we should assure all members of the armed forces that they will have as good equipment as we are sending to England. That in the future we will at least give them a fighting chance by giving them good equipment to start with. Until this is done it seems wicked to risk other lives in sister ships. The parents, wives and children or sweethearts of other young men are entitled to know that the future will not be like the past. They are entitled to a full and decent investigation of this tragedy. I urge that the O–9 be raised for inspection of structural and mechanical faults. Navy officials said last Sunday evening that the O–9 was officially declared lost.

I have offered a resolution in the House which will require Navy officials to raise the O–9 and ascertain the structural and mechanical faults, and I have asked that a special committee be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives to make a full and complete investigation, which I consider the just duty of the Government.

Strike Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS F. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 28, 1941

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I have had long and serious discussions with members of labor organizations, not just labor lobbyists, but honest-to-God workmen who represent not a limited group of leaders but the rank and file of the skilled men who do the work.

Their reaction to the labor provisions of the May bill is an easily understood one. They fear, and rightly so, that this bill (S. 1524) inaugurates a program that has for its purpose the breaking down of the major protective legislation labor has secured in the last 10 years.

They reason, and I agree with them, that if you can forbid by legislation the right to strike for an hour or 1 day or 25 days, you can deny that right in perpetuity.

LET'S NOT OUT-HITLER HITLER

However convincing the argument that the North American Aviation strike and some others were due to clever Communist strategy engineered by a small but energetic minority, we should not let this stampede the Congress into passing repressive legislation so far-reaching as to out-Hitler Hitler.

In fact, there is sound reason for deferring all hysterical strike legislation at this time. The labor situation in defense industries is clearing up. The machinery already set up for peaceful and quick mediation and settlement of labor disputes is now in full gear. It is proving effective. It is accepted by the responsible labor leaders of both the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. President Green, of the A. F. of L., said recently:

> We commit ourselves to avoid strikes, not only for trivial reasons but for scarcely any cause unless particular conditions become unbearable.

President Murray, of the C. I. O., made a similar statement.

ONLY EXTREMISTS OBSTRUCT

Only the extremists, the radicals, the hotheads, those under Communist or Nazi or Fascist influence, are trying to obstruct the operation of the system so successfully worked out for the settlement of labor differences.

Is it wise to let these extremists influence this Congress to pass strike legislation which the most recent developments prove is not now needed?

To pass this bill in the face of the determined opposition of organized labor is to create resentment among the mass of workers whose loyalty to the Nation and to the defense program is unquestioned.

We say we want a united Nation in this crisis. We will not get this by employing drastic, ill-considered statutory measures. We will get it by following a just course toward all classes of society, including those who do the work.

CONGRESS NEEDS A COOLING-OFF PERIOD

It is easy to talk in soothing tones of a "cooling-off" period for labor. I think we need just such a period here in Congress. If we defer this action for 25 days I am convinced that events will amply prove that neither the Vinson bill, the labor sections of the May bill, nor any other of the drastic bills related to it would be necessary. In a time such as this, it behooves us all to keep cool and move with wisdom and justice in our hearts instead of resentment against those who do the hard and tiring and absolutely essential tasks of today.

It is cruel, unwise, and un-American to undertake to force either labor or capital into goose-stepping. While there is evidence that a small minority of both labor and capital are employing despicable and obstructive methods, let me say, with all the force I possess, as the great Burke said, "You cannot indict a whole people."

Neutrality of Ireland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD J. WELCH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 28, 1941

LETTER OF FRANK J. BARRY, PROMINENT MEMBER OF THE LOS ANGELES BAR, TO FRANCIS E. McMAHON, PROFESSOR OF PHILOSOPHY, NOTRE DAME UNIVERSITY

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to permission heretofore granted by the House, I append hereto a letter written by Mr. Frank J. Barry, prominent member of the Los Angeles bar, to Mr. Francis E. McMahon, professor of philosophy, Notre Dame University, on the right of Ireland to maintain her neutrality by refusing to yield her ports or any part of Eire to belligerent countries.

The letter follows:

FRANCIS E. McMAHON,
Professor of Philosophy,
Notre Dame University,
Notre Dame, Ind.

DEAR SIR: I write you as an Irish-American of Irish birth. I also write as a Notre Dame man.

I have read your open letter in the New Republic to Eamon de Valera, the Prime Minister of the Cabinet of Eire. You make numerous statements in said letter which are not supported by the facts of history. A few of these I call to your attention.

You say the present war is not merely for markets and territories. "It is a struggle for the possession of the human soul," you say. You say that Britain's side is "based upon law, justice, and human dignity," and Germany's side "upon arbitrary will, violence, and human slavery."

You say that you appeal for the cause which England represents today, "the cause of all humanity." You state that this cause which England stands for "is the cause likewise of America and Eire."

You state that "it may astonish us that it should be England today that resists the enemy of all religion and all true culture. But England it is."

You apostrophize upon Ireland's devotion to religious truth and leave the implication that only under England could such devotion have flourished, and you declare with emphasis that England now fights for the preservation of the Christian faith.

You declare with emotion, "wherever the flags of empire wave today, there the church is at peace."

You put the question: "What do we ask of the Irish people?" And you answer: "Merely the use of three naval bases—Cobh, Berehaven, and Lough Swilly. The treaty of 1921 reserved to England these ports. They were and are vital to her defense. In 1938, however, Prime Minister Chamberlain gave them back as a gesture of friendship, hoping that in any future hour of trial England would not be denied access to them."

You finally refer to Ireland's part in re-Christianizing England and Europe after the darkness of barbarism had enveloped them. Now, you assert, Eire can help to turn back a worse barbarism by surrendering her territory to England.

Before discussing these statements let me assure you that I condemn with all the vehemence I possess the Nazi doctrine, the Nazi policies and methods of conquest, and the Nazi way of life. But because I detest nazi-ism does not mean that I must extol the British doctrine, the British policies and methods of conquest, or the British imperialistic way of life.

I disagree with your assertion that the present war is not merely for markets and territories. I hold that that is its sole and exclusive objective. I assert that if England could be assured of the continuation of her world domination—she now rules one-fourth of the habitable land area of the earth and 15,000,000 more than one-third of the entire population of the globe—and be assured of the profits she derives from the exploitation of her vast dominions, she would care little what happens to the victims of Nazi aggression or to America. You have only to recall her callous indifference to Manchuria and Abyssinia, and more recently her characteristic cruelty in refusing permission to the Hoover committee to ship food to the hungry people overrun by Hitler. How do you reconcile these acts with what you describe as England's part in "the struggle for the possession of the human soul," whatever that means? Or how do you reconcile these with what you proclaim as England's championship of "law, justice, and human dignity"?

Where do you find the factual support for your statement that England's cause today is the cause of all humanity? Have you ever heard of British India or British Africa or the British West Indies? I invite your brief study of these British dominions so that you may learn to what extent today the cause of all humanity touches England's heart there.

You wax eloquent about England's fight against the enemies of religion. You know, of course, that she justified her first invasion of Ireland as for the purpose of bringing Christianity to the rude barbarians who inhabited that land. Have you heard about the condition of freedom of religion in Northern Ireland under England's rule today? If you have not, I invite you to study the recent pastorals of Cardinal MacRory on that subject, and then say whether England's pretended championship of freedom of religion today is not the same hypocrisy by which she has justified her passion for greed and conquest during all her history. When you have studied the situation in Northern Ireland today perhaps you may want to revise your statement that "wherever the flags of Empire wave, there the church is at peace." I cannot agree with the inference which can be drawn from this unwarranted statement that the teachings of the humble Nazarene are consistent with the waving of imperialistic flags or by any other methods than by self-effacing self-sacrifice and humility of missionaries like those who restored civilization to England when she was in the darkness of barbarism after the fall of the Roman Empire.

What, Professor McMahon, is the significance of the personal pronoun "we" in your question, "What do we ask of the Irish people?" Does it signify that you are another American who regards America as a mere dependency of England? This would certainly be a plausible explanation of the slip.

You speak of the return of Irish territory to Ireland as an act of English generosity. Do your philosophic researches ever suggest to you that there is such a principle in ethics as restitution? Do you hold that restitution means that the original aggressor has a right to retake the property restored whenever "in any future hour of trial" he may have need for it? Does such latter doctrine apply to individuals? If not, why should it be accorded to empires? And is it founded on justice? Or perhaps philosophy?

But were we to assume that the England of the past has truly reformed, Anthony Eden's very recent statement of England's war aims to the contrary notwithstanding, what bond has Ireland that at this war's conclusion England would return these bases to their rightful owner? Is the reputation of England for honesty and integrity so good that her unsecured promise can be relied upon? Has she discharged her just obligations to Ireland—not obligations of the past, but present obligations? Has she discharged her obligations to her other creditors, notably America? What security, therefore, do you offer Prime Minister de Valera that these bases will be returned to Ireland after the war? No responsible British statesman has even suggested that they ever will be returned. You know Churchill has complained that he opposed the restitution in the first instance. And you yourself intimate that their abandonment was one of Chamberlain's appeasements, an act of weakness. Despite their love of poetry, the Irish will not accept rainbow promises.

My dear Professor McMahon, I cannot conceive how you, the son of a Kerryman and the bearer of that proud McMahon name, with all the advantages you must have had, could be so uninformed upon Ireland's history of the past and of today as to suggest for a moment that the policy of strict neutrality adopted by Eire, and approved by every political party in that country, should be abandoned in the interest of an empire engaged in a war solely to perpetuate her domination over millions upon millions of people who clamor for freedom and even to perpetuate the wrongful retention by that same empire of one-fifth of Ireland's own territory.

As a true American and as the son of a Kerry Irishman you should instinctively know that America must not depend upon a traditional enemy now to safeguard or protect her.

Very truly yours,

FRANK J. BARRY.

ANOTHER DOUBLE-HEADER HOLIDAY

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, when Thanksgiving Day was moved back by Executive proclamation there was a great hue and cry against the proposal. The effort ended in confusion. Some States observed Thanksgiving Day according to the calendar makers and others observed the new day. Some States had double-header Thanksgiving Days. But the whole undertaking proved abortive. It did not generate more business. It did not inspire more folks to do their Christmas shopping earlier, and at long last there came an admission that later on the old Thanksgiving Day might result. But now comes a proposal which, instead of providing two different holidays, might result in two kinds of a holiday on the same day. We refer to Senate bill No. 1242, introduced on March 27, 1941, designating the 4th day of July of each year as Democracy Day. "Ain't" that something? Imagine a Nation-wide commingling of flags, festoons, streamers, banners, and other holiday display, some of which announce Independence Day and some Democracy Day. Imagine the folks across the street celebrating Independence Day while you observe Democracy Day. Imagine the chairman at the community celebration announcing, "Mr. John Q. Citizen will now read the Declaration of Democracy." Imagine—but you can imagine it for yourself.

UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

The present turn of events in Europe has stimulated interest in the resistive powers of the Soviet. It is still referred to as Russia, but nowhere in the Constitution of the Soviet does the word "Russia" appear. The word "Russian" is used to describe one of the States of the Soviet Union. What about this Soviet Union? The National Geographic Society in Washington has just issued an up-to-date bulletin which describes the Soviet as 2½ times the size of the United States with 193,000,000 people divided into 175 racial groups. It is estimated that this one country contains 21 percent of the world's coal, six and one-third billion tons of iron ore, and is second in the production of oil. In 1937 it produced more than 3,000,000 tons of manganese which is an essential defense item. It has an inexhaustible supply of timber and has a potential of 65,000,000 electric horsepower. It is the world's largest wheat-producing country and seeded 102,000,000 acres in 1937. Compare that with 53,000,000 acres in the United States, 27,000,000 acres in Canada, 13,000,000 in Australia, and 19,000,000 in the Argentine. It has extensive deposits of bauxite from which aluminum is derived. In addition, it is rich in gold, silver, platinum, zinc, and other metals. It is truly a land of vast physical resources.

HERE'S HOW IT WORKS

The United States uses about 817,000 tons of rubber per year. The present rate of imports is about 1,000,000 tons per year. Normally, that should leave us with a reserve of 183,000 tons at the end of the year. The Priorities Division of the Office of Production Management, however, has issued an order to cut the rate of consumption to 600,000 tons per year. This will be done progressively so that in December of 1941 the manufacturers who use crude rubber will be able to secure only 80 percent of their averaged needs and requirements. Thus, the Government orders control of a very essential commodity even when there is no shortage. You ask why? The principal reason is that rubber is all imported from other continents and the shipping facilities grow more uncertain with each passing week. This control obviously raises another problem. If only 80 percent of normal domestic requirements will be available to industry by December of 1941, it is fair to assume that prices on tires, hot-water bottles, and other rubber items will advance. The answer is "maybe" because the Administrator of Prices and Civilian Supply may step in and place a ceiling on the price of commodities made of rubber. Here you have a clear-cut example of the problems of supply, demand, and price control which springs from the defense program.

AGE 28 WOULD BE TOP

The amendment to the Selective Service Act which Congress will consider on July 8 provides that men who on July 1, 1941, or thereafter who are liable for training and service and have not been inducted into service and who have attained the twenty-eighth anniversary of their birth shall be deferred from training and service. One of the things discovered by the Selective Service System was that 52 percent of those between the ages of 31 and 36 were rejected as physically unfit and 36 percent of those between 26 and 30 were rejected for the same reason. Another factor is dependency. Of the 5,500,000 registrants who were classified up to March 31, 3,700,000 or about 70 percent were given a III–A rating, which means deferment because of dependents. Most of these were in the upper age group. On these grounds the Selective Service System recommended a reduction of the maximum age from 35 to 28. This measure would become effective immediately after its enactment.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. O'CONNOR

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 28, 1941

RESOLUTION OF THE SOUTHEASTERN MONTANA COUNTIES ASSOCIATION

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution:

Whereas the Southeastern Montana Counties Association is meeting in regular session in the town of Broadus, in the State of Montana, on this 20th day of June 1941; and

Whereas the Southeastern Montana Counties Association is a representative group composed of farmers, ranchers, laborers, businessmen, representatives of women's clubs, civic groups, local governmental groups from a territory comprising 20 percent of the population; 25 percent of the area, 27 percent of the assessed valuation of the State of Montana; and

Whereas the people of this section of the great State of Montana have shown a willingness to enter wholeheartedly into the spirit and purpose of our present national defense and unlimited national emergency; and

Whereas this has been ably demonstrated by the contribution of manpower which Montana has made to the United States Army and Navy in ratio of 1 to 96 of its population as against 1 to 131 for the State of Missouri, 1 to 116 for the State of Pennsylvania, 1 to 148 for the State of New Jersey, and similar ratios for many other States of the Union; and

Whereas the people of the State of Montana have met with continual rebuff in their efforts to contribute of their resources to the defense of this country, other than its manpower; and

Whereas constant appeals to our Representatives in the Senate and Congress of the United States have resulted in nothing of a concrete nature in these matters while orders are piled upon orders in States already loaded down beyond their ability to produce, thus causing shortages of electrical energy, shipping facilities, production units, and machinery, and

Whereas the State of Montana is a vast area of unlimited natural resources such as minerals, developed water power, coal for steam production, natural gas for electrical development, petroleum, refined gasoline, and countless other resources; and

Whereas surveys made within the State show many machine shops now working only part time and much precision machinery in private hands which is idle and might well be used in handling a part of the contracts which are being held up in already overloaded areas; and

Whereas these facts have been communicated to our representatives in Congress who in turn have placed them with the Office of Production Management without arousing any apparent interest on the part of said Office; and

Whereas it seems to be impossible for local patriotic people to even remotely interest primary contractors in the use of the natural and developed resources of the State of Montana to the end that defense contracts might be expedited and removed from sections where they are now badly bogged down: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we again call this matter to the attention of Senator BURTON K. WHEELER, Senator JAMES E. MURRAY, Congressman JAMES F. O'CONNOR, and Congresswoman JEANETTE RANKIN with the most urgent solicitation that they, individually and collectively, spare no effort to bring the Office of Production Management and its associated officials to a keen realization of the vast natural and developed resources which are left untouched and unsued in the defense program while other sections of these United States are staggering beneath a load apparently beyond their ability to deliver in time to contribute to the saving of the British Empire in its dogged fight against the ruthless dictators of the Old World, recognizing that the fall of said British Empire would immediately bring us face to face with the task of beating off Germany, Italy, and Japan single handed in a still unprepared condition of defense; and, be it further

Resolved, That we decry the general apathy that has been shown us in our efforts to assist our Government in its defense program, both by our official representatives in the Senate and Congress of the United States and by those in charge of the Office of Production Management, and that we want those officials to know and realize that we have more than secondary efforts and resources to offer to them for the defense of our country; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to His Excellency Franklin Delano Roosevelt, President of the United States, William S. Knudsen, and Sidney Hillman, jointly charged with the conduct of the Office of Production Management, Harry Hopkins, in charge of the lease-lend plan, Senator BURTON K. WHEELER, Senator JAMES E. MURRAY, Congressman JAMES F. O'CONNOR, Congresswoman JEANETTE RANKIN, Governor Sam C. Ford, Mr. R. E. Towle, Managing Director of the Federal Reserve branch bank at Helena, Mont., Montanans', Inc., and that a copy thereof be spread upon the minutes of this organization as a part of the meeting on the day and date first recorded herein.

Ford, the C. I. O., and National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 28, 1941

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, that the homefolks are awakening—in fact, they have long been awake—to what is happening is shown by editorials in the smaller dailies and many of the weekly newspapers of the country.

Here is one from the Cassopolis Vigilant of June 26, 1941, published at Cassopolis, Mich., which is so concise and clear that it should be widely distributed. William Berkey, the editor, writes as follows:

We believe most people were depressed last Saturday when they read in the papers that the Ford Motor Co. had granted the C. I. O. a contract, because most of those readers realized that Henry Ford, labor's best industrial friend, and his associates, had been beaten into submission. They remembered that when the strike came at the Ford plant neither State nor Federal Government gave protection to men who wanted to continue at work nor protected the property of the Ford Motor Co. The financial loss to the company because of destruction of property, and to the workers for lost time, was tremendous. Having contracted to produce around $150,000,000 worth of defense goods such as airplane engines, bomber parts, army trucks, etc., for the Government, and with the Government fostering C. I. O. efforts, the Ford Co., it appears to us, had only two alternatives, one being to surrender and take on the C. I. O., and the other being to quit, and Henry Ford would not quit when his country needed the defense materials, which is more than can be said for the C. I. O., which has not hesitated to call strikes in factories making defense goods. Now, Mr. Ford's employees, more than 100,000 in number, must all come under the C. I. O. and have the dues taken out of their wages. What a harvest for the C. I. O. Michigan added nothing to its glory when it permitted the lawlessness at the Ford and other plants, and it may be interesting to note how Michigan is viewed elsewhere. The following paragraph from the Chicago Tribune is a good example of how we appear to others:

"Senator VANDENBERG (in his speech during the debate on the plant-seizure bill) exhibited pictures of workers being slugged by the pickets and produced copies of the Communist cards of some of the rioters. As usual in Michigan, the law-enforcement officers did little to prevent the rioters and have done less to see that known persons were punished. This was a typical New Deal treatment of a violent attack upon private management. Such attacks have had the sympathy and encouragement of the Federal Government under Mr. Roosevelt. Punishment for outrageous acts has been infrequently imposed. Protection for plant management and nonstriking workers has been infrequently given. Law enforcement has adjourned when the lawless moved in."

The surrender of the Ford Motor Co., important as it is in its implications, is not the most important phase of the matter. Real importance lies in the fact, and we believe it is a fact, that it is only part of a definite plan to bring all industry, large and small, under the iron-hand control of the group that heads the C. I. O., and, when that is accomplished, America is at the mercy of that group politically, economically, and socially. These things have come to us gradually, and one needs to look back to see how they came. While conditions may have been in the making previously, the first serious evidence of it was in the sit-down strikes which Governor Murphy, in daily phone consultation with President Roosevelt, permitted to go on indefinitely in this State, from which it spread to other States, and many people still believe that the C. I. O. contribution of nearly a half million dollars to the New Deal campaign fund was planned to gain just that kind of a hold upon the President. Then, Governor Murphy, having been repudiated by the people of Michigan, he was placed successively in two important places where he could be useful in furthering the social ideas involved—first as Attorney General, and now as Justice of the United States Supreme Court. Events have moved rapidly toward the desired end and now, although we boast a free country, not one of the Ford Motor Co.'s over 100,000 employees is free to work in their factories without having his C. I. O. dues taken out of his wages. Above is not a pretty picture but it is the picture as we see it.

The dues to be collected from Ford workmen and turned over to the C. I. O. amount to more than $130,000 per month. It certainly was a great victory for C. I. O.

The foregoing is but the expression of an opinion which I have many, many times voiced ever since the beginning of the sit-down strikes in Michigan on the last day of December 1936.

Some day those who advocate the closed shop will learn—and I hope it will not be to their sorrow—that they have, in selecting the C. I. O. as bargaining agent, exchanged the employer for a harder, more arbitrary boss, who has no real interest in them except as it can collect dues and special assessments.

When workers are forced to pay any individual or any organization for a work permit in order to earn a livelihood, it can no longer be said that freedom of action prevails here in America.

It is unfortunate that some one of these labor organizations, which are collecting billions—not millions—of dollars each year from workingmen, does not establish a factory and demonstrate its ability to operate one and to pay the wages union officials insist should be paid.

What Wins Wars?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Saturday, June 28, 1941

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in calling to the attention of the House a significant and thought-provoking editorial from my home-town newspaper, the Madison Daily Leader, which I shall insert in the RECORD at the end of these remarks. In times like these I think it is increasingly important that all of us read our home-town newspapers and keep in touch with our home constituents instead of relying too much on the jittery comments of editorial writers for eastern metropolitan newspapers and excitable young men earning their living by rehashing the day's news in melodramatic style after the accepted manner of the current school of radio commentators.

EUROPE'S QUEER NEW ALLIANCES

The quick and queer reshuffling of alliances in Europe a week ago, has caused all clear-thinking Americans to reexamine their positions from the standpoint of this country's relationship to the war. Yesterday's "fiends" are well on the road to becoming today's "friends" to many surface thinkers and by the same snap judgment some are willing to round out the circle by dubbing our "friends" of yesterday as our despised "fiends" of today. Witness harmless, faithful, honest, democratic little Finland, who of all European nations was the only one to pay in full the war-debt payments owed the United States. She was the blue chip European friend of all America a year ago; yes, even a week ago. But today there are some who say we should lend, lease, or give money, materials, and even men to help communistic Russia with the certain knowledge that some of these supplies would be used by Stalin and his storm troopers to strengthen their attack upon Finland.

France also seems to be rapidly posing another problem to Americans who are trying seriously to know just who should be nominated for the respective titles of "friend" and "fiend" in European politics. Warm-hearted France which sent Lafayette to aid us in winning the independence which we celebrate next week and which fought shoulder to shoulder with us a quarter of a century ago and to which we sent supplies and aid until its collapse in this war seems to be drawing closer and closer to the Axis Powers. Some even now urge we should send American boys and bombers to invade French territory, to subjugate French soldiers, to sink French ships. And yet France accepts Axis aid not because she favors the pagan philosophies of Hitler or Mussolini but for the very same reason England accepts the aid of Russia—because of the law of self-preservation. It is as unfair to accuse France of betraying democracy because she is driven to cooperation with the Nazis and Fascists as it would be to accuse Britain of betraying democracy because she is driven to cooperate with the Communists of Russia. And since such accusations are unfair, it seems equally unfair for certain American journalists and speakers to endeavor to drum up hatred for the men of Vichy and the people of France while handing orchids to the men of Downing Street and the people of Britain. The people of both France and Britain are among the world's most ardent lovers of freedom and the men of both Vichy and Downing Street are driven by similar motives to accept help where they can get it without stopping in time of stress to "look a gift horse in the mouth."

IT IS TIME FOR REALISTIC THINKING IN AMERICA

Mr. Speaker, it is time, therefore, for us to quit preaching hate and to stop jumping to hysterical conclusions in America. Europe is in a terrible mess. It would be a wonderful thing if all the good people were on one side of this war and all the bad people on the other side of it. But Finland and France are far from bad and Russia, to say the least, is far from good. You can classify as you deem right such other States as Poland and China, Bulgaria and Greece, Estonia and Latvia, Lithuania, and Rumania, all of which have had war forced upon them and some of which fight under the swastika of nazi-ism and others of which now fight with the emblem of the hammer and the sickle of communism. Hating one group of states and loving another will not win the war. As Congressman VORYS of Ohio recently put it so aptly, "Stop Hitler" is a splendid war cry but it is not a foreign policy or a statement of peace aims.

After "stopping Hitler," what comes next? Subsidizing Stalin? It sounds unreasonable but unless we think our way clearly and carefully we are apt to witness such an eventuality. Rescuing Europe from nazi-ism to rape it with communism is not a pretty possibility, but it is a perfectly possible probability unless we watch our step in this topsy-turvy war.

Many times I have asked on the floor of this House and elsewhere of interventionists, of isolationists, of administration spokesmen, of columnists, and commentators who would push us into war by Executive action and without congressional debate and decision, yes, even of British representatives in this country—this straightforward question, What would you have follow the fighting? I have never received a straightforward answer. We hear many generalities about the universal application of the four freedoms to everybody, everywhere, but even the exponents of such a program openly admit that much of the world is not ready to make these freedoms function.

IT IS MORE THAN HITLER WHICH MUST BE STOPPED

Surely the aim of this war cannot be to provide freedoms which will not work to peoples who do not want them. Some simply answer, "Stop Hitler." If he were stopped by death through some act of God tomorrow, the war would go on—it is more than Hitler which must be stopped. It is a nazi-ism. It is even more than that; it is the economic and social and political conditions which gave rise to nazi-ism, and communism, and fascism. These unjust conditions we must stop so that new and worse—if worse there be—ideologies do not arise to replace the totalitarian forms which we would stop. And in stopping Stalinism abroad we must not superimpose Stalinism at home or we shall have transplanted over here what we hoped to terminate over there.

Surely statesmanship in Britain and in America is not so sterile that it is unable to provide an answer to the question, "What would you have follow the fighting?" which will give people in every land more to hope for from peace than people in any land can continue to hope for from war. Certainly we here in America, who are not in the fighting, should take some time and make some effort to answer so significant a question while we continue to prepare ourselves and to provide aid to the side of the fighting which we would like to have come out on top. It is entirely possible that if President Roosevelt, Secretary of State Hull, and other leaders of American thought would help develop some more specific answers to the question, "What would you have follow the fighting?" it would go far toward uniting the people of every belligerent country in demands for a just and reasonable peace which would shorten the war and make more hopeless the task of any dictator who would drive his people to continued fighting because of his refusal to accept a basis of settlement which the world called just and fair to one and all.

NEITHER NAZI-ISM NOR COMMUNISM MUST INHERIT THE EARTH

Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who think that a total victory for Hitler would be a bad thing for all humanity. I also believe that a total victory for Stalin would be a bad blow to all the world. Neither nazi-ism nor communism should inherit the earth after this war is over. Godlessness in all its forms must be replaced with Christianity and idealism if the world is to survive this cataclysm. It is not enough to say, "Help Russia" or "Stop Hitler" or "Aid Britain"—all these are but means to some end. More and more people are asking the legitimate question, "Means to what end?" If we will devote time enough to defining the end and to answering the question, "What would you have follow the fighting?" it is not beyond the realm of possibility that we can secure the goal we seek without expanding the war to all the civilized countries of the world. It should be worth the effort. It would seem that such a policy would at least be wiser than involving ourselves in a long and hideous war, requiring the spilling of American blood on perhaps three foreign continents to secure an end which sterile statesmanship has persistently not been able or willing to define.

The following editorial from the Madison (S. Dak.) Daily Leader, Mr. Speaker, stimulated these remarks of mine. I commend it to the reading of the Congress and the country. The decisions of today are too momentous to be left to one man, to one department of government, or even to all of America's officials combined. It will require the best collective thinking of a vast cross-section of this free Republic if we are to weather this storm and come through as a fully functioning republic of free men, solvent enough to restore prosperity to our people, and strong enough to prevent disorders at home or disturbers from abroad from bringing ruin to this last great stronghold of freedom which the world affords:

[From the Madison (S. Dak.) Daily Leader]

WHAT WINS WARS?

Two things won the World War quite as much as military victory:

(1) The growing realization in Germany that she could not win.

(2) The vision implanted in the minds and hearts of the people of Europe of a better world.

No less than a break-through on the western front, no less than the collapse of Bulgaria and Turkey, these great factors undermined morale in Germany, bolstered it in the free world.

So again, Germany will be beaten whenever Germany realizes she cannot win. The beginnings of that realization lie in the fact that despite Mediterranean successes, Hitler has not been able to crush England.

How, then, must the people of Germany feel today, confronted with the tremendous manpower and the ponderous might of Soviet Russia? We hold no tenet with the political philosophy of communism, but, as Prime Minister Winston Churchill pointed out yesterday, Russia is not fighting to defend her political system; she is fighting to defend her homeland against as evil an assault by a pledge breaker as this world has ever seen.

If Russia can bring her might to bear on the invading forces in time, and the victory on which the Nazi regime has been nourished recedes into the impossible, it may not be necessary to beat the German Armies. Confronted with a desolate prospect of years of struggle, that well-oiled machine might become a military jaloppy.

But the second element is necessary, too. It is useless to offer the world, especially that now under the heel of the Nazi conqueror, the choice of "The new order—or nothing." A negative cause is not enough.

Badly needed now is a more concrete plan for the establishment of Roosevelt's four freedoms, to which the remaining free countries are devoted. These freedoms are dear to millions now under the Nazi heel, but they must be shown at least a rough draft of a means of attaining them and putting them into force.

Hitler's new order is an improvision. He didn't start out to create a new order. He started out to aggrandize Germany. Then he devised the "new order" to give the conquered peoples hope for the future in order to enable them to stomach a repulsive present.

No one not a German wants any part of it. But you can't beat something with nothing.

The world must be shown that the free peoples are capable, after they have won, of setting up and operating a free world on a better pattern than that of Versailles. That in itself would be a weapon of tremendous power.

Defense Highways

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. O'CONNOR

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 28, 1941

RESOLUTION OF THE SOUTHEASTERN MONTANA COUNTIES ASSOCIATION

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution:

Whereas the Southeastern Montana Counties Association is meeting in the town of Broadus, Mont., on this 20th day of June 1941; and

Whereas the matter of adequate defense highways is now being given consideration by the United States Government; and

Whereas travel in the United States has been more in an easterly or westerly direction, thus causing better highways to come into existence in such directions to the exclusion of adequate north and south highways; and

Whereas good north and south highways are as greatly required in the defense of our country as east and west highways; and

Whereas it is quite possible to build and maintain an adequate north and south highway between Canada and the Gulf of Mexico on a water level, without crossing mountain ranges, thus providing lower construction costs and greater safety, at the same time incorporating in said highway many already well-constructed units; and

Whereas the North and South Highway from the Wyoming line through Broadus, Miles City, and Van Norman, and northward will meet all the requirements of economic construction and connect with arterial highway north and south at north and south termini with arterial highways now constructed or in the course of construction: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this matter be called to the attention of our Representatives in Congress with the suggestion that it be laid before the proper Federal authorities who will have the matter of military highways under consideration; and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be spread upon the minutes of this organization and a copy forwarded to Senator Burton K. Wheeler, Senator James E. Murray, Congressman James F. O'Connor, Governor Sam C. Ford, the Governors of the States of Wyoming, Colorado, and Texas, the State Highway Commissions of Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, and Texas.

Can We Stop It?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 28, 1941

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, unless we stop the drive toward war and the never-ceasing, increasing denial of the rights guaranteed under our Constitution, this Nation will no longer remain a democracy.

DECEIT AND SUBTERFUGE

The President has been granted far-reaching powers. In fact, before some of the latest and most far-reaching were given, he himself said that his administration had returned to Washington powers which, if exercised improperly, would shackle our liberties.

Recently Congress has given the President additional powers and each has been given upon his assurance that it was for the purpose of promoting peace and keeping us out of war. Yet each time we have learned that the power granted has been used to drag us nearer to open warfare. In short, the President has been carrying on an undeclared war—this notwithstanding the fact that the Constitution places the responsibility for a declaration of war solely upon Congress.

This week we are being asked for legislation to keep the National Guard and Reserves beyond their year of service. Authority has been asked to keep the selectees or conscripted men beyond the original term of service.

We are being asked by the administration, through the War Department, to make a formal declaration of a national emergency, which would in effect permit the administration to use the National Guard and the selectees anywhere in the world; that is, the administration and the War Department are now out in the open seeking authority to send an expeditionary force—an army—wherever the President may direct—yes; even to Russia.

Unless the people who oppose war make their protests heard in an ever-increasing volume by the President and those Senators and Congressmen who favor sending our men to carry on a war in Europe, we shall shortly find our boys fighting as allies of Russia, whose Government denies the existence of God, seeks to abolish churches, to destroy our belief in a Divine Being.

No longer can it be claimed that this is a war to preserve democracy or one fought in behalf of any other government than the British Empire. Just last week, Lord Halifax here in Washington in substance told a group of Congressmen that England was agreeable to a "phony war" to permit Germany to gobble up the smaller nations of Europe; that England has no money with which to pay her past war debts, does not expect to pay them, nor does she expect to make any repayments on the lend-lease program.

The present war is a trade war and we can best serve our country, the cause of civilization—best preserve liberty in the world—by remaining out of it and preparing, not for an offense but for defense, a defense sufficient to meet and overcome whoever may win across the seas.

THE RIGHT TO WORK

Here in America the administration through the Labor Board, the National Defense Mediation Board, and the Conciliation Service of the Labor Department, aided by the failure of State governments, particularly in Michigan and Pennsylvania, to protect the citizens of those States, is forcing hundreds of thousands of good, honest, loyal, patriotic men and women to join a labor union and pay whatever initiation fees, dues, and special assessments may be imposed by that organization before they can exercise their God-given, Constitution-guaranteed right to work.

The President and others may talk about equality of opportunity—and you will remember our forefathers declared all men to be free and equal—but today, because of the Wagner law and the way in which it is interpreted and administered by the N. L. R. B. and the courts, men are denied the right to work when and where they find jobs. Armed picket lines, violating the laws of State and Nation, deny free speech, freedom of action, the right to property (and a job is property), and all this because of the acquiescence of the administration and the failure of Congress to insist upon amendments to the Wagner law and upon the enforcement of the laws we have.

Before we can bring equality of opportunity, free speech, and a free press to the peoples of all the world; before we force our form of government as administered by us upon others, let us, in the words of the Scripture, "first cast out the beam" out of our own eye.

Night and day, day and night, first and last, let every thought and action be guided by the desire to serve America first; to reestablish and preserve here at home the equality of opportunity guaranteed by the Constitution.

The people of this country can prevent war, if, by letter and through communications to the press, they make themselves heard at the White House.

Payments to the Several States on Account of Lands of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. O'CONNOR

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 28, 1941

RESOLUTION OF THE SOUTHEASTERN MONTANA COUNTIES ASSOCIATION

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution:

Whereas a bill to provide for a uniform method of payments to the several States on account of certain lands of the United States has been introduced in the Senate of the United States; and

Whereas it is provided by said bill that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to direct to pay annually to each State the sum equal to 2 percent of the fair value of any lands situated in such State, title to which is held in the United States, and which are (1) included within a national forest; (2) included within a national wildlife refuge; (3) administered under title III of the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, as amended; (4) included within an Indian reservation, or held in trust by the United States for the benefit of any Indian; (5) administered under the terms of the Taylor Grazing Act (48 Stat. 1269), as amended; (6) sold by the United States upon an agreement providing that title shall remain in the United States until purchase price is paid in full; or (7) leased by the United States for a valuable consideration; and

Whereas there exists in the State of Montana a large amount of land classified as above, title to which is held in the United States from which very little if any revenue is derived; and

Whereas the burden of government in the counties wherein such designated lands are situated is placed wholly upon the owners of property and has reduced in many counties in the State the necessary taxable valuations and the income to such an extent that property tax has become a burden to the taxpayer: Now, therefore, it is

Resolved at a regular session of the Southeastern Montana Counties Association held on the 20th day of June 1941, at Broadus, Powder River County, Mont., That said Senate bill 1201 be enacted by the Congress of the United States and that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to our Senators and Congressmen with a request that they support and work for the enactment of said bill.

St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BARTEL J. JONKMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 28, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE GRAND RAPIDS (MICH.) PRESS

Mr. JONKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Grand Rapids (Mich.) Press of June 20, 1941:

[From the Grand Rapids (Mich.) Press of June 20, 1941]

SEAWAY ENDORSEMENTS

When it comes to character witnesses the case in favor of the St. Lawrence waterway is far ahead of that of its opponents. Six successive Presidents through the last 30 years have advocated this project and not one has opposed. Surely they could not all be wrong—not all could be accused of serving any special interest in their support of this work. In fact, it may be said that considerations of national welfare as opposed to sectional and selfish interest were the motivating influence with each one.

Against the seaway no such imposing list can be mustered. Very few national figures, free from sectional influence, have been ranged on the side of the opposition.

The first President to endorse the seaway was President Taft, who enthusiastically looked toward its consummation. President Wilson, the Michigan Great Lakes Tidewater Commission recalls, was the second to endorse the projected cut. He characterized opposition to it as that of individuals and corporations whose objections were based on "narrow and unstable grounds" and entitled to small consideration. President Harding declared that the feasibility of the sea route was "unquestioned." President Coolidge next added his backing and President Hoover ranked it as "of first importance to the whole continent." The views of President Franklin D. Roosevelt are current and widely known.

This list of six Presidents included two Democrats serving through 16 years and four Republicans serving a like period. When President Roosevelt completes his third term it will make nine complete 4-year terms through which these national leaders have unswervingly supported the seaway principle.

The only new objection raised at present is that the Lakes-to-sea project is not a defense work. But additional witnesses have come forward to refute that contention. Leaders of the O. P. M., the production agency of the whole defense effort, including Co-directors Knudsen and Hillman, have given the project their official endorsement. If the charges that this project is not a contribution to defense were valid these men surely would recognize them as such. Instead the O. P. M. chiefs declare the seaway to be a vital part of the all-out defense effort.

What array of strength can the opposition bring against the seaway comparable to this support by six Presidents and the current leaders of the national-defense effort? It is something to think about while congressional hearings are under way.

Experimental Black-out at Turkey, Tex.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE WORLEY

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 28, 1941

ARTICLES FROM THE TURKEY (TEX.) ENTERPRISE AND THE MEMPHIS DEMOCRAT

Mr. WORLEY. Mr. Speaker, as an instance of the initiative and resourcefulness of the people of the Texas Panhandle, whom it is my distinct honor to represent in the Halls of Congress, I would like to direct the attention of other Members of Congress to two newspaper articles which appeared in the Turkey Enterprise and the Memphis Democrat, respectively.

I take a great deal of pride in the fact that the citizens of Turkey were the first in the entire Nation to practice a total black-out; and had the people of France, Belgium, the Netherlands, Poland, and other countries also had the same type of initiative and sense of preparedness many of the calamities which have come to pass within the past few years might possibly have been avoided.

I take great pleasure and pride in directing the attention of other Members of the Congress to these two newspaper articles:

[From the Turkey (Tex.) Enterprise of March 13, 1941]

BLACK-OUT PROCLAMATION

Whereas the Government of the United States has entered into a program of preparedness for national defense; and

Whereas certain phases of the defense program in the various communities are voluntary, in keeping with the democratic ideals of our forefathers: Now therefore

I, J. W. Hardcastle, mayor of the city of Turkey, Tex., do hereby proclaim a 30-minute air-raid precaution black-out period to be observed Saturday night, March 29, beginning at 9 o'clock.

And I appoint Capt. Cole Boswell, commanding officer of the provisional Turkey home defense company, as administrative officer in this emergency, and commission him to supervise all necessary preparation for the safe and efficient conduct of the black-out drill,

And I further charge all civic and fraternal organizations, firms, and individuals to give every possible assistance, when called upon to cooperate with the commanding officer and his duly appointed adjutants.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto signed my name and caused the seal of my office to be impressed hereon at Turkey, Tex., this the 11th day of March A. D. 1941.

J. W. HARDCASTLE.

[From the Turkey (Tex.) Enterprise of March 13, 1941]

TURKEY TO BE FIRST TEXAS CITY TO STAGE AIR-RAID PRECAUTION BLACK-OUT, SATURDAY, MARCH 29—HOME DEFENSE GUARD TROOP IN CHARGE OF PREPARATIONS

Turkey, a rural community of 1,000 population, Saturday, March 29, will become the first city in the State of Texas to experience an air-raid precaution black-out.

By proclamation of Mayor J. W. Hardcastle, the Turkey home-defense guard company will be in charge of all arrangements, and all citizens are asked to cooperate in order to make the 30-minute black-out period safe and efficient.

Capt. Cole Boswell, commanding officer, and men of the organization will make detailed plans well in advance in order to insure the safety of all citizens during the total black-out period.

Business and professional men heard the plan outlined Tuesday at the Lions luncheon, and expressed whole-hearted approval of the idea. Scoutmaster George Ray Colvin said that the Turkey Boy Scout troop will gladly serve, if called upon.

Business houses will not be expected to close during the black-out, but will remain open with their lights shielded against detection from the air, since the purpose of the drill will be to determine how effectively the city of Turkey could be blacked out in the event of an air raid.

[From the Memphis Democrat of April 3, 1941]

IF THEY SAY BLACK-OUT—TURKEY CITIZENS MEAN IT'S GOING TO BE DARK

When the citizens of that little city of 1,000 people, Turkey, Tex., say they are going to have a black-out, they mean just that.

So when last Saturday night, the date for the black-out, came around things really did look dark in Turkey.

At 9 o'clock the program was begun, although people had been milling around most of the night waiting for things to pop.

Most of the lights were turned out, although some were only shaded to provide enough light for business to be carried on as usual. Some of the stores utilized kerosene lamps, while others merely shaded their electric-light bulbs.

The siren of the Turkey fire department sounded to begin the black-out. Immediately things got dark and nothing happened.

Then firecrackers, substituting for anti-aircraft guns, began to pop. No one fainted, but many a person jumped at every pop of the artificial guns.

Nothing much happened until 9:20, when the second siren alarm sounded to warn citizens of approaching bombers. Once more fireworks were used, this time in the place of bombs. The air bombs burst in midair, and a moment later, a huge bonfire was blazing about one block off Main Street.

Then came the fire trucks, with shaded lights, down Main Street at a high rate of speed. The truck rounded the corner toward the bonfire, and, a few minutes later, the fire was extinguished.

At 9:30 the all-clear signal was given, lights went back on, and the streets were cleared. The first mock black-out in Texas had been staged.

During the period of blackness a few girls of about 15 years of age ran up and down the streets calling for their mothers. Some of the citizens thought they were small children lost from their parents until the girls became visible in some of the better-lighted places.

All traffic was stopped, with the exception of about four automobiles. Those which were allowed to go through the town, however, were forced to shade their lights. When a car was allowed to go through, the lights were painted at one end of Main Street, and cleaned off at the other end. Escorts were furnished the cars which were allowed to go through.

A song meeting was in progress at one of the churches. Whether the singing was continued was not learned, but the lights had to be turned out.

The black-out was planned by the home-defense guard company of Turkey, under the direction of Capt. Cole Boswell. Mayor J. W. Hardcastle proclaimed the 30-minute period for the black-out drill to make it official. Cooperating with the defense guard unit was Carl Roewe, Turkey Enterprise editor, who released much publicity in preparation for the event.

TURKEY BLACK-OUT DRILL DEMONSTRATES HOW SMALL CITY CAN PREPARE FOR WAR

That a small city can do its part in the national-defense program was shown in the black-out demonstration held several weeks ago in Turkey.

The practice black-out, the first of its kind to be held in Texas, was all in fun, of course, but the demonstration was serious in one aspect.

The citizens there showed their willingness to cooperate, and the city was in almost complete darkness for a 30-minute period. Preceding the black-out, a siren warning was given. The second warning was the signal to extinguish lights.

Stores were kept open, but most of the people were on the streets to see what was going to happen. Traffic was stopped on the main street, and even motorists were not allowed to pass through unless it was absolutely necessary. Even then, the headlights were painted over, and auto escorts were used.

At the middle of the black-out, a bonfire was set to represent the mark of a bomb. The Turkey Fire Department rushed to the scene, extinguished the fire, and then went back to their station.

A short time later the black-out was completed, lights went back on, and business was carried on as usual.

The Great Conquest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTHONY J. DIMOND

DELEGATE FROM ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 28, 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. A. A. BERLE, JR.

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, in the midst of what is commonly called a world revolution, when so many of the things in life which we had looked upon as stable are being wrenched and shaken and in some cases completely overturned, when so many men are bewildered or even hopeless, it is refreshing to listen to the voice of one who can see in all the confusion, the hope, indeed, the certainty, of a better and a more secure order, and who is rightly able to look upon present circumstances as a challenge to the energies, the daring, and the imagination of men. Such a voice was heard in the address delivered on June 11, 1941, at the commencement exercises of Catholic University, Washington, D. C., by Hon. A. A. Berle, Jr., Assistant Secretary of State.

Mr. Berle's address follows:

Not long ago, on occasions of this kind, it used to be customary to lament the fate of young men and women who were forced to enter active life in hard times. Complaint was made that no clear path was laid out and that no use could be made of the talents and training of youth. The world, it was said, was fully occupied. Work was hard to find. The earth was filled with previous mistakes; and the rising generation had the sole and dubious privilege of clearing up the wreckage.

I doubt if these lamentations were ever justified, but it is certain beyond question that there is no reason for them today. Certainly you and your fellows are the last either to pity yourselves or accept pity from anyone else.

Indeed, if you were choosing a time in history and a place in the world in which to enter active life with the most brilliant prospects, you would choose the present and you would choose America.

For we are clearly on the eve of a great conquest, perhaps one of the greatest conquests in history since the founding of the Christian church. The young men and women of today will assist in, and eventually achieve, that conquest; and no one of you will fail to share in its splendor, except by deliberate choice.

Both immediately and in the long view there is endless work to be done, and you are trained for it. Both now and in longer range there is a world to be won, and you have in your hands the instruments with which to win it. Both now and for many years there will be a very clear issue, and you are on the right side of that issue.

This is commonly called a revolutionary age, and that statement is correct. But the nature and the depth of the revolution is rarely appreciated. Students of history have long known that revolutions in themselves do not create. They merely recognize forces and situations which have long been active and which have silently made their own patterns. Suddenly the latent institutions become apparent, and what we call revolution is not their creation but their eventual recognition.

During nearly half a century new and revolutionary forces have been moving in every country, including our own. These forces are not the minor agitations to which journalists and authors have paid attention. They are more fundamental, slower moving, and infinitely more important.

What happened was that human beings suddenly attained control of vast natural forces which had never before been unlocked. Science and technical skill gave to man the solution to certain age-old problems. Until relatively recently, much of the business of living consisted of an elemental and age-old struggle to bring enough food into the world so that hunger could be met; to make enough clothes so that none need go naked; to conquer cold and darkness with heat and light; to find labor enough to do the needed work. In the space of a single generation these problems were solved, and many more besides. The physical necessities and comforts of life could be produced on an undreamed-of scale. The range of men's lives moved swiftly from the close and intimate contacts of day-by-day meeting to the far-flung knowledge of the world which comes from instantaneous communication, so that the happenings in every country became the commonplaces of every home.

Horizons changed completely. Even the historic insistence that a nation must have land ceases to have meaning in a civilization in which modern chemistry has made it possible to feed an entire country like our own from the product of a single State like Connecticut or Illinois. Physical compulsions like those which drove pagan hordes from central Asia into Europe and which have traditionally directed the course of history become minor in the presence of vaster forces which virtually place in the hands of every modern country the ability to make of its life whatever it chooses. It was inevitable that the impact of these new-found abilities should change the face of the world as we knew it.

No less inevitable was the form in which the issue would be presented. When men are suddenly endowed with new and amazing resources, the problems presented cease to be physical. They become, quite literally, moral and philosophical. For the question is no longer "How can men get what they need?", but "By what rules of life will they make use of what they have?" The struggle ceases to be an endeavor to seek possessions. It becomes a conflict of the principles which determine the minds of men who already have possessions within their reach.

In historical fact, this is the question which is now asked of modern civilization and modern thought. The warfare which has spread throughout the world is, quite literally, an attempt to find the answer.

So far as I know, no nation declined to accept the implications of the new powers which had been put into its hands. Every country of importance was endeavoring to adjust its life and its habits to the new condition. What has gone forward has been the division of nations and peoples into great camps.

One of these camps has proposed as a solution the revolution of cruelty. Under it the vast new resources are massed in the hands of an all-powerful, tyrannically ruled State whose chieftains shall hold absolute power over production and distribution, over the communications and learning and thought, over the training of children, over peace and war, over life and death. The philosophy behind this is almost animal in its simplicity. Believing that moral law is weak and unreal, it depends on force, on arbitrary control backed by fear, and by suppression of thought.

On the other side, there has slowly emerged a great group of nations and a still greater number of individuals dedicated to the kindly revolution—the swift and steady development of a society in which nothing human is alien; in which the new resources are steadily and increasingly placed at the equal service of all; but which finds its unity in the moral relationship between man and his neighbor, between nation and nation, and between men and the universe in which they are created.

These two groups are now locked in a world struggle. In many parts of the world, even where the armies are not engaged, the struggle is intense in the plane of morals and ideas. You will find evidence of it not only on the Balkan battlefield but in every American newspaper. You cannot escape it. Either the world organizes itself on the law of the kindly revolution, or it must cope with these same new and limitless resources which science has created, wielded by the uncontrolled organization of naked, animal power.

I myself have absolute faith as to the outcome of the present struggle in which you will play so great a part. I think you have the same faith; and for that reason in your struggles and work in the coming years you will have the inestimable advantage of that inner peace which alone makes the struggle and the labor of life worth while. Never yet has hatred produced any offspring. Never yet has cruelty forged a society. Never yet have lies and force politics produced more than a temporary effect. Never yet has an attempt to enslave nations produced anything except the wreck of the would-be master. Never yet have free men, working together in the bonds of a moral law stronger and more pervasive than any decree of any dictator, lost any conflict in which they have been forced to engage.

You will occasionally hear attempts made to convert you to what are sometimes called the principles of "realism." Now realism is a great word, properly appreciated, but it has been used by cynics and by half-educated men to mean merely an estimate of naked force. If bribery and corruption appeared to be a way of getting what you wanted, it was "realist" to adopt that method. If a neighbor undertook to deal with you on a basis of having more tanks and guns and bombs, it was "realist" to accept that logic and let it go at that. Now corruption is real enough; and so are bombs and bullets; but the question only barely begins there. Even in a short lifetime I have seen western civilization dominated first by one group of powers, then conquered by a second group, whose military sway encompassed larger areas than those of the Axis at this moment; and I have seen the balance change again almost overnight. During the period of your own education you have seen the so-called realism of air power shift three times on the continent of Europe. To say that any such transitory condition can really affect the moral and mental decisions on which society is based is, to my mind, a complete failure to appreciate the true realities.

For while a tank may be real, the mind of the man in the tank is a thousand times more real. A production line is certainly a fact; but infinitely more important are the principles of the men who determine the use to which that product shall be put. An army in the field is a real thing at short range; but the great reality are the beliefs of the men who are in it and who direct it.

When the great challenge came on us we were, I think, on the point of making our new inheritance available more widely and more gloriously to the people of our own country, and of our neighbors, than any nation in history. In a large sense, perhaps, it is as well that the challenge has been made, and that it has come now Few great changes are easily accomplished; and few principles maintain their purity unless their adherents are forced to stand and answer now and then for the faith that is in them. Our society like every other, ought to consider its objectives from time to time, lest it lose sight of the deep motives which brought it into being.

In all its history our country was, and still is, guided by essentially moral and religious conceptions. We have departed from this knowledge at times; and have paid a price for our mistakes; but in the main we have never lost sight of it. In earlier times our philosophy was formally religious. Even today, when the religious background is not usually stressed, the dominant emotion in this country is its inherent kindliness; its spontaneous rejection of cruelty; its refusal to accept hatreds; its underlying and constant insistence on equity, on fair dealing, and on kindness as between man and man, and as between man and his government and society. This is a moral philosophy and a moral order, whether it is explained in terms of abstract justice, or a belief in the brotherhood of man, or by still others who profess, as I do, a quite simple belief in the law and the providence of God.

From this has come, I think, the heart and the soul and the driving force of the amazing technical developments with which the world now grapples; and from it has also come our own peculiar use of them.

If you were talking today to a Nazi he would quite bluntly base his claim to a position in the world upon his ability to use and organize modern technical force. He would point to clouds of war planes in the sky; to fleets of tanks on land; to a superb system of electro-communications which make possible the manipulation of vast masses of fighting men; to submarines at sea; to the organization of an endless supply of material of war. A race, he says, that can do these things, is entitled as of right to dominate as much of the earth's surface as he can cover. Yet electricity is an American development. The internal combustion engine, which is the foundation of mechanized warfare, was invented and worked out here. Airplanes first flew in the American skies; submarines and motor ships, like their steam predecessors, were first sailed in American waters.

To the American mind these were kindly developments. Radio communication existed for the purpose of widening the horizon of men, and not for the purpose of pumping a stream of propaganda designed to shut out truth. The mechanism of a tank was designed to serve labor and till the soil; it was not natural for us to think of it as a means of killing. Organization of industry on a mass basis was thought of primarily as a means of putting needed goods into the hands of many people. A nation which has no hatreds is slow to turn these things into implements of war. But by that very token, if it is ever required to do so, it can use these implements better than any nation in the world; and use them with more assurance, since it has no fear. There, perhaps, is the true comparison. Under the kindly revolution, the unlocked resources must be used to serve human need. Under the cruel revolution, they will be used as instruments of warfare. Today, even the right to be kind, to be human, to be understanding, and to love one's neighbor, is a right which must be struggled for. Yet, once it is rewon, we know that these human and civilized instincts will have at their command a greater ability to translate themselves into reality than has ever yet been known to history.

The end of all this is already sufficiently plain.

The conquest falls to the kindly revolution; for the kindly revolution is universal. It offers something to the mind and heart and ability of every man, whereas the revolution of cruelty crushes mind after mind, group after group, and ends by having no human resources, spiritual, mental, or technical.

But as that happens, progressively, our responsibilities will widen. The kindly revolution has not sought mastery; rather, it seeks peace. But peace is itself a dynamic conception: not to be taken and kept and held save by endless thought and effort and work. Unhappiness anywhere is a threat to peace. Want anywhere is a threat to security. Hatred anywhere menaces order. The undermining, anywhere, of the strength of the moral law which enables you and me to go our ways in peace, directly threatens us all.

For that reason, you and I, individually, and this Nation, must shoulder vastly increased burdens. We shall have to feed and clothe and house great areas of the world. We shall have to supply technical skill for those areas which have stamped out the free minds who were the creators of technical skill. We shall have to do this not in the realistic search for immediate profit, but in the absolute faith that as we contribute to peace and contentment anywhere, we strengthen the position of the kindly revolution everywhere. We shall have to recognize that we are a greatly favored area and a greatly fortunate people; and that our safety and our glory alike depends on our making it apparent that those who join us, and work with us, who seek our aid, or who ask our cooperation, have nothing to fear.

This is the great conquest. To be young, to be in it, to be of it, and to have a part of it, is beyond measure splendid.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BUTLER B. HARE

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 28, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. BUTLER B. HARE, OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege and honor to be one of the guest speakers at the dedication of the new post office and Federal court building at Greenwood, S. C., on June 12, and under leave to extend my remarks I am inserting a résumé of the address I made on that occasion:

POST OFFICE BUILDING

A detailed history of the development and growth of the Postal Service in the United States would read like a romance. A comparison of its early beginnings about 300 years ago with its extent and magnitude of today is sufficient to awaken the reason and excite the imagination of anyone. The Postal Service had its beginning in 1639 in what is now the State of Massachusetts when the court of that colony approved a petition providing that all oversea mail should be left at the home of Richard Fairbanks who agreed to deliver such mail to the addressee for 1 penny per letter.

It is my judgment the people of the United States receive more service and direct benefit from the Post Office Department than any of the other executive departments. There is nothing that would paralyze the business and economic life of the Nation so quickly and more completely than the cessation or discontinuance of the Postal Service.

I could go further and say that in my judgment no one of the executive departments exceeds in efficiency the work of the Post Office Department, and no one adheres more strictly to the law in the enforcement of its rules and regulations.

Our Government has been very generous in providing facilities for postal service in our larger towns and cities but it has been quite niggardly in providing housing facilities for such services in the smaller towns and villages.

I will not attempt to discuss this matter further today, but I have some grounds for expressing the hope that the Government may inaugurate a program within the next few years providing for better housing facilities in the smaller offices.

FEDERAL COURTHOUSE

A judicial system of some kind has been one of the first governmental agencies set up by civilized nations of the world. The necessity for such an agency has been recognized as far back in history as civilization itself. The development of such systems has been determined in a large measure by the people's conception and recognition of God. As a matter of fact, the administration of justice is based or predicated upon what we know as divine law. Really, justice itself is an attribute of divine nature. Apart from it there can be no justice. It is the yardstick by which justice is determined.

However, it is not our purpose this morning to philosophize on the origin or functions of our judicial system, but it is appropriate to say that its history can be definitely and clearly traced to the early days of Biblical history. We read in the book of Exodus that "Moses chose able men out of Israel and made them heads to judge the people at all seasons."

It is quite interesting to observe how closely our judicial system is allied to the system found in the early days of sacred history. It is particularly interesting to note that the life tenure of our Federal judges, our judicial circuits in the State, and the districts in our Federal courts are scripturally well founded. We read that Samuel judged Israel all the days of his life. And he went from year to year in circuit to Bethel, and Gilgal, and Mizpah, and judged Israel in all these places.

Even the functions of our courts are patterned after the judicial system of biblical days. We read in Deutronomy where the following instructions were given to judges, which is the practice in our courts today:

"Ye shall not respect persons in judgment. Ye shall hear the small and great alike, and ye shall not be afraid of the face of man."

Yes, the established policy of our Government that the decisions of the courts shall be final is not without precedent, for we read further where it says:

"According to the judgment which they shall tell thee, thou shalt do; thou shalt not turn aside from the sentence they shall show thee, neither to the right hand nor to the left."

We could go further and show that historically our judicial system has upon it the seal of divine approval and is, therefore, entitled to the respect and loyalty of every person who would resort to the courts for the protection of his rights.

No doubt judges make mistakes and there may be a few unjust judges but they are few and far between, and this country and our Government are to be congratulated upon the purity and success of our courts generally. Our judges have what I consider sacred responsibilities and, upon the whole, we have so far been able to obtain men who have recognized them as such and have had the courage to discharge them without fear or favor.

Our courts, both State and Federal, are the mudsills upon which the coveted institutions of this Republic are erected. It is a great satisfaction to think there is not a right that any person has but what he can have it protected by the courts and there is not a wrong or a grievance but what he can resort to a court or judicial tribunal and have it corrected.

It is appropriate, therefore, that our Government should select convenient places and make suitable provision for hearing and determining the rights and grievances of its people.

Your city is to be congratulated upon being well and conveniently located. Your ready access and your relationship in many ways with adjoining towns and counties well justify the selection of Greenwood as a most suitable place for this temple of justice. It is a recognition of the wisdom, foresight, and the progressive public spiritedness of your representative citizens, particularly your former mayor, who is reported to have increased your postal receipts measurably by writing almost daily advising Government officials in Washington that the people here were expecting this building on the next train. I could have said it is a tribute to your patience, long suffering, and long-sightedness, for I happen to know that this building started on its way more than 10 years ago.

I congratulate you, Mr. Chairman, and all who have contributed their interest and efforts toward securing, locating, and the construction of this large, beautiful, and commodious building.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. EWING THOMASON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD, late a Senator from the State of Texas

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, today is consecrated to those who have finished their work in the Halls of Congress and in the visual world about us. Chief among them is the late MORRIS SHEPPARD, the dean of Congress, who served in House and Senate for almost 40 years.

I knew and revered him before I became a Member of this House, but after coming here I was in intimate association with him, both socially and on legislative work, until his death. He was chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs and I am a member of the House committee. Our work in consequence ran in much the same channels.

As chairman of this most important committee he was in charge of legislation upon which this country today is depending to lead us safely and victoriously through the present emergency, and to preserve to us those liberties which are our incomparable heritage from the founders of this Government.

Throughout his long and vuluable service he helped individually uncounted thousands not only from our own State but throughout the Nation. No one was too poor or obscure to reach his ear and none was ever turned aside without having received every assistance in his power to render.

This work on single claims and requests, while requiring time and the giving of self in full measure, did not prevent his devoting constant work to the study of the great issues before this country, to the solution of which he contributed his abundant energy and outstanding ability.

He always cast his vote without fear or favor and in accordance with his convictions of the right, as he was given to see the right. Nothing was permitted to interfere with his attendance at sessions of the Senate and he missed none. No man who ever served in that body paid more meticulous attention to the business before it.

His understanding of the events unfolding about him and his unimpeachable honesty of purpose was recognized by his colleagues who all regarded him not only with veneration for his worth but with affection for his generous and lovable personality.

He will always be remembered for his devotion to the cause of temperance, and his authorship of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution. In spite of the repeal of that law, no person ever doubted his conviction or sincerity and none failed to praise his tolerance.

He exemplified his belief in all that is noble and fine in the life of man and has left to posterity the memory of that integrity of character and social sympathy that enriches the life of a great Nation. His work has been cut short in the fullness of his usefulness and his brilliant career and we whom he has left behind feel a sense of deepest sorrow and loss. He died as truly in the service of his country as if he had fallen on the battlefield. I extend my deep and sincere sympathy to his faithful wife and devoted daughters.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. LINDLEY BECKWORTH

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD, late a Senator from the State of Texas

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to join the long list of those who have recorded their feelings of regret and sadness occasioned by the passing of one of the most distinguished and illustrious Americans our Nation has produced, Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD, of Texarkana, Tex.

Among the counties I have had the honor to represent in the Texas House of Representatives and in Congress is Camp County, the county in which Senator SHEPPARD began the practice of law and one of the counties composing the congressional district he later represented as a Member of the National House of Representatives. I desire to say, in passing, that the people of Camp County are a clean, honest, moral, hard-working, and God-fearing people; they are genuine Americans. Because I, too, was privileged to live in Camp County as a small boy, it has been my good fortune to know throughout my life many of the intimate and old-time friends of Senator SHEPPARD. Those who have known a man longest usually know him best; they are aware of his powers and his weaknesses. I am positive the people of Pittsburg and Camp County, Tex., held Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD in as high esteem as the people of any area. One of the most frequent inquiries I always heard when returning to Pittsburg and Camp County from Washington was, "How is MORRIS? I hear from him occasionally." Behind this question in every instance there was more than a perfunctory interest; the interest was real.

Those in Pittsburg and Camp County who knew him personally and as a public servant for more than 40 years had the greatest love for and confidence in Senator SHEPPARD. No one questioned his loyalty, his honesty, or his integrity; he was never termed a "hypocrite" or a "demagogue" even by those who disagreed with him. Unkind words were never used to describe him or his efforts. No one doubted he was on the job, busy all the time; it was never said or intimated that he had lost the common touch.

The life he lived and the manner in which he served the people initiated and kept alive this implicit love for and confidence in him. Someone has said, "If you want a job done, get a busy man to do it." This sentence is not inappropriate in connection with Senator SHEPPARD'S tenure as a public servant. He was on the job as many of the 24 hours of the day as it was possible for him to be; he knew personally what was going on in reference to the requests of the many individuals he helped and was seeking to help; he knew personally the status of the legislation he was supporting and sponsoring; he was not content to delegate the duty or shift the responsibility. Few people know or can ever know how many separate and distinct tasks he performed every day, how many people he saw, how many phone calls he made or answered, how many departments he contacted. Always he was accommodating and tireless; he was never angry, never inconsiderate.

As a public servant Senator SHEPPARD was so fair and considerate that he knew no line of demarcation as between people who sought his help. There were no preferred or unpreferred cases.

As one of the younger members of the Texas delegation in point of tenure, I consider myself fortunate in being privileged to serve a term in the House while Senator SHEPPARD was in the Senate. Perchance I was a little more observant than some people have been in regard to the meticulous efforts Senator SHEPPARD expended to help those who requested his help. Although I had heard of Senator SHEPPARD from many sources all my life, I was never privileged to meet him until I became a Member of Congress a little more than 2 years ago. Not infrequently I talked with him and solicited his assistance. In not one instance did he ever fail to respond, and it was his policy not merely to go through the "aid" motion or to feign cooperation, but it was his policy to leave no stone unturned to accomplish the task. He did not as little as he could do but as much as he could do.

Unfortunate, indeed, it was for the people of our Nation and the people of our great State, and, in fact, people who love freedom and liberty throughout the world that Senator SHEPPARD was taken from us in this perilous period of our Nation's history. As the able and experienced chairman of the Senate Military Affairs Committee, he was, at the time of his death, working with all his might night and day to speed up our defense efforts that America might be impregnably unassailable and impervious to attack. Indeed, his passing is an irreparable loss.

The last speech I heard Senator SHEPPARD make was before the Texas delegation when the delegation appropriately honored a former distinguished member of our delegation, Judge Marvin Jones. Concluding his tribute to Judge Jones, Senator SHEPPARD accurately stated the familiar words, "To know him was to love him; to name him was to praise him," were applicable to Marvin Jones. Of Senator SHEPPARD, by every person who ever knew him I know it would be accurately said, "To know him was to love him; to name him was to praise him."

Four short lines, words of another, in my opinion, characterize his life and his work and could have well been his own:

I think this thing to be grandly true,
That a noble deed is a step toward God—
Lifting the soul from the common sod
To a purer air and a broader view.

HON. EUGENE WORLEY

OF TEXAS

TRIBUTE FROM THE PRESS

Mr. WORLEY. Mr. Speaker, one of the finest expressions from the press upon the passing of our beloved Senator from Texas, the late MORRIS SHEPPARD, appears below:

Buried last week beneath the sod of the State he had served long and well was a quiet little man whose soul's integrity never faltered through decades of tumultuous battling for the ideals he held.

MORRIS SHEPPARD was probably the most beloved figure to tread the Texas political stage during the last quarter century. Simple in manners, quiet by nature, steadfast by choice, he went to Congress 39 years ago to succeed his father, moved to the Senate 11 years later, had been there ever since, serving as chairman of the Senate Military Affairs Committee since 1933.

In a few years more he would have broken all records for congressional service; as it was, he was the dean of Congress.

There was nothing spectacular about MORRIS SHEPPARD. He did not like the spotlight; he loved the life of a scholar. He did the job the people hired him to do. He did it well. He did it bravely. He let the chips fall where they would.

A national magazine once wrote an article about him entitled "The Art of Being a Little Senator." He was little in size; he never tried to shake the world, but he did his job so well that when death plucked him by the ear he left the world without any known enemies.

With him many disagreed, but none hated. He was too honest, too earnest, for anyone to hate. "He never sold the truth to serve the hour, nor faltered with Eternal God for power," as Tennyson wrote of Wellington.

His quiet kindliness, his lack of bombast, was not to be mistaken for lack of ability. One of the best-educated of Senators in a body of superbly trained men, SHEPPARD was a keen student, an artful manager of affairs, and his work in military affairs left little to be desired.

Greatest fame came to him as author of the prohibition amendment, but that was only one of his many interests. But his prohibition views were indicative of his tenacity of purpose. Knowing that he was fighting for a cause lost, temporarily at least, he kept its banners waving ever and came to be a symbol of a man who stuck by his guns all the way through.

And this singleness of purpose won for him the respect, the admiration, and the votes of those who disagreed most vigorously with what he did.

But age and overwork last week took their toll, and in Walter Reed Memorial Hospital in Washington early one morning life ebbed slowly to a finish. He died as no doubt he would have wished, in full gait, with no faltering of pace, working quietly, earnestly, devotedly at his job, to the very last, a fitting finish to a career devoted to doing one's job well.

Back home they brought him, to be buried beneath east Texas clay, not many miles from the Morris County home that gave him birth 66 years ago. The Vice President of the United States, Senators, and Congressmen rode on the funeral train, while the great and not-so-great of Texas gathered to pay their last respects to a gray little man with a tender smile who never winced nor cried aloud through all the battling years.

MORRIS SHEPPARD had come home to stay. His job was done.

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW ORLEANS (LA.) TIMES-PICAYUNE

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks I include an editorial from the New Orleans (La.) Times-Picayune:

[From the New Orleans Times-Picayune]

"HOBBY DAY" IN THE HOUSE

The long-buried St. Lawrence seaway scheme was formally resurrected recently by a bill authorizing the President to negotiate with Canada to put it over. Long the favorite hobby of Mr. Roosevelt, it was beaten by the Senate in 1934 for reasons an American majority considered sound. Then it was generally agreed that such a deal between this country and Canada must be effected by formal treaty subject to Senate ratification. Now it is contended that the deal can be put over by simple congressional authorization. Treaty ratification requires a two-thirds majority in the Senate. Congressional authorization requires ordinary majorities. Denied senatorial ratification of its treaty form, the measure's promoter now seeks the easiest way of a simple congressional majority, though that was not considered a valid method 7 years ago.

Canada's people show no enthusiasm for the scheme, even though the United States would pay most of the bill, for all Canada's manpower and material resources are needed in the vital war tasks. The Canadian Government yielded to President Roosevelt's insistence and acquiesced in the current dicker over the objections of many Canadian folks. The American people are showing even less enthusiasm than their Canadian neighbors do. Of the Congressmen "lined up" for its support, we venture to say that few really believe the St. Lawrence seaway hobby should be put over at this time, while fewer still consider it a defense project.

In brief, the reintroduction of the St. Lawrence seaway business at this singularly inopportune time—and camouflaged as a national-defense undertaking—impresses us as fresh evidence of the President's determination to have his own way in everything. We trust that majorities in both Houses will have the courage to express the judgment and will of the American people by rejecting the costly hobby project again, regardless of administration pressure.

The Congressional Record

OF

HON. LAWRENCE J. CONNERY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

EDITORIAL FROM THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, every Member of the House is naturally interested in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD's appearance—that is, the format—and desire that it be in good taste and measure up to high typography standards.

Since the publication of a very proper but at the same time very critical editorial in the June 21, 1941, issue of the Saturday Evening Post, dealing with the change of format of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, several Members of the House have spoken to me wanting to know why the Joint Committee on Printing had given its assent to such a change. This change was authorized on the request of the Public Printer. Personally, as a member of the Joint Committee on Printing, I opposed such a change at all times.

That this change in the format of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is of wide concern is apparent when we find the widely read Saturday Evening Post devoting almost its full editorial page to a very critical analysis of it.

The editorial, A Word With the Public Printer, speaks for itself and reads as follows:

[From the Saturday Evening Post of June 21, 1941]

A WORD WITH THE PUBLIC PRINTER

As a constant reader of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD we have watched in vain for any protest against the outrage committed upon it by a change of dress and make-up. The right to take offense belongs to Congress alone. A subscriber's feelings count for simply nothing. There is no editor to be bullied and no business manager to care whether you mean it or not when you threaten to cancel. No word of indignation has been uttered, no resolution of censure has been offered, in either the Senate or the House, and we fear now it is too late. The eye is an accommodating member; it quickly forms new habits, nor has it in itself any power of aesthetic perception. We suppose it is so already that if you were to say to a Senator or to a Representative, "Why was the Public Printer permitted to ruin the beautiful example of typography that was the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?" he would look up from the reading of his own voice in type—any kind of type—and say, "What? Oh, yes. Well, what was it like before?"

The Public Printer, of course, could not have done it without the consent of the Joint Committee on Printing. What his arguments were we do not care to know. They were specious; and we have reason to believe, as we shall show, that they were subtle. The Joint Committee on Printing did not know any better. You need no further evidence of that than its consenting. But the Public Printer, strictly in the character of printer, did know better. Moreover, he was under no vulgar economic necessity to stultify his art. His position is that of printer laureate. He has a free hand and no purse. The Government supports him. His hellbox is a charge upon the public funds.

Then why did he abandon the brevier he was using? Brevier, so named from having first been used in the Roman Catholic breviary, called also Jungfer, or Maiden Letter, by the Germans for its comeliness, is that beautiful face spoken of by Moxon as the one wherein the curves show a "sweet driving of the fats and leans into one another," and was in this use, besides, the perfect size.

And what did he put in place of it? Not minion, meaning "darling," because of the early printers' admiration for it, which ought to have been the next choice, but a thing called 7½ point. With this 7½ point he is able to squeeze the measure, with the result that you have now on a page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD three columns of narrow measure where before, immemorially, there had been two of wide measure.

We have before us two folio specimens, the old and the new; yet we cannot undertake to be exact about the measure. Our rule is lost. We carried it in our pocket for many years to mark that day when we laid the empty stick across the "a" box and left the high stool to go and sit at a desk. However, it would not serve if we had it, for since we left the case another enormity of the efficient age has been to impose upon type the point system. By eye we should say the old wide measure was 24 pica ems and that the new narrow measure is 15½ pica ems. The width of a newspaper column is scant 13 pica ems—scant by a shaving of the honest pica base, done to it by the point system, in order that an eighth column might be smuggled upon a newspaper page.

Do not believe that this matter of measure is unimportant. It is significant. Look for yourself. It is impossible to be stentorian in 13 ems. Try it. But in 24 ems, which is nearly book measure, your periods may roll in the grand manner.

We have no doubt the Public Printer told the joint committee he could save some space. Yet most of the little space he gained was lost again by the necessity to use an extra rule—a page of three columns requiring two vertical rules, where a page of two columns takes only one—and besides, we have carefully estimated what he gained in space, and it is nothing—almost nothing in the body and exactly 1 inch at the top of the title page by a separate outrage.

Fancy the richest and most prodigal government in the world saving 1 inch of white paper by reducing the noble English letter title design and pushing the great seal from the middle over to the left ear, where it is half size. What was space to the Public Printer, in any case? It costs him nothing.

No; as we say, he knew better. And we know what happened to him. He departed from the character of printer to become an ironist, and to make his point he was willing to mutilate his art.

Think of him as the only human being who is obliged to read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. As this drudgery came to be less and less relieved by sudden occasional pleasures of the mind, it was natural that with a sense of personal grievance he should begin to speculate on the cause and effects of the decline of political eloquence. The effects, being profound, were more easily perceived than the cause.

Certainly the parliamentary principle in Government and the art of manificent rhetoric declined and withered together. You would not have to be a printer to see that. But knowing in his own craft the importance of dress, as in the example that a poor text may be saved and a good one is made better by fine printing and binding; knowing, too, his Sartor Resartus, as every printer curiously does, and therefore the theorem of Professor Teufelsdröckh that all human forms and institutions are, in fact, clothes, a printer, we dare say, would arrive sooner at the cause. It would occur to him that what was true of a book or a journal would be true also of a statesman, the outwardness in either case acting upon the inwardness—the type upon the text, the clothes upon the man—and that therefore the decline of political eloquence, with disastrous consequences to the parliamentary principle, began with the passing of the silk hat and the long-skirted coat not cut away in front. We ourselves had thought of that.

But there was a collateral question to which we had no answer. Why were those who represented the parliamentary principle—those alone—unaware of what had happened to them? Why did they continue to talk as if they were in frock coats? Why did they continue to support the manner without the dress, which was, of course, absurd?

That was something the Public Printer knew. It was because they continued to read themselves in his wide-measure brevier. And being unable any longer to bear this incongruity, he said to himself, "I will put the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in a sack suit, where it belongs." And that is what he did. We are not going to cancel. Such as it is, there is one CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. But we wish the Public Printer to know that we caught him at it.

EDITORIAL FROM THE CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Chicago Tribune:

[From the Chicago Tribune]

UNION NOW TAKES A STEP FORWARD

Bloody Joe has got the jump on the brothers and sisters who are panting for Union Now. Joe already has his delegate seated in the halls of Westminster.

Willie Gallacher, the turbulent member from Glasgow, can now represent both his countries. The parliamentary correspondents note that since last Sunday he has been treated with unusual affability. Willie isn't used to affability, and it may be that he won't thrive on it. When he was bounced from the Commons for violating the decorum of the Mother of Parliaments it helped his build-up with his constituents on Clydeside.

The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs took some pains to soothe Willie when he arose to demand why the British in Iceland had suppressed a Communist paper and deported a Communist member of the Icelandic parliament. They had been telling the Icelanders and the Canadian troops of occupation about the imperialistic war.

If Mr. Butler, the Under Secretary, had been a little quicker at repartee he would have assured Willie that the British authorities were merely removing their new allies to a safe place before they were taken apart by some irate Canadian. As it was, he murmured regrets.

Willie is sharing the spot light in London with Ivan Maisky, the Soviet Ambassador. At a luncheon Col. Lord Nathan, chairman of the National Defense Public Interest Committee, proposed a toast to the success of Russia. Among those who drank it was the Finnish envoy, whose capital was at the moment being bombed by Bloody Joe's air force. Whatever he was drinking, it wasn't a Martini. He didn't choke on the olive.

There have been some lightning readjustments at Washington since Joe started defending the four freedoms, but Comrade Browder is still in the hoosegow. Fortunately American Cabinet officers are not subject to daily congressional interrogation. If Representative MARCANTONIO, who votes with Joe even if he doesn't admit sleeping with him, wants to ask Attorney General Biddle why he doesn't let Earl out he'll have to go over to the Justice Department.

The readjustments aren't all one-sided. Harry Bridges, Wyndham Mortimer, and the rest of the comrades on the industrial front will have to quit calling the cops Cossacks. The Cossacks are new dealers now.

Report on Defense Progress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 30 (legislative day of Thursday, June 26), 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. JOHN H. BANKHEAD, OF ALABAMA, AT UNIVERSITY OF ALABAMA

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very timely and able address delivered by my colleague, the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], at the defense-day banquet at the University of Alabama on last Wednesday evening, June 25.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In a world in which events move so swiftly that, even with all of the modern methods of communication, we often find ourselves hard-pressed to keep abreast of the momentous happenings of the day—to say nothing of the happenings of the hour or the moment—it seems well to stop at intervals and take stock of the situation. It seems particularly appropriate for such stock taking from time to time in regard to our progress in defense.

I am sure that each of you would like to know what has been done and what is being done in the matter of defense. It is right and fitting that you and every other citizen of the United States should want to know. And it is right and fitting that you should have such a report. And so, as one of your representatives and as a member of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, I bring you a report on what the Congress of the United States, working in close collaboration with our great President and the various defense agencies and executive departments of the Federal Government, has done to make total defense a reality.

Under our form of Government the first step toward translating a desire for total defense into a reality must be taken by the Congress. The Congress must authorize the expenditures for the weapons of defense and must thereafter appropriate the necessary funds for the purchase of these weapons of defense. Then the Army and the Navy, aided during time of emergency by the advice of civilian defense agencies, award contracts.

While the record of congressional appropriations and authorizations for national-defense measures extends back much further, in the cause of brevity I will pick up that record at the time when the third session of the Seventy-sixth Congress convened on January 3, 1940. During the period between January 3, 1940, and July 1, 1940, bills were passed by the Congress carrying appropriations for national defense to the amount of $4,600,689,869. These appropriations provided for the strengthening of our Army and Navy and Coast Guard, for the building up of our air force, and for the construction of a third set of locks for the Panama Canal. They provided for civilian pilot training, for labor training, for the selecting and placing of defense workers. They provided for the purchase of strategic materials, for loans to industry for plant expansion, and for the construction of essential military and naval projects. We realized that not only was it necessary to have new cannons and tanks, but that we must have special types of railroad cars to carry these cannons and tanks. It was necessary to strengthen 2,000 bridges, many of them railroad bridges, to carry this heavy equipment. Work on strategic roads and their bridges was of vital importance. And the means to carry on this work, to carry out the program as we saw it then, was provided. In addition, provision was made for protection, which seemed adequate at the time, against espionage and sabotage.

I believe that you will agree that this was a splendid record of action and accomplishment, this record of the third session of the Seventy-sixth Congress between January 3, 1940, and July 1, 1940. But world events were moving swiftly—swiftly—and taking alarming turns. In May the blitzkreig against Holland, Belgium, and France began. By the middle of June, Belgium had surrendered, Holland was prostrated, and Paris was occupied.

On July 10, 1940, President Roosevelt appealed to the Congress for additional funds for defense.

In response to this appeal, the total defense bill was passed by Congress in the summer of 1940. This bill carried appropriations and authorizations to the amount of $5,246,000,000. It made possible the carrying forward of a naval construction program to give us a real two-ocean Navy—the largest and strongest Navy in the history of the world—a Navy that will insure us absolute supremacy of the seas. Within 2 hours after the signing of this bill, contracts were let for 200 new fighting ships and one repair vessel. Among these were seven battleships, of from 45,000 to 55,000 tons displacement, making them the most powerful battlecraft ever projected.

The total defense bill also provided for the completion of the total equipment for a land force of 1,200,000 men and for basic equipment for 800,000 more men, or a total of 2,000,000 men, if mobilization of such a force should prove necessary. It provided for the purchase of 18,422 planes for the Army and Navy. And $100,000,000 was provided for defense housing.

The provisions of the total defense bill related exclusively to material equipment. Under the Selective Training and Service Act, passed by the Senate on August 28, 1940, and by the House on September 15, 1940, a fair and orderly method of increasing and training the armed personnel of the United States was provided. The National Guard bill, authorizing the mobilization of the National Guard and Reserves for peacetime training, was passed in August 1940.

In line with our good-neighbor policy—the cooperation of all the Americas in a mutual cause of defense—a bill was passed in May 1940 authorizing aid to Central and South American republics in increasing their naval and military establishments through manufacture for them of weapons, vessels, and munitions. On June 17, 1940, the Senate voted reaffirmation of the tenets of the Monroe Doctrine. And in September 1940 a bill was passed authorizing half a billion dollars of export-import loans to be made available for our neighbors to the south.

The acquisition of strategic materials in which the United States is deficient is now generally recognized as of vital importance to our defense program. Back in June 1939, the Congress passed the strategic war materials bill for acquisition of stocks of materials which we lacked and to decrease and prevent, wherever possible, a dangerous dependence of the United States upon foreign nations for supplies. Under this bill $100,000,000 was authorized for procurement and maintenance of these materials and the Secretary of the Interior, through the Bureau of Mines and Geological Survey, was directed to make scientific, techonologic, and economic investigations with view to devising new methods of treatment of materials, the supply of which was inadequate, and for developing substitutes and new sources of supplies. Two months later, under the Deficiency Appropriation Act, an additional $10,000,000 was appropriated for the acquisition of strategic war materials. More funds have been made available since. But the wisdom of starting early to accumulate these supplies is well proven in view of the present difficulties in regard to shipping facilities and shipping lanes. In order to assure the defense industries of an adequate supply of strategic materials, priorities have been established under which defense needs are put first.

The first session of the Seventy-seventh Congress, which convened on January 3, 1941, has striven to meet the challenge of international developments. On May 17, 1941, appropriations and contract authorizations amounted to a total of $37,871,000,000. That is a great deal of money that the Congress has appropriated and for which contract authorizations have been approved. What are we getting for it; how is it being spent? Well, here is a break-down that will tell you, in round figures, how that $37,000,000,000 has been apportioned:

	Billions of dollars
Airplanes and accessories	6.5
Ordnance (guns, powder, etc.)	7.2
Ships, motor, and rail equipment	8.8
New industrial facilities	3.8
Military posts, depots, fortifications, and defense housing	3.3
Other Army and Navy equipment	1.8
Miscellaneous (pay, food, reserve materials, etc.)	5.9

We, in this country, have learned that a defense program is expensive. But some of us are still vague as to why it is so expensive. Because of our fortunate position in the past we are unfamiliar with the cost of items essential to defense. For instance, a 35,000-ton battleship, such as the U. S. S. North Carolina, which was put into service recently, costs $70,000,000. It takes $50,000,000 to build an aircraft carrier. It takes twenty to thirty million dollars for a cruiser. It takes $3,000,000 for a destroyer, and it takes $6,000,000 for a submarine. And even after these vitally important additions to our national defense are built, they are expensive to maintain. It costs $900—about the price of some of those nice cars I saw parked outside—to fire a 14-inch gun from a battleship. And there are 124 guns in the fleet with more scheduled for the two-ocean navy. A 16-inch gun costs $1,600 to fire.

Major naval combat ships under contract or on order April 30, 1940, numbered 360, on 312 of which preliminary work has started. The Navy contracted for 629 vessels, large and small, during the current fiscal year, as compared with 23 in the preceding year. Total tonnage of major combat vessels on order last July 1 was 585,930 tons. By April 30, 1941, it was 2,226,950. Auxiliary vessels under construction between the same months had risen from 74,938 to 282,507 tons.

In addition to the many contracts, under the emergency ship program of the United States Maritime Commission contracts amounting to $726,674,500 were awarded between July 1, 1940, and May 31, 1941.

A 4-engine bomber, complete with spare parts, costs close to a half a million dollars. In April 1941, the production of military planes was 1,376, with manufacturer's estimates for May indicating quadrupled production within the year. The output of all types of military planes was almost 9,000 for 11 months, and with the addition of May's production, the year's record approaches 10,500.

The price of tanks varies from $27,000 for a light tank, to $67,000 for a medium tank and to $114,000 for a heavy tank, not including the cost of guns. The Army has more than four times as many light (13-ton) tanks on hand as it had last July, and by July 1941, the increase is expected to be six-fold. These tanks are now being produced at the rate of about 150 a month. Medium (26-ton) tanks were redesigned in the light of experience of the British and French Armies in Flanders, and production was delayed purposely so that machine-tool priority could be given more critical weapons. Quantity production of medium tanks is expected by late summer.

Scout cars, well-armed combat vehicles, are coming out at the rate of 400 a month. By July the Army will have its present requirements.

The Army had prepared housing for more than 1,100,000 men on May 1, 1941, and expects to have accommodations for 1,350,000 by the end of June. Allocations for new housing projects aggregated 87,260 units in 47 States and Territories on May 1, 1941, of which approximately 10,000 had been built. On May 3, Government funds were being expended in building 58,542 dwelling units in 124 localities of 45 States and Territories. These figures do not include thousands of homes being built with private funds, partially as a result of growing industrial activity.

Since the defense program began, nearly $500,000,000 worth of textile and textile products have been bought, including more than 3,000,000 sheets, 11,000,000 khaki shirts, 18,000,000 pairs of pants, 33,000,000 pieces of cotton underwear, 63,000,000 pairs of socks, and 9,000,000 pairs of shoes, for the expanding Army and Navy. Food purchases for the services amount to almost $700,000 a day.

More than 1,700 plants are being constructed or enlarged at a cost of $2,802,101,000. Some are already completed and almost all are nearing completion. The Government is paying 73.4 percent of the new plants needed for defense, and private industry, as represented by certificates of necessity, is financing the remainder. These figures do not include private investments in industries established before the defense program began or since built without governmental aid in the form of accelerated tax amortization. British commitments amount to an additional $146,400,000 for 47 plants.

America is fortifying herself and solidifying Western Hemisphere defense with the construction of far-flung naval bases. Sites for eight of these were acquired from Britain in exchange for 50 overage destroyers. Bases are being built at Newfoundland, in the Bermudas, in the Bahamas, at Antigua and St. Lucia in the West Indies, at Trinidad and British Guiana, and at Jamaica. Others are under construction in the Pacific Ocean, on the North Atlantic, and on the Gulf of Mexico.

Under the lend-lease bill of March 27, 1941, the Congress approved appropriations and contract authorizations amounting to $7,000,000,000 to make it possible for us to become a real arsenal for democracy, and by so doing to strengthen our own total defense in the most practical possible fashion. In addition to the funds appropriated by us, British orders placed with American industry amounted to $3,700,000,000 as of May 17, 1941.

There is still much to be done to achieve our goal of total defense. To say otherwise would be foolish and untrue. But it is true that we are well launched on this gigantic task. The early steps in such a program are necessarily the slow steps. These early steps have involved getting plants built and into operation and getting the volume of machine-tool manufacturing up to the required point. Now, with more than 1,700 new plants completed or nearing completion, and with 1,000 machine tools being delivered daily to defense industries, we are ready for quantity production. The Office of Production Management estimates that before the end of 1941 the monthly output of airplanes will be doubled, the monthly output of tanks quadrupled, the monthly output of powder and small-arms ammunition trebled, the monthly output of Garand rifles doubled, and the monthly output of .30- and .50-caliber machine guns increased fivefold. To accomplish this machine tools are being utilized 24 hours a day, 7 days a week. We have a job before us. It is a big job, but we can do it and we are going to do it. That is the American way.

There are some among us—not many, thank God, but, at that, too many—who would have us believe that the task is too great, that it is impossible of accomplishment. These defeatists tell us that there is no use trying, that we are beaten before we start. To them I say that even if they are of American birth and citizenship, they do not know America or Americans. The greater the task, the greater the challenge. And when that challenge involves the defense of our country, our homes, our families, our way of life and thought, there are no obstacles great enough to stop us. Before Almighty God, with His aid and with our own determination, I say that we can and we will succeed in this great program.

We always have been and, I trust, we always will be a peace-loving people. Our program of preparedness was launched as a program of peace, not a program of war. In his first inaugural address, President Roosevelt said: "In the field of world policy I would dedicate this Nation to the policy of the good neighbor, the neighbor who resolutely respects himself and, because he does so, respects the rights of others, the neighbor who respects his obligations and respects the sanctity of his agreements in and with a world of neighbors." I believe this Nation is as firmly as ever dedicated to this policy. But when a peaceful community of law-abiding, self-respecting citizens is threatened by bandits, it is only the part of wisdom for the members of that community to prepare to protect themselves. The better they are prepared, the less likely they are to be visited by the bandits. We, as a nation, are simply showing the common sense that any community thus situated would show.

There is much for each of us to do. Under the new civilian-defense program every good citizen has an opportunity to volunteer to perform tasks in his or her own community. Some of these tasks may seem very humble, very routine, but when they are added up as a part of a great national effort they take on importance which cannot be overestimated. I urge each of you to volunteer for the task for which you are best fitted, or for the work most needed in your community, even if you have to learn how to do it. By such an all-out effort you will not only be taking care of work that needs to be done but you will be giving an overwhelming demonstration of national unity and the strength that goes with unity. It is the best possible answer to those among us who have been saying that we as a nation are too divided by regions, groups, races, and religions ever to unite in single, effective purpose.

Is not our opportunity here now? Can we not by our response today brighten the history of the next century? Yes; Americans now are being called to a new glory—we follow, and with high hearts, follow not the voice of dictators nor the demand of guns but quietly we follow the call of all free men of all ages; we follow the star that brought justice to man; we follow the inaudible request of the race of men to come after us. Help us, God. Give us the wisdom to do it gladly.

The Proposed Trade Agreements With Argentina and Uruguay

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 30 (legislative day of Thursday, June 26), 1941

STATEMENT BY HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON, OF COLORADO, BEFORE COMMITTEE FOR RECIPROCITY INFORMATION

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement made by me before the Committee for Reciprocity Information.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I desire to congratulate the State Department and the administration upon their persistent and unselfish devotion to the cause of building good-neighbor psychology in Latin America, and for their sincere and energetic action in its behalf. I believe that most of the people of the United States rejoice over their conception of such a policy. Necessarily it means sacrifices upon the part of our own people to make such a policy effective. It should be obvious, however, that such sacrifices should be borne by all of the people and should not be forced upon only two groups of American citizens, the miners and the livestock growers. Placing the burden of the good-neighbor policy upon these two groups as contemplated in the reciprocal trade agreement before us today will doubtless result in a greatly enlarged market for American manufacturers of automobiles, airplanes, refrigerators, other electrical appliances, and numerous other manufactured articles. Then why should the stockgrowers and the miners pay the bill? Such a lopsided, unfair, and unequitable program ought not to be considered by the State Department or anyone else connected with this Government.

Perhaps Latin America needs our help. If so, it should be freely given at the expense of all, and not in the interest of a part of our people out of the pocketbooks of others of our people. Let all of the people carry the load out of their common treasury, if a sacrifice must be made. It is not fair to South America to encourage their nationals to believe that this Nation is going to adopt a permanent policy of denying our own producers our markets merely to cultivate their friendship. They must know that such a policy cannot continue long in a democracy that has a free ballot.

The world needs every surplus raw material produced in Latin America, and it needs it badly. It is the duty of the United States, therefore, as a good neighbor to Latin America, to help find a free market for whatever she has to sell in the countries that require her goods. Any short-sighted policy of taking our own markets away from our stockgrowers and miners and giving them to foreign nations is neither sound nor natural, and public opinion will sooner or later compel it to be discontinued. Such a program is not a solution, for it is like building a house upon the sand.

On behalf of the tungsten producers of my State, I desire to enter a vigorous protest against any and all proposed reductions in tariffs on importations of tungsten in any form from Argentina or any other foreign country. The maintenance of the present duty and the present market for tungsten is essential to assure the continuation of the steadily increasing production of this strategically vital mineral.

Tungsten was first discovered in the United States in the year 1900 in Boulder County, Colo. During the 14 years prior to 1914 this district produced approximately 60 percent of the total tungsten mined in the United States. Since that date the production records have shown radical curve changes, due largely to lowering of prices and market conditions. A recent survey of Boulder County tungsten production shows that a radical decrease in production has taken place whenever the market price has declined below a certain level.

The records of the United States Bureau of Mines show that with the increased demand for tungsten there has been a comparative increase in production in all of the tungsten-producing States, which include Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Missouri, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Washington. It is estimated that 5,062,199 pounds of tungsten were produced in the United States in 1940, and that a much larger production will take place in 1941. Domestic tungsten production is being prosecuted with more vigor than at any time since the last war. New discoveries are constantly being made by small producers and old mines are being reopened at considerable expense. Several new large properties are going into production, and if necessary financial assistance can be made available, others will follow. Some of the larger mining companies of the country are making large capital investments in tungsten properties and the national demand for tungsten, great as it is, can be met by domestic producers. The United States Bureau of Mines recently stated to the Senate Committee studying the situation with respect to the supplies of strategic minerals that the United States can be made self-sufficient insofar as tungsten is concerned.

To remove the present duty on tungsten importation would be in reality to place an embargo upon domestic producers. A tariff is essential to domestic production because the tariff directly affects the domestic price and the price has a direct bearing upon domestic tungsten production. The number of employed miners in tungsten, while comparatively small, is nevertheless important to the welfare of the immediate districts in which these men are employed. There exists a differential between the cost of producing tungsten in this country and outside the limits of this country which can only be offset by a tariff. Wage standards are admittedly much lower in South American countries, to say nothing of China and other producing countries. Costs of materials have increased rapidly for mining companies in the United States during the last year. The Congress has seen fit to impose costs, such as the social security costs, on the mining industry in this country which, together with workmen's compensation costs, amount to from $1.30 to $2.10 for each $10 pay roll. These costs do not prevail outside of Uncle Sam's borders. In addition to this, local State and Federal taxes have been imposed on domestic producers to such an extent that taxes are in reality a greater burden on local producers than the tariff could possibly be on foreign producers.

To relieve the tungsten industry of these heavy burdens is virtually an impossibility; at least it is not now anticipated. The reluctance of the Federal Government to lend money to domestic producers and the restrictions of the Federal Securities Act have prevented many domestic producers from securing funds to increase plant operations. We see large sums of money loaned to producers abroad and feel that the least the domestic producers can ask is tariff protection. Seagoing transportation facilities are not available to Uncle Sam right now and it is a sound policy to encourage domestic producers instead of depending upon foreign sources in this shipping-bottom crisis.

The increased demand for tungsten can be met by domestic producers with the assistance of contracts already negotiated with foreign producers, which prevail under the present tariff. The lowering of the tariff will destroy important domestic production and not insure consumers of tungsten of a constant supply, regardless of the assertions made by those who would decrease the present tungsten tariff.

Increasing costs of production which must be met by the tungsten industry require a continuation of the present tariff to prevent the elimination of the domestic producer, with resulting loss of capital outlay, unemployment, and destruction of local markets which are vitally needed if the West is to meet the national-defense emergency and cooperate with the National Defense Commission in the manufacture of defense materials.

The tariff on tungsten added to the cost of production in China and other low-wage and labor-exploited countries has kept us in the tungsten business during peacetime to the extent of approximately 50 percent of our domestic needs. As a consequence we had trained personnel and many new deposits in sight ready to produce. The tariff provided an incentive of making it profitable to discover new deposits which are now going into production at a rate that, in the opinion of experts, will make us self-sufficient in a very short time. That fact alone justifies its imposition.

It should be pointed out that a reduction of tariff on materials used in our defense effort in the present emergency, disastrous as it is to domestic tungsten producers, neither adds nor subtracts from the cost of our defense to the United States. Whatever tariff duties are collected offset the higher price of the material, thus it becomes merely a bookkeeping transaction with an extra revenue and an extra expenditure canceling each other. However, I am thinking of the day when the defense program is ended and the reciprocal trade agreements entered into in the emergency for long periods of time may still have years to run. That is the day when importations from South America and the favored nations where labor is exploited, such as China, will close down every tungsten mine in the United States. It is, of course, understood that whatever reductions are made in this agreement to Argentina and Uruguay will extend to China and most of the tungsten exporting countries of the world.

There is no substitute for tungsten as an alloy in armor-piercing bullet cores, and it is an important element in giving alloy steels high tension characteristics. It is a short-sighted policy to deliberately make ourselves dependent upon foreign sources for this indispensable military necessity.

I have read the briefs submitted to this committee by F. E. Mollin, secretary of the American Livestock Association of Denver, Colo., and by F. R. Marshall, secretary of the National Woolgrowers Association, of Salt Lake City, Utah.

I am in complete accord with these two statements of fact and argument, and most earnestly urge this committee to give full weight to the sound logic of their appeal against lowering the tariffs on the products of the American producers of livestock. We owe the American producers of livestock a deep debt of gratitude that can be paid in part at least by protecting them against unfair competition from abroad and, taking a realistic and long-distance survey of the situation, it is decidedly in our interest to do so.

War Conditions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD H. BURTON

OF OHIO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 30 (legislative day of Thursday, June 26), 1941

INTERVIEW WITH HON. HAROLD H. BURTON, OF OHIO

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an interview over the radio with regard to war conditions given by myself on June 28.

There being no objection, the interview was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT ABOUT THE WAR?

(Interview with Senator HAROLD H. BURTON, of Ohio, to be broadcast on or after June 28, 1941, over WTAM and other Ohio stations)

Question. Senator BURTON, what do most people ask you about when they meet you away from Washington?

Answer. The war. Are we going in, and if so, when?

Question. What is your answer to that?

Answer. As to whether or not we shall get into the fighting, no one knows the answer. A month ago I said that I guessed there was more than an even chance, perhaps a 60-percent chance, that we would be able to stay out of it. That estimate still holds good. Two weeks ago it did drop to about 58 percent, but since the Nazis declared war on Russia it is back to 60 percent. I believe that the President also feels that there still is a substantial chance that we shall be able to stay out it, although apparently neither Secretary of the Navy Knox nor Secretary of War Stimson thinks so. Personally, I see no adequate basis for our going in now, and if we ever do go in, it should be only because we are forced in by attack or unequivocal threat of attack. It is, therefore, useless to guess when that issue will arise, because we have no way of estimating the date of a hostile attack or threat of attack upon us. The sinking of the Robin Moor and the turning of its passengers and crew adrift 700 miles from shore showed such a ruthless disregard of the lives of our citizens and of treaties with us, as to indicate that it might be followed by a further and greater attack upon us by the Nazis at any convenient early date. On the other hand, the declaration of war by the Nazis on Russia on June 22 must mean that the Nazis will not attack others until after that campaign is over.

Question. What effect will the Nazi-Russian war have on the general situation?

Answer. There are at least four clear effects. First. The war between the Nazis and Russia necessarily will cause substantial losses of men, equipment, and supplies to both sides. Much of this loss will be irreplaceable—except as the victors replace their losses by taking still more from the losers. Each bit of damage done to each other by these dictators means an advantage to the free nations of the world. Second. If Russia beats off this attack, it is hardly conceivable that Russia will undertake any aggressive campaign against anyone at this time. In such an event the Nazis will be so severely handicapped by loss of prestige, men, equipment, and material, and by consumption of their limited supplies of oil and grain that this defeat may be fatal to their plans for further conquests. Third. If the Nazis win, then at least the menace of communism will have been substantially checked. However, the immediate menace of a renewed Nazi drive for world domination, strengthened by great supplies of Russian oil and grain, would endanger the rest of the world more seriously than ever, unless in the meantime Britain may have done more damage to the Nazis than they can offset by their new supplies. This brings us to the fourth and most critical effect of all, namely, the effect on the British campaign. Britain now has the greatest opportunity that has been or that probably will be offered to it in this war. It is the opportunity to attack the Nazis from the rear with Britain's full strength at a time when the Nazis' strongest forces must be concentrated on the Russian front. This may be the turning point in the whole war. This may mean the destruction of the Nazi dream of world domination. If Britain, with the aid of all possible material and equipment from the United States, can now develop such a complete and violent attack by air, and in some places also by land and by sea, as to destroy vital and irreplaceable equipment and means of production, to say nothing of manpower, it will mean much. Not only may the spirit of Germany at home be weakened but the Nazi military resources may be so handicapped that even with their victorious armies returning from Russia, and even with the addition of the great resources of Russia, they will be unable for a long time to carry out their program of an attack on Britain and of world domination.

Question. What effect does this have on the policies of the United States?

Answer. It is all in our favor. Our greatest need has been and is the need for time within which to develop our production of material and equipment and the organization of our full-scale defense program. We need every moment of this time, and it is quite likely that there will be none too much of it. Our defense program is not well organized, it is not keeping up to its expected schedule, and for that very reason this added time is a vitally important gain for us in our program. America is determined to defend herself, and the philosophy of the defense program upon which America is agreed consists of creating such a modern, adequate, and great defense force that it will be obviously superior to its opposition. We are now offered the chance to make up for much of the time we have lost. We should at once reorganize and drive our defense program with the same efficiency and determination as if we actually were at war. Upon this organization and upon our production of defense equipment and materials depends our chance to win the war without fighting it, or, if forced to fight, to win it most surely and quickly. Our course should be clear. Adequate preparedness provides our best chance to forestall and prevent any attempt to attack our territory, our people, or our rights, including, of course, our Monroe Doctrine and Pan American agreements.

Question. You have referred to the Monroe Doctrine and Pan American agreements. Do you regard these as liabilities or assets?

Answer. I regard them as important net assets, although they carry with them some serious liabilities and responsibilities, as do most things that are of value. The Monroe Doctrine is not only a traditional doctrine to keep our Western Hemisphere safe from European aggression; it is also a modern military asset, because the United States is much more safe with North, Central, and South America in friendly hands than if any of the Western Hemisphere were held as hostile bases. With the increasing speed of travel by air, as well as by land and sea, the military value of a mutual interest in each other's safety has become increasingly clear to each of the 21 republics that make up the Pan American Union, to say nothing of the Dominion of Canada.

Question. Do you think there is any likelihood of an attack by the Axis Powers on any of these nations?

Answer. The Axis program probably would not take such a simple form. For example, I suggest the following considerations as one guide to practical thinking. Inasmuch as most Central and South American nations are exporting nations, their futures depend in a great degree upon the friendly control of the seas, and particularly of the Atlantic Ocean. Today the control of the seas, and especially the Atlantic Ocean, is primarily in Great Britain, together with the United States and the governments of all of the 20 republics south of us are friendly to us and are working with us. It must be recognized, however, that in many of the nations of this hemisphere there is a strong opposition party which is more in sympathy with the Nazis, or at least with the "new order" in Europe, than with the United States. We may well give serious consideration, therefore, to the practical probability that, in the event that the control of the seas should seem likely to pass to the Axis Powers, the opposition parties in 8 or even 10 of these nations would be seriously tempted to seize control of their respective governments. If successful, this would bring Nazi domination well within our hemisphere. This would lead easily to establishing Nazi bases available to the Nazi-controlled air lines in South America. Such considerations as these emphasize the need of an active defense and lend-lease program on our part, to retain the control of the seas and of such lands that our security is reasonably assured.

Question. Should we aid Russia?

Answer. That question is up to the minute and looks into the future. It should not be answered casually. First of all, aid apparently has not been requested of us by Russia, so that the question may not arise in fact. Second, it is obvious that our all-out aid to Britain now should be increased with the greatest vigor and this aid, of course, will be of indirect benefit to Russia and through Britain some of our defense materials may themselves reach Russia. To this, under the present circumstances, there can be no objection, and if our procedure could be limited to this program the result would be most satisfactory to us and I hope that we may be able to follow that policy. This would carry out our purposes of defense without further confusion of our international relations. On the other hand, these are not times in which to quibble and we cannot hesitate to meet issues on their merits whenever it becomes necessary to do so.

Our guiding principle must be the interest and the defense of our own Nation. The authority of the lend-lease law is not authority to aid Britain or Russia or anyone else, as such. It is authority to supply defense articles only to the Government of any country whose defense the President deems vital to the defense of the United States and this must be his guide and ours. If, therefore, it becomes apparent to the President that it is vital to our defense that the Nazis be prevented from taking by force from Russia the oil, grain, and other raw materials that the Nazis seek, to help the Nazis in their fight for world domination, we obviously cannot afford to destroy the effect of our own defense program or the effect of the materials already sent by us to Britain, by failing to give the aid needed to protect these materials from seizure by the Nazis. We certainly cannot afford to do this merely because these materials happen to be now under the control of Russia. If the President finds that as a step vital to our defense our aid is needed to defend these resources from being used against us, he should not hesitate under existing law, to send aid for such defense, whether or not it also be an aid to Russia, with whose governmental policies we are and shall continue to be in complete disagreement.

Question. What about the public discussions and meetings being held in opposition to war throughout this country?

Answer. Fair, public, and private discussions of the subject are a good thing. It is quite appropriate that the freedom of speech which we are defending should be practiced as well as preached. It is, however, an abuse, rather than a sound use, of freedom of speech to use it in calling people names or in inciting people to suspect that every opponent of theirs must have ulterior motives. The badge of the best Americanism and of the proper use of our freedom of assembly, press, and speech, is the temperance, tolerance, clearness, coolness, and the constructive character of the statements made and of the views urged. Speech is kept free, not in the hope that through it our citizens shall become abusive and intolerant, but in the hope that through it, our citizens may share their best ideas with one another and by the exchange of these thoughts guide our Nation along a sound and sensible path in its own best interest. To abuse this freedom of discussion by making unjustified charges of disloyal and selfish motives on the part of all who disagree with the speaker is to demonstrate a failure to appreciate the purpose of the freedom we have. This freedom exists so that we may reason with one another and thereby help our Nation. If we are to expect others to adopt our precious "freedom," our first duty is to demonstrate their use and their value.

ARTICLE FROM THE MOBILE (ALA.) REGISTER

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I have here an article written by Mr. Peter Edson which appeared in the Mobile Register, a newspaper of Mobile, Ala., on the great ability and outstanding personality of the distinguished senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. I ask unanimous consent to have the article printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Mobile (Ala.) Register of June 25, 1941]

IN WASHINGTON

(By Peter Edson)

WASHINGTON, June 24.—They call TOM CONNALLY, of Marlin, Tex., the last of the long-haired Senators. All the others let the barbers cut around their ears and run the clippers up their necks, or are so baldish they don't even make it interesting for a tonsorial artist who really loves his work.

TOM doesn't reveal his age in the Congressional Directory, but he was a soldier in the Spanish-American War, and from other sources comes the word that he will soon be 65. And if you, gentle male reader of 50 or over, could grow hair like the senior Senator from Texas, you'd make the barbers be discreet, too. Get even a distant look at big TOM on the Capitol Grounds under his broad-brimmed, black 3-gallon hat and you know that there, by golly, goes a statesman, even if he doesn't wear a frock coat.

Maybe, like Samson, his strength is in that hair. At any rate, he has the strength of a longhorn steer and its courage, too, and when he starts pawin' the ground, a stampede can start any time, and it's just as well to get for the top rails of the corral fence.

NO YAWNS FOR TOM

The Senate of the United States can be the dullest of deliberate assemblies when some of the demagogs start droning, but when the Senator from Texas takes the floor it can be livelier than a barn dance. Likewise, a Senate committee can bore you to insensibility, but when the gentleman from Texas starts asking questions of a witness who doesn't want to be too specific or doesn't know exactly what he's talking about, you wake up quick.

Talkin' Texas, droppin' g's all over the carpet, and flattenin' his a's all over the table, he is again the prosecutin' attorney from Falls County with a barbed-wire flail at the tip of his tongue. He can make a bureaucrat squirm through his testimony like a coyote in the sagebrush, its tail between its legs, headin' for the hills.

Old TOM—you call him "old" affectionately, for he is a lovable cuss with a magnificent sense of sarcastic humor—has been in unusually fine form this last week or so backing his amendment to the selective-service law to permit the President to take over strike-bound plants, and ripping into the Aluminum Co. of America as its officials came before the Truman committee investigating national defense, lashing at everything which savored of bunk or didn't make sense to his Texas mind.

"The Senator from Ohio is a statesman," CONNALLY cracked at TAFT in debate. "He does not think this bill is any good, but he is for it."

A moment later, TAFT tried to make the point that CONNALLY's amendment would not prevent men from striking against the United States Government, that a strike simply meant the men ceased to work.

"Oh, they can quit if they want to," agreed CONNALLY, "and they can go plumb to Ohio."

When Senator MALONEY offered an amendment, CONNALLY accepted it, but when MALONEY came back with another CONNALLY ducked it with a gagline: "I have accepted one amendment from the Senator from Connecticut," he said, "and the quota today is only one amendment per Senator."

IRKED BY DELAYS

The debate was on for 3 days, and CONNALLY, fighting every minute, kept peppering his argument with a salty humor that kept his colleagues and the gallery grinning.

"I am not in favor of putting into the bill a great number of 'ifs,' 'ands,' 'buts,' and 'wait-a-minute' clauses," he stormed. "I want the Government to step in whenever necessary without having to wait around until three or four walking delegates decide when and if the Government may act."

CONNALLY is, as mentioned, fearless. And in threatening to take over the Aluminum Co. of America "if it did not behave" he was merely breathing more of the fire that has marked his 24 years in Washington. That long service, however, has never made him less a Texan than he ever was. He is king of the big Texas delegation in Congress, of course. SAM RAYBURN may be Speaker of the House, but TOM is Senator. Even if Gov. "Biscuits" O'Daniel should be elected to the Senate, he will have a tough time getting ahead of TOM.

St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR.

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 30 (legislative day of Thursday, June 26), 1941

ARTICLE BY FELIX MORLEY

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Dr. Felix Morley, published in yesterday's Washington Star, on the St. Lawrence seaway proposal.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Sunday Star of June 29, 1941]

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY PROPOSAL AIDED BY GROWING REGIONALISM—TREND TO ECONOMIC UNITY, LAYING GROUNDWORK FOR COOPERATION, SEEN ALSO IN TURKISH AGREEMENT WITH GERMANY

(By Felix Morley)

Between the St. Lawrence seaway project and the treaty "of friendship and mutual confidence" recently concluded by Germany and Turkey there would at first glance seem to be not the faintest connection.

Yet a certain relationship exists. It might perhaps be guessed from present indications that the treaty signed at Ankara June 18 will soon be followed by success for President Roosevelt in getting the waterway and power project through Congress.

Of course, the connection is very indirect, or it would be more widely recognized than is the case. There is no parallelism, or even similarity of any kind, between the two undertakings. Nor is there any historical relationship.

As a matter of fact, agitation for the present St. Lawrence project dates from the period immediately after the last war, a time when the last treaty between Germany and Turkey had just been forcibly liquidated, and when few people anywhere anticipated its restoration.

Nonetheless it would be a mistake, in this period of rapid fundamental change, to assume that events which are wholly separated in time and space are for that reason unrelated. And failure to recognize these fundamental relationships, when they exist, can only result in giving us a distorted and misleading conception of the present world upheaval.

"NEW ORDER" TO STAY, TURKS BELIEVE

The case which has been taken for illustration may be clarified, first, by considering the underlying significance of the German-Turkish treaty. Then one should ask why the St. Lawrence seaway project is now for the first time likely to triumph over the opposition which has heretofore stalled it. Finally there should be examination of the invisible unity between the two developments which is assumed.

The underlying significance of the treaty recently signed at Ankara is suggested by the evident conclusion of the Turkish Government that in one form or another the "new order" in Europe has come to stay. Because of that conclusion the Turkish leaders, heretofore regarded as anti-Axis and pro-Russian, have now bound themselves to "take no measure that is aimed directly or indirectly against" Germany.

It is wholly appropriate to argue that the Turks must have been bulldozed into signing this treaty; that it does not represent the wishes of the Turkish people; that it is a dreadful mistake which Turkey will eventually regret. All that may be true. But even in total such considerations cannot conceal the fact that the treaty has been signed.

One reason for the signing is doubtless the military weakness of Great Britain in the Near East. The evacuation of Greece and Crete has been followed by repulse of the mechanized thrust against Libya and by very slow progress against a few allegedly demoralized French regiments in Syria. And there has been nothing in the first phase of German military operations against Russia to indicate that the Turks guessed badly in signing the treaty of Ankara.

IN GERMAN ECONOMIC ORBIT

A more important influence, however, would seem to be the fact that Turkey has in late years been drawn so closely into the German economic orbit. It has not escaped notice that a pledge of even more far-reaching commercial exchange has accompanied the political agreement between the two countries.

In the last year before the war, half of Turkey's imports were drawn from Germany and one-third of her exports were going to that country. Under present conditions virtually all of the foreign trade of Turkey is Axis controlled. As often happens an act of political faith has followed an established economic condition.

We turn to the wholly different subject of the St. Lawrence seaway project, now very much to the fore although defeated 5 years ago as a treaty by the United States Senate.

The last 5 years, however, have seen a great strengthening of the scene of mutual interest between Canada and the United States.

This feeling of fundamental unity is really the keynote at the Fourth Biennial Conference on Canadian-American Affairs which I have been attending at Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario.

Whereas the project used to be considered separately from particularistic American and Canadian angles, with argument as to which would benefit the more if it were carried through, the undertaking is now discussed much more as a mutual enterprise. Additional advantages are seen from both sides of the border precisely because that border is no longer the sharp line of demarcation which it used to be.

Certain of the American representatives at the Kingston conference, such as Adolf Berle, who came there after making a progress report in Ottawa, have been serving as official spokesmen for President Roosevelt on the St. Lawrence waterway issue. So it is not surprising that the project was very much to the fore at the sessions last week.

RELATIONS INTERWOVEN

A new support, however, has arisen from the long-range defense aspects of the undertaking. Even if completion would take several years, it is argued, that is not a valid objection. Since Canada and the United States are now permanent allies, both should look beyond immediate defense requirements.

It is even suggested that there is something captious in criticism of the procedure whereby the administration now seeks to put the project through Congress by a simple majority vote of both Houses, detouring the two-thirds Senate vote required for treaty ratification.

The commercial and political relations of Canada and the United States are now so interwoven, it is asserted, that there is a certain impropriety in expecting a formal treaty basis for a project deemed mutually desirable for both countries.

This article does not propose to discuss the pros and cons of the St. Lawrence waterway, nor to examine in any detail the equally controversial issue of the German-Turkish treaty. At the start a certain connection between the two was asserted. The precise nature of this connection remains to be stated.

In both cases, wholly remote and dissimilar as they may seem, a developing regional economic unity has been laying the groundwork for a measure of political consolidation.

DEVELOPING REGIONALISM

A developing European regionalism, backed by forces more powerful than those of Hitler's legions, is the fundamental explanation for a Turkish political shift which was surprising to many. A developing North American regionalism now makes probable the adoption of a mutual defense and power project which until recently was unable to make headway against very valid specific criticisms.

It is absurd to say that only President Roosevelt and a small group of new dealers really want the St. Lawrence waterway project. Economical or not, the trend of the times is working for this development. President Roosevelt did not create this trend, though he has had the intuition to recognize it and the foresight to encourage it.

Similarly, one is forced to conclude, the trend of the times is working for European unity. That it should be forcibly imposed by methods of horror, cruelty, and brutal domination is appalling. But those elements might not be so apparent today if past efforts to unify Europe had not so often been blocked by chicanery and force exercised on the basis of purely national advantage.

As one prominent Canadian put it in informal conversation at the Kingston conference: "After the overthrow of Hitler we shall have to be intelligent enough to recognize that some of his work was along the same permanent line of unification as was urged in our discussions here."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. H. H. SCHWARTZ

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 30 (legislative day of Thursday, June 26), 1941

ARTICLE BY CONSTANTINE BROWN

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimcus consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Constantine Brown, who in my judgment is one of the best informed writers in the United States on American and foreign military affairs. This article has reference to the danger to the United States in the event Soviet Russia is crushed.

In the course of a few days I expect to say something about the air line from Denver north to Great Falls, Mont., thence to Lethbridge, and going from there up to Alaska and connecting with our important defense air ports in that Territory. The particular merits of this line are that it runs east of the Rocky Mountains, does not cross any high ranges, and is adjacent to many mountain passes over which, in emergency, planes can easily travel to the Pacific coast. It is called "the sunshine line" because it is free of fogs and other conditions interfering with air flight. It is a very important adjunct to the Government air-service defense program and should have serious consideration by that service.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star of June 29, 1941]

THREAT TO UNITED STATES SEEN IF SOVIET IS CRUSHED—HOSTILE PLANES COULD FLY TO AMERICAN CONTINENT IN 2 HOURS

(By Constantine Brown)

For the first time since the outbreak of the war Washington leaders are gravely concerned over the danger that threatens if the Soviets are crushed—hostile aircraft by the thousand within 2 hours' flight from the North American Continent. For this reason the eyes of American observers are riveted on Japan's attitude in this new conflict and all her moves and actions are followed with eagerness.

In official quarters, which have assumed for the time being a discreet silence, it is believed that if the German armies are as quickly victorious in Russia as they have been elsewhere, Japan will take advantage of the situation and invade Siberia, which will fall into her lap once the central authority in Moscow has been crushed.

Should this happen, Axis airplanes will find adequate airfields and other flying facilities in the Maritime Provinces and the prospect of an invasion of the North American Continent will become dangerously close. The problem of this country will then be the defense of the Southern Hemisphere, help to Britain on a larger scale than at present and the defense, with whatever contribution Canada may be able to make of the west coast from Alaska to California. And this is not a particularly cheering prospect.

Although at the time of this writing Japan has maintained an unexpected reserve, in well-informed quarters it is believed that this reserve will last only until the results of the German blitz are more tangible. If the Soviet forces crumble and the central authority in Moscow is compelled to flee before a victorious enemy, Japan is expected to make good her decade-long claims on the maritime provinces and possibly the rest of Siberia as far as the Baikal Lake.

The force defending that part of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, estimated at the time at 100,000 men, with about 800 to 1,000 planes, will not be able to stem the Japanese advance. It is even conceivable that the military leaders in Siberia might be willing to strike a bargain with the Tokyo Government. The Japanese soldiers have never ceased to advocate Japan's expansion toward the north and the move toward Singapore and the Dutch East Indies has been only the sequel of the German-Soviet agreement of 1939. The Japanese could not go against Russia and remain the allies of the Reich.

But in most Japanese military and naval quarters the following reasoning was going on: If Japan directs her military efforts northward and takes Siberia, she accomplishes two definite things: She rounds out her empire on the mainland in the north and also deprives Chang Kai-shek of his most efficient supporter. If the war were to turn against the Axis ultimately, the Allies would not try to force Japan out of Siberia at the cost of another war. They would undoubtedly use the most drastic means to remove Japan from the southern Pacific and the Indian Ocean, once their hands were free again after the defeat of the Axis.

On the other hand, if the western nations were defeated, there would be ample time to conquer their possessions in the south. Hence the Japanese reluctance to go overtly toward the Netherland Indies in Singapore. They have taken Indo-China because it entailed no fighting and it was believed that neither London nor Washington cared particularly what happened to that French colony. But it is the opinion here that the Japanese have had a good inkling of what would happen between the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the Axis for the last 6 weeks. This explains fully their "patience" in regard to the administration of Batavia, which turned down Japanese "economic cooperation" plans.

GERMANY EXPECTS REWARD

In military quarters it is believed that the reward Germany expects from Japan for assisting her in conquering Siberia will be cooperation of all the elements of the Axis to down Great Britain. And Britain extends practically all over the world. Canada is a part of the Empire. Hence a military action of the Axis against the North American member of the Empire would be a logical thing.

The Russians, who have looked on aviation as a main weapon in the war since 1924, have done splendid work in Siberia. Their air facilities there could easily accommodate an air armada of several thousand planes, according to reliable reports. The harbors at Vladivostock and Alexandrovak are excellent naval bases which could be used by the Axis submarines and the Japanese Navy.

If the Japanese find that the conquest of Siberia would not entail too heavy losses, the probabilities are that the order to move north would be given to the armies which are stationed in Siberia and in Manchukuo.

SIGNIFICANCE OF STRUGGLE

Once Siberia is in Japanese hands, the threat to the North American Continent becomes real and the danger of an invasion cannot and must not be overlooked. This is the significance, as far as Washington is concerned, of the struggle between Germany and Russia. This is also the reason why a number of conservative leaders of the administration who have never looked with favor on the Soviets and have always suspected the Kremlin's trickery are today wondering what assistance could be given to the Russians to prevent their early collapse.

In military quarters the chances of the Soviet Army's resisting the Germans better than the Poles, for instance, are considered rather small. Russia has a tremendous manpower; Russia has a large mechanized force. But it has neither the necessary brains in high places to lead the army nor the facilities to replace without delay the losses of tanks and airplanes it must sustain in a war against the Reich and its allies. The several 5-year plans of the Soviet Government have improvised an industry which is interesting, considering that it was completely nonexistent in the past, but this improvised industry cannot stand the strain of a mechanical war against a country which has all the industrial resources of Europe at its disposal.

There are many wishful thinkers who are comparing Hitler's campaign with that which sounded the death knell of Napoleon. It is true that Russia is the same vastness that it was in 1812, but the means of Hitler are different. Napoleon's men moved on horseback and on foot. His supplies came in horse- or ox-drawn carts. Hitler's 1,200,000 men move in trucks, tanks, and airplanes. The supplies for the fighting infantry and the cavalry, of which he has thrown no less than 160,000 into the battle against the Soviets, come by fast trucks and, whenever needed, by huge supply planes.

NAZI "SPECIALISTS" IN RUSSIA

Furthermore, the Germans have been Russia's ally since September 1939. While the number of specialists sent to assist the "ally" from Berlin was not as large as Berlin wanted, at least 10,000 German "specialists" have been active in various capacities. Some of these men have been in close touch with officers of the high command and divisional and army corps commanders. How much termiting they have been able to do will be seen in the next few weeks.

It is believed here that a number of Russia's military leaders have been successfully "tempted." Without doubt these are going to be the future Quislings of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. Dictator Stalin is feared but not loved. The day the purging power is out of his hands there is no question that a number of high-ranking officers will be willing to consider the setting-up of a new regime without the present dictator.

He is known only by name and photograph to the army. Unlike his Italian and German colleagues, he is not a soldier and has never kept in touch with the armed forces.

All these conditions point to defeat of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

If Washington is concerned over this probable defeat it is not because it holds a brief for the Caucasian ruler of Russia, or for his political philosophy. There is not much to choose between Josef Stalin and Adolf Hitler. They have double-crossed each other and have plunged the world into its present chaotic condition.

Nobody here forgets how Stalin double-crossed the French and the British by inviting their military experts to Moscow in August 1939, when he had already secretly signed a treaty with the Reich. Nobody has forgotten the sympathy expressed by the Soviet Government to Yugoslavia and the promise of assistance, while 2 days after that kingdom's defeat Stalin kicked its representatives out of Moscow. Many quarters feel that what he is reaping now has been sown by him and his henchmen over a period of years.

Of course, Hitler's unwarranted attack on a nation with which he had signed a solemn treaty of nonaggression and which he has repeatedly described in his speeches as "our friend and good neighbor" does not make the situation more palatable. It makes it clear to everybody that Hitler's repeated declaration that it is insane to imagine an attack of the Axis against the Western Hemisphere has no more value than his recent declaration of love for Russia.

While a few months ago the physical difficulties of such an attack led many to give little credence to the fear expressed by our naval and military authorities, the situation is likely to change completely now. The day the Japanese are installed in Siberia the possible danger of an invasion becomes an imminent danger—within 24 hours.

Washington feels powerless to help the Soviets unless Russia is able to help herself by resisting Germany's blitz. Should Hitler's schedule of a 4 to 6 weeks' campaign become upset, war matériel might be sent over to the Russians by way of Siberia if the necessary tonnage could be spared. But if Hitler's blitz goes according to schedule no "lease-lend" for the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics can be possible.

Our New Supreme Court—Mr. Ickes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, in a world already sufficiently full of discord, Mr. Harold Ickes stands in a class by himself. For sheer, unadulterated ability to provoke wrath, he is unequalled in an administration which has specialized in this gentle quality. How to make enemies and alienate people is a truly difficult art; but he has mastered it.

The latest in his series of forays into the realm of vituperation, denunciation, and invective is an attack upon that big bogeyman of all public officials, the octupus known as monopoly. This time it is the Aluminum Co. of America. Speaking before the Truman committee of the United States Senate, which is investigating the reasons for our highly delayed defense program, Secretary Ickes snapped out a juicy charge. He turned to ALCOA and told the Senators that if we were to become involved in a losing war it might well be that the activities of the Aluminum Co. of America would be responsible for so drastic a result.

It is an appalling charge to make. But it became still more appalling on the day immediately following Mr. Ickes' testimony when officials of this "vicious" company appeared to answer the accusation. They pointed out that their organization had just completed the expenditure of $200,000,000 for expansion purposes, that they had doubled their production since 1938 and were shooting at a goal which would triple their output in 1941. To clinch their defense, they informed the committee that the much-needed expansion of aluminum production was being held up by the failure of the Office of Production Management to approve plans for building a new plant at Fontana, N. C.

The company's spokesmen dealt in facts and figures, no less than countercharges. According to construction estimates, it takes some 80,000 pounds of aluminum to build one of the new bombers for which Mr. Ickes was pleading. To build 6,000 such planes would be a Herculean task for 1942. But even this quota would use only 480,000,000 pounds of aluminum, and by July of 1942, Aluminum Co. of America and other aluminum producers on our continent will have turned out 1,200,000,000 pounds at least.

These are the facts. Mr. Ickes apparently does not care too much about them. For 2 years an antitrust action has been proceeding against the Aluminum Co. of America. The courts have not yet handed down their verdict, but our Secretary of the Interior has. He has indicted and convicted them without benefit of trial.

What shall we say as to the wisdom of this course? Is this the time to condemn our largest producers as monopolies? Is this the proper hour to replace calm consideration of the issues by a resort to name calling? Whatever may be the merits of the argument, one indisputable fact remains unchallenged. We are seeking to produce greater quantities of materials than our country has ever turned out in its history. Is it conducive to this course to brand our large manufacturers as criminals? Or would it be more productive of harmonious relations between Government and industry if we agreed to put aside the Federal daggers pointed at the throat of management in favor of a friendly handshake?

The answer is obvious enough. It must be a source of regret that Mr. Ickes and some of his followers cannot read it.

Gasoline Tax

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Speaker, this week the Ways and Means Committee will consider excise taxes in the new tax bill. It has been suggested that there should be an increase of 2½ cents per gallon in the tax on gasoline. Let us examine this suggestion more carefully.

Wisconsin, extending more than 400 miles from the Illinois border near Chicago on the south to the city of Superior, adjoining Duluth, Minn., on the north, is one of our greatest States. Because of the extreme distance from north to south, we are able to grow almost every kind of produce from fruit and tobacco to hard wheat. We grow oats, barley, flax and rye, sugar beets, potatoes, and, of course, all the garden vegetables. We are the Nation's biggest hemp producer and also one of the highest in the production of cheese, butter, milk, and milk products.

The production of our soil and the production of our factories depends upon gasoline to a great extent. We use gasoline engines for churning, for wood cutting, and for use around the farm. We use tractors in plowing and harrowing, in sowing and reaping, and to operate grain separators. We use trucks to carry our livestock and our crops to market. At one time we led the entire country in the production of lumber, and even today the lumber industry in the Great Lakes region is still an important industry. Gasoline-powered equipment is an important factor in the operation of sawmills, and, of course, is indispensable to the trucks which are so extensively used in conveying the lumber from mill to market. Gasoline-powered boats are essential for fishing on the Great Lakes.

To the factory gasoline-driven power turns many a cog and wheel, to the wholesaler and the retailer gasoline is essential for the life of his trade. Rapid delivery is indispensable today.

The automobile and the truck, driven by gasoline, are important to the Wisconsin farmers, the manufacturers, the merchants, the laboring classes; in short, to everyone, old and young, men and women alike. Every type of business depends on gasoline.

During 1939, for example, motortrucks were used to haul 53 percent of the livestock, 40 percent of the fruit and vegetables, 65 percent of the poultry, 39 percent of the eggs, and 27 percent of all the butter received in all the major markets throughout the country. The probability that these products thereby were hauled more cheaply and more quickly than they might have been by any other transport medium is overwhelming. That is important to every Wisconsin producer. When animal power was displaced in field work on the farm by the tractor it was also displaced by the automobile and the truck as the fundamental means of farm transportation. The resulting improvement in farm transportation is significant because the fact that transportation is one of the most important essentials of farm operation and farm life cannot be overemphasized.

I hope I have been able to make clear to you in a few words the truly essential importance of the gasoline engine, which really is the basis of agricultural mechanization, to the farmer and to his business. And when I say "farmer," I speak not only of the farmer whose farm covers half a county but also of the farmer whose livelihood depends on no more than 10 or 20 acres. For the small farmer must also produce at low cost if he is to survive, so that mechanization is as necessary for him as it is for the big farmer.

I have tried to make clear to you the importance of the gasoline engine to the farmer so that you would appreciate the importance of the gasoline used to operate these engines. Without low-cost gasoline the gasoline engine would be practically useless. Gasoline is as fundamental to the farmer's production as is his milking pail, and it is as fundamental to his modern means of transportation as is the wheel. Probably the principal factor responsible for the widespread use on the farms of mechanisms driven by gasoline engines is the low cost at which gasoline has been available.

I understand that gasoline prices today are less than half of what they were in 1920, exclusive of gasoline taxes. Until a few years back, of course, gasoline taxes were almost exclusively State taxes, and under most State gasoline tax laws the gasoline used on farms was not subject to taxation. Now the Federal Government has invaded the gasoline-tax field, and, because the Federal gasoline tax is not a road tax, no refunds or exemptions are provided for gasoline used on farms and for other nonhighway purposes.

It is for this reason that the Federal gasoline tax is particularly objectionable to Wisconsin farmers. In the opinion of the farmer, the taxation of gasoline consumption is unfair and discriminatory. The farmer believes that if the Federal Government plans to tax his consumption of gasoline, it might as well tax his hay fork or his potato hook. For the taxation of gasoline consumed by the farmer is the same as taxing his tools of production and transportation.

Someone already has pointed out that the cost of gasoline is an important item in the cost of running a farm, probably more important than it is to nearly any other businessman. Probably the only other businessman who uses gasoline quite as extensively is the commercial trucker. An artificial increase in the cost of gasoline to the farmer by the imposition of an additional 1 cent a gallon Federal gasoline tax would mean an increase of about 10 percent in the cost of gasoline. This is a most substantial increase in the cost of an important item in the farmer's cost of doing business. And when you realize that our farmer does not receive parity in his prices, you must conclude that a tax on his tools is most unfair.

The farmers of this country use about one quarter of all the gasoline consumed each year. They use this gasoline in the process of trying to squeeze a meager living out of the soil. Their success depends to a great extent on their ability to grow their crops and to transport them to market as cheaply as possible. The cost of gasoline is one of the most important factors in determining these costs. Excessive taxation of gasoline by the Federal Government thereby hurts the farmer's chances of getting a reasonable return for his labor by increasing one of his most important costs.

The people of Wisconsin adopted the gasoline tax in 1925 because they saw that it was an equitable way of taxing themselves for the construction of highways. They still pay this tax willingly because of the direct benefits they derive from it. They do not, however, embrace the Federal gasoline tax with the same willingness because it is not a tax for roads, it is a general tax, the revenue from which is used to finance the cost of the Federal Government. They are not opposed to financing such costs as are necessary for defense but they do feel that a tax on the tools a man uses in the course of earning a livelihood is a very inequitable measure for this purpose.

Moreover, using revenue from the State gasoline tax and other highway-user levies, as well as income from bond issues, Wisconsin has invested hundreds of millions of dollars in an extensive highway system, the availability of which now is indispensable to the State. The preservation of this investment is dependent on the gasoline-tax revenue of the State. If the increasingly higher Federal taxes on gasoline discourage gasoline use in Wisconsin, our State would have difficulty in replacing the curtailment in the State gasoline-tax collections.

I am adding some data that may be of interest and should be examined:

The proportion of State gasoline-tax revenue available to the Wisconsin State Highway Department now being used for payment of highway bond interest and principal, 1939, is 28.7 percent.

The total State bonded indebtedness for highways and bridges, 1939, is $21,786,187 in Wisconsin.

In Wisconsin the rate of State gas tax is 4 cents per gallon. The total gasoline tax if the Federal tax becomes 2½ cents would be 6½ cents. The total price, excluding tax, on 10 gallons is $1.39. The total tax cost on 10 gallons, if the Federal tax becomes 2½ cents, would be 65 cents. You will notice that 47 percent of the price consists in the tax.

In a table of comparative State rankings as to resources, the State of Wisconsin is 17 under debt-paying index, 15 under N. I. C. B. income in 1935, and in 1930 was twenty-fourth in taxpaying ability.

It has been stated that the oil industry pays 17 cents out of every tax dollar collected.

From the cradle to the grave gasoline accompanies us on our journey through life. It carries our beloved mother to the hospital when we are born. It brings the doctor rushing to her aid. The instruments, medicines, bandages have all been aided in manufacture and in transportation by gasoline. The food we eat at our table, the morning paper, even the clothes we wear owe gasoline a debt in part for their existence. The school bus, the oil heater, the water we use, is frequently brought to our use by gasoline. Coming to work in the morning and going home when the day is done, is the job of gasoline. Even on our holidays, when we load the family into our old car, with mother in the back seat telling us how to drive, it all depends on gasoline. And when life's fitful tale is told, and the cares of a troubled world concern us no more, it will be our faithful friend, gasoline, who will gently take our wearied frame to its last resting place.

In fairness and justice, gasoline should not be burdened any further.

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. WENDELL BERGE

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Wendell Berge delivered last night on radio program sponsored by Veterans of Foreign Wars, Department of Virginia, over station WWDC, Washington, D. C.:

I appreciate the opportunity to speak this evening under the sponsorship of the Veterans of Foreign Wars. I am in full sympathy with the efforts of this organization to rouse Americans to a new sense of national unity in the face of the present crisis. This is a time when we can well afford to take stock of the blessings and advantages of America and to sound a clarion call for their defense.

The defense of America can only be achieved by national unity. However we may differ in political opinions, however divergent our blood, our party interests, our callings, we have this in common: We mean to defend America from tyranny and aggression, and, so far as we can, we mean to hold out a helping hand to others who may be in even more immediate danger than at the moment we find ourselves. We repudiate the ideas of abject or slothful defeatism. We will make our country both safe and strong.

There has come about within the last 2 years a new awareness of the peril that besets democratic institutions the world over, and with it has come a new will and a new determination to defend and preserve our democratic heritage, whatever the cost. While we regret and deplore the necessity for this reawakening, it at least has brought a new faith and a new hope to millions of Americans.

This country during the 1920's enjoyed an illusory prosperity. We intended, during that period, to think largely in terms of profits and dividends, and to take for granted the perpetual security of our political institutions and our traditional way of life. With the increasing emphasis upon material prosperity, some people commenced to scoff at the institutions of free government. If we could have wealth, why should we worry about freedom? The plain and sometimes tedious ways of Main Street became the targets of scorn and ridicule. Some of the newly rich turned their backs on this country and sought residence in foreign lands where they found a life that they thought was more sophisticated and to their liking.

Then came the depression. The illusions vanished. Much of the wealth of those who had put their faith wholly in material things was swept away, and these people who had so misplaced their faith were left with no rock to which they could cling. Some of these people having previously deprecated American institutions, now assumed a defeatist attitude, apparently believing that with the collapse of the stock market in 1929 all of the future was lost for America and its people.

Now, however, with danger staring us in the face, most of those men and women who were floundering have come to a startling realization that our Anglo-American heritage is worth saving, even at the cost of blood. The cynical attitude is rapidly giving way to one of purpose, determination, and confidence. We are at last alive to the need for strengthening our defenses against attack from abroad and our institutions against menaces from within. We are ready to act vigorously, and without stint or limit, to prove by action that the methods of democracy can survive in a struggle with the most direct and ruthless tactics of the totalitarian states.

This new drive to make America strong is manifested in many ways. It is evidenced by the appropriation of billions of dollars for military defense, for enlarging the Army and the Navy, and for building the largest air force in the world. It is evidenced by the prompt and willing response of America's men to the call to serve a period in military training for the national defense. It is being shown by the response of our people to the civilian-defense program.

We hear continually of private citizens and organizations throughout the country that are anxious to have some part in strengthening our defense. Relatively few people, however, can directly participate in military activity, yet millions want to do something worth while for their country. Here in Washington we receive daily inquiries from men and women in all walks of life as to what they might do to be of direct service. Most of these people are not job seekers in the usual sense but men and women who have profitable employment. They somehow have the feeling, however, that their present activity is too far removed from the important events that are taking place. They would like to feel that they are part of this great defense effort.

Of course, it is a mistake for anyone to think that the only place for service is in the Army or the Navy or some Government position. The total effort which this country will contribute must arise way back in the grass roots. Farm laborers, mechanics, the unskilled workers who make the wheels of industry go round, office workers, housewives, citizens in every avenue of life can do their part in their daily occupations, and yet it is understandable that many of these people crave the sense of active participation that comes from doing something special outside the line of their regular endeavor.

This understandable desire can in part be fulfilled through the program now being developed by the Office of Civilian Defense under the direction of Mayor LaGuardia. The program has just been inaugurated and it will take a little time fully to develop the plans, but it is intended to organize various specialized lines of training and work necessary and helpful to the national defense, which can be performed by civilians without withdrawing them from civilian life. This plan should appeal to various private organizations. Veterans, patriotic, fraternal, business, industrial, professional, and labor organizations all over the country will respond to the program of the Office of Civilian Defense. There will be civilian defense jobs outlined for women as well as men. I am not in a position to announce details of the program of the Office of Civilian Defense, but Mayor LaGuardia has assured us that plans for civilian participation in a broad home-defense program are being worked out and will be announced and made effective from time to time. This program warrants universal support, and I am sure will receive it.

One specific thing which can be mentioned with respect to the civilian defense program is the request that has been made to the civilian population to turn over all available old aluminum to the Government. A special Senate committee this last week reported a shortage in aluminum which threatens to curtail aircraft production during the coming year. This regrettable situation, in my judgment, results from the fact that over a period of years we have allowed one company to acquire monopolistic control of the aluminum industry in this country and to control the supply. Without the stimulus of competition there has been insufficient industry expansion. The aluminum monopoly has preferred lower production and a higher margin of profit. The Department of Justice has undertaken to destroy this monopolistic control by an antitrust suit which is now pending.

But the shortage brought about by monopolistic control is already threatening us. Because of this situation we are required to call upon the civilian population to help bridge the gap in order that vital airplane production shall not be curtailed. Mayor LaGuardia on June 24 issued a call for contributions to an "aluminum shower." The aluminum will be collected through State and local officials and defense councils throughout the country. Collections will probably commence late next month. The aggregate of the contributions of old aluminum utensils and other articles, many of which have probably been consigned to attic or cellar storage rooms, should be immensely helpful in offsetting the impending shortage that threatens to slow up aircraft production.

But, apart from the specific and definite activities in which almost every citizen can participate, there is another aspect of our home defense in which every man and woman can play a part. I refer to the influence which each and every one of us can exert upon the public opinion of this country. What we think and say in these times is of utmost importance. Every person in this country can help in his or her own way to combat the flood of un-American and defeatist propaganda that is at large in the land. Most of this propaganda can only be rendered ineffective by the vigorous answers of those of us who see through it.

Most propaganda activities are not illegal as such and could not directly be made so without sacrificing vital constitutional liberties. It is not necessary that we should lose free speech in this country in order to save our democracy. Indeed this is a time when we should vigorously exercise our right of free speech. We should actively exercise our right to make resounding answer to the phony claims of the propagandists who say that democracy is doomed by the "wave of the future." We must proclaim on every permissible occasion the falsity of the assertions of the enemies of our freedom that Hitler only wants peace and would be happy to enter into trade on a basis profitable to us. These claims of the Nazi propagandists are patently false, as has been so ably pointed out by Douglas Miller in his recent book, You Can't Do Business With Hitler.

So, although as a usual thing we cannot prosecute the Nazi propagandist because his activities do not generally violate any law, we can by the energetic exercise of our right of free speech render impotent his activities. What this country needs is not less freedom of speech but more speech by those of us who believe in freedom.

This active counterpropaganda work is, to my mind, one of the most important functions of the millions of Americans who want to play a part in home defense. And we certainly have good cause to dispute the claims of the defeatists. We certainly have good reason to believe in the ultimate triumph of the democracies in this struggle, and to proclaim our belief. The events of the last year should surely give us heart. What a contrast between the outlook today and that of a year ago! A year ago France had just fallen, and responsible prognosticators were predicting the fall of Britain before the summer's end. The land invasion of Britain seemed to be a momentary probability. Italy had just entered the war. Her strength was an unknown quantity, and her complete debacle was certainly unforeseen. Russia was supposed to be collaborating with the Axis and was relied upon ultimately to pull the Axis through any economic crisis that might come. At home we were just started on our major defense effort, and it did not seem that we could possibly make much headway before the freely predicted downfall of Britain occurred.

Now, 1 year later, Britain stands, resolute and defiant, with head bloody but unbowed. Our defense industries have been tooled up to heights of production never before reached in American history. The planes and tanks and other instruments of defense for ourself and Britain are coming out of our factories in ever-increasing volume. We are training the largest peacetime army in history. We have negotiated transfers with Great Britain which give us vital defense bases far out in the Atlantic at various strategic points. Italy has completely collapsed as a factor in the war. And now, Russia, regarded a year ago as a potential ally for Hitler, is facing a Hitler invasion. At least we know that from this time on Russia, with its vast economic resources, will not willingly be at Hitler's disposal. Russia's resistance is greatly to the advantage of Britain and this country. Regardless of the ultimate success or failure of the Russian invasion, it inevitably requires the deflection of Hitler's attack from Britain to Russia. Indeed, it already appears that in the West Britain has attained the mastery of the air.

While it is true that during the last few months the Nazis have conquered a great deal of territory in southeastern Europe, yet the economic life of those countries has been so seriously disrupted that it is highly questionable whether the territory conquered in southeastern Europe to date will be of any great military advantage.

Throughout it all this fact must be kept in mind: That with each new conquest Hitler has assumed control of masses of sullen and resentful people who hate him and his invading armies. He has gained the enmity of millions of people and the real friendship of none. This is not a promising set-up for the successful future or the permanence of Hitler's "new order."

So there are many reasons why we can face the future with hope and confidence, but the drive which will keep this country going must come from the people themselves. It is the people of America who will determine the future of democracy in the world.

We are doing all we can here in the Government. As head of the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice I have daily occasion to observe the operation and effect of the laws which have been promulgated for the national defense. Against those relatively few people, both citizens and aliens, who are working illegally against the interests of this country we are instituting criminal prosecutions. We have, of course, an active, efficient, Intelligence Service in the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Army, Navy, and Treasury Intelligence Services. These organizations are daily on the job of investigating the various forms of subversive activity in this country. Illegal activities of this nature are being vigorously prosecuted under the direction and supervision of the Criminal Division.

Only yesterday announcement was made of impending prosecution in St. Paul, Minn., of leaders of the Socialist Workers' Party, the Trotskyite branch of the Communist movement. These persons will be prosecuted on charges that they are engaged in seditious conspiracy and that they advocate the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force and violence. Presentation of the case to the grand jury will commence day after tomorrow. This prosecution, which was authorized by Acting Attorney General Francis Biddle, will reveal the activities of members of an organization which by its own declaration of principles "will advocate the continuance of the class struggle" during any war in which the United States might engage, "regardless of the consequences or the outcome of the American military struggle, and will try to prepare the masses to utilize the war crisis for the overthrow of United States capitalism and the victory of socialism." Acting Attorney General Biddle stated in announcing this prosecution that "it represents * * * the determination of the Department of Justice to prosecute criminal subversive activity wherever it may occur."

Yet another problem which falls to the Department of Justice is that of our alien population. Most of our alien population is loyal and cooperative, and it would be a gross error if in misguided patriotic zeal we were to deny to the millions of law-abiding aliens in our midst the opportunity to help in our defense effort and to contribute their part to our national life. On the other hand, there are some aliens who are in this country illegally and others who have shown that they are not fitted for the responsibilities of American life. Appropriate action must be taken against aliens of this class. Our machinery for deportation cannot effectively deal with the problem of the subversive alien because of the fact that there are very few countries to which deportation is any longer physically possible. New legislation is needed which will enable us to deal with aliens in an effective and realistic way, and a bill is presently pending before Congress, known as the Hobbs bill, which the Department of Justice believes should be enacted immediately in order to give us powers to cope more effectively with our alien problems.

There are a multitude of activities of the Department of Justice which are part and parcel of the national-defense program, and which I would be glad to discuss if there were time. But I am not here this evening primarily to discuss departmental activities. The principal thought that I want to leave with you is that each of us, regardless of occupation, regardless of capacity to perform direct contributions to the military or economic defense program, can contribute a vital and important part in building up and sustaining the national will. And I believe that when this great country has attained substantial unity in purpose and determination, it is unbeatable on any front. In the words of Winston Churchill, that great leader who has done so much to sustain the democratic forces of the world:

"Dictatorship—the fetish worship of one man—is a passing phase. A state of society where men may not speak their minds, where children denounce their parents to the police, where a businessman or small shopkeeper ruins his competitor by telling tales about his private opinions—such a state of society cannot long endure if brought into contact with the healthy outside world. The light of civilized progress with its tolerances and cooperation, with its dignities and joys, has often in the past been blotted out. But I hold the belief that we have now at last got far enough ahead of barbarism to control it, and to avert it, if only we realize what is afoot and make up our minds in time. We shall do it in the end. But how much harder our toil for every day's delay!

"Is this a call to war? Does anyone pretend that preparation for resistance to aggression is unleashing war? I declare it to be the sole guaranty of peace. We need the swift gathering of forces to confront not only military but moral aggression; the resolute and sober acceptance of their duty by the English-speaking people and by all the nations, great and small, who wish to walk with them. Their faithful and zealous comradeship would almost between night and morning clear the path of progress and banish from all our lives the fear which already darkens the sunlight to hundreds of millions of men."

Our National Defense—Still on Order

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, on one major goal the entire United States of America is agreed. We must have the strongest military and naval force anywhere on the face of the globe. Whatever may be our differences of viewpoint on a thousand and one other matters of policy, we are united in our determination to build for defense. This united determination will not be satisfied with anything less than maximum performance.

But what is the record? How have we utilized the tremendous productive capacity of our industrial plant? Have we used the time at our disposal advantageously? Have we built the armed forces of our country to a satisfactory stage of development in the last year?

The answers are disappointing. In the last year, our armament output has equaled less in material results than Europe produces in 2 months. Our year's production of military supplies equals what England, besieged and battered by war, turns out in only 3 months. Our requirements in ships, airplanes, tanks, ammunition, rifles, machine guns are tremendous. With the single exception of planes, our production is comparatively insignificant.

Congress has authorized huge expenditures. Our Government has at its disposal $45,000,000,000 for armament purposes. The sum is regarded as sufficient to build a two-ocean navy, to purchase full equipment for 1,500,000 men in the field, and to supply Britain with many of her needs. Of this sum of $45,000,000,000 the Army, Navy, and British purchasing commissions have placed contracts totaling $18,000,000,000. American industry has turned $7,000,000,000 of these orders into actual materials of war.

How much of these $7,000,000,000 went into the manufacture of weapons? The figures tell us that only $3,000,000,000 worth of military aircraft, guns, ammunition, tanks, and ships have been built. The other $4,000,000,000 were spent to erect camps, to furnish clothing, to provide food, and to do the thousand and one other things necessary for the creation of a preparedness program.

Only by actual comparisons can we realize the inconsequential size of this effort. Our own Government officials calculate the present output of European war industry at the figure of $2,000,000,000 per month, or $24,000,000,000 a year. The British Empire is turning out war supplies at a rate believed to be worth

$1,000,000,000 monthly. We are doing less than half as well, with a productive capacity of at least five times as much.

What all this means to the United States is all too easy to discern. Our defense today is still on order. We are lagging far behind in the competitive race for rearmament which has swept across the world. Our Government experts had predicted an all-out drive in arms production for June. Now it has been postponed until October or November.

Perhaps the most critical single weapon in modern warfare is the airplane. We have concentrated on plane production as the No. 1 necessity in the last year. In 12 months' time our factories have built 10,500 planes, one-half of them equipped for fighting service and the remainder usable for training. The speed-up here is impressive.

But even here, Nazi Germany is outdistancing us. Our Army and Navy together have some 8,000 planes, including trainers, fighters, and bombers. Germany is reported to have more than 20,000 aircraft of all types, and the Nazi rate of production is flowing along evenly while we are making desperate efforts to catch up. But catching up will not be nearly enough. Our rate of manufacture must exceed anything of which Germany is capable to satisfy the needs and the demands of the American people. We have just decided to develop a program of long-range bomber construction. It will be at least 2 years before this program begins to achieve tangible results.

In still other areas of preparedness, the record is no less discouraging. In the last 12 months, the combined energies of every American enterprise dealing with the building of cargo ships produced little more than $800,000,000 worth of shipping. Merchant ships may play a critical role in the ultimate outcome of this war. But the number of ships built is most unimpressive in comparison with the monthly records of tonnage being destroyed by Axis submarines, airplanes, and surface craft. To date, we have planned the building of 442 ships, but the first ships scheduled for delivery will not be ready until November. The big years are still far behind the hills in 1942 and 1943.

The figures of our naval-building program are regarded as more satisfactory, but no details are offered by our Government to substantiate this optimism. We know that some launchings have taken place ahead of schedule, but we do not know how heavily armored our new fighting craft may be. We do not know what new materials have been used to furnish protection from air attack and from bomb splinters.

Our development of an adequate defense machinery for tanks, guns, and ammunition is of no less importance than the production of our air fleet. In the last year we have begun to realize the difficulties in the way of ordnance manufacture. We are producing light tanks at the rate of 450 per month. This will give us 5,400 a year, but our goal is listed at 30,000. To get them will take more than 5 years. We have laid plans to build medium-weight tanks, but these will start rolling out of factories no sooner than the fall of this year. Our 80-ton tanks are still in the talking stage.

In New York City people are thinking in terms of air defense. But there are few if any new antiaircraft guns available to defend the world's greatest city. What are we waiting for? In the light of British experience, with the city of London a scene of devastation, antiaircraft preparation should stand high on the list of American priorities. The best inventive minds in our country should be turning their attention toward the prevention of air raids.

The entire defense picture is still in the sketching stage after 2 years of conversation. The famous howitzers so useful in the World War are practically nonexistent in the United States Army. Our production of powder is still described as a bottleneck item. For the tanks we are building there are not enough shells available or in production.

These are the facts. They reveal shortages in our equipment for defense which cannot be ignored without danger to the Republic. The administration has asked virtually unlimited authority to deal with our defense program. It has requested huge congressional appropriations. They have been voted. The responsibility for our long delays can be squarely fixed. It lies at the door of the national administration.

We have given complete and wholehearted support to the Government in every defense plan it has formulated. We deserve better results. We must have them speedily if our program is to succeed.

Resignation of Public Utility Commissioner Richard J. Beamish From Pennsylvania Bar Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 30 (legislative day of Thursday, June 26), 1941

LETTER FROM HON. RICHARD J. BEAMISH

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter written by Hon. Richard J. Beamish, member of the Public Utilities Commission of the State of Pennsylvania, to Hon. William M. Hargest, president of the Pennsylvania Bar Association.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HARRISBURG, June 26, 1941.

Hon. WILLIAM M. HARGEST,
President, Pennsylvania Bar Association, Bedford Springs, Bedford, Pa.

MY DEAR JUDGE HARGEST: I am herewith tendering my resignation as a member of the Pennsylvania Bar Association.

My resignation is intended as a protest against the address delivered by you on Wednesday, June 25, as president of the Pennsylvania Bar Association before the annual meeting of that body. Your address was a direct and indiscriminating attack upon all Federal administrative processes and also against the administrative bodies of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, when, after attacking Federal bodies, you said the Pennsylvania situation "is little better."

Your violent and partisan attack derives added significance when it comes from you, the president judge of a special court which by statute has been created to review cases coming from Pennsylvania administrative bodies.

Let me call to your attention and to the members of the Pennsylvania Bar Association who goosestep behind you that the Federal and State administrative agencies have been created by Congress and by the several States legislatures because of the delays and judicial malpractices arising in the courts of law.

These administrative agencies had their birth in England after Dickens, who you will recall was a court reporter, blasted the courts of law over and over again and particularly in his description of the delays and injustices that arose in Jarndyce v. Jarndyce.

You, my dear Judge Hargest, are woefully behind the times. You are attempting, you and your battalion of old-guard utility lawyers to lead the people of America back into the fogs of yesteryear. You do not realize that gone forever are the days when utility companies of high and low degree could prevent justice to the people through delays in the courts. We now have in the administrative agencies power to impose temporary rates upon companies that seek to delay justice to consumers. Through the Federal Reserve Board banking has been stabilized, through the insurance clauses of the National Banking Act deposits are secure, through the Interstate Commerce Commission rebating by railroads and chiseling by truck companies have been curbed, through the Securities and Exchange Commission Wall Street has been harnessed and piratical holding companies are being curbed, through the Federal Communications Commission extortionate telephone rates have been lowered, through the Federal Power Commission cooperating with the Pennsylvania Public Utility Commission the manipulations of Hopson and his gang have been exposed and their practices abolished. You pass over all the good that has been accomplished by these agencies to take a crack at young lawyers who are being used as examiners in investigations by these bodies. Let me tell you, Judge Hargest, the hope of the legal profession and of the courts is in this body of young lawyers whom you scorn. The day will come when they will stuff judicial reactionaries like you and put them on display in museums of legal antiquities.

You reserve the maximum of your spleen for the National Labor Relations Board and there you reveal why this drive against administrative processes has been set in motion. You don't like the entrance of government in cases affecting labor. Here again Judge Hargest you are late, much too late.

Henry Ford, arch foe of organized labor, has signed on the dotted line, but you catch up the torch that he has dropped and rally reactionary members of the Pennsylvania bar to attempt to fill the breach. You can't do it, Judge Hargest. A mouse can't fill the hole where an elephant once stood.

It is a matter of national congratulations that all judges do not believe as you do. I direct your attention to the unanimous approval from coast to coast when President Roosevelt named as Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court that real judge, Harlan Fiske Stone. Not once but repeatedly, he has championed administrative agencies and the actions of Congress in creating these agencies. You are not too old, Judge Hargest, for lessons in law from a great judge.

When you make your broadside attack upon administrative bodies you attempt to blacken the actions and records of the leaders in these administrative efforts. The foremost influence in this country in regulation through administration is the Honorable Robert E. Healy, of Vermont, a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission. As counsel to the Federal Trade Commission, he exposed the evil practices of holding companies, and through his influence the Federal Power Commission, the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Federal Communications Commission, and other Federal bodies have been established.

Judge Healy in usefulness to the American people is as far above any person enlisted in the drive against administrative bodies as Mount Everest is above a rat hole. I would bracket his name with that of Chief Justice Stone in forecasting a new day in the cooperation of administrative regulation and legal interpretation.

I am writing this as one plain citizen to another, because you have stepped down from the bench to lead a partisan movement, from which I dissent.

My resignation is the culmination of that dissent.

Sincerely yours,

RICHARD J. BEAMISH,
Commissioner.

The Late Brig. Gen. William Mitchell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 30 (legislative day of Thursday, June 26), 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE WASHINGTON SUNDAY STAR

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article printed in yesterday's Washington Star relative to the late "Billy" Mitchell's theories now being taken seriously. The title of the article is "Prophet—Not Without Honor."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROPHET—NOT WITHOUT HONOR—LATE BILLY MITCHELL'S THEORIES NOW BEING TAKEN SERIOUSLY

(By Richard L. Stokes)

Under congressional pressure in behalf of the late Brig. Gen. Billy Mitchell's pet scheme, the establishment of a separate air arm, Secretary of War Stimson on June 20 ordered the creation of a unit called the Army Air Forces and embracing all military aviation in a single unified organization. It will have a semi-independent status, like that of the Marine Corps in the Navy. Although the Army compromised, the Navy is continuing an all-out fight against the McCarran bill to separate the air forces from the old line services, on the ground that it had as lief be robbed of its destroyers and submarines as be deprived of its own aviation.

While American air chiefs are struggling today with problems which General Mitchell besought them in vain to face 20 years ago, belated honors are beginning to be paid to his memory. A new airport at Milwaukee, in his home State of Wisconsin, is to be named Mitchell Field. But this is a commercial and not an Army port.

And it is interesting to note that one of General Mitchell's chief defenders at the famous court martial in 1925 was the airman who has just been elevated to Chief of the Army Air Forces—Maj. Gen. Henry H. Arnold.

He was then Major Arnold. Taking the witness stand in behalf of General Mitchell, he testified that of 517 officers and men killed between January 1, 1919, and July 30, 1925, 507 met their deaths in obsolete planes.

PURSUIT PLANES DECLARED UNFIT

Another high-ranking air officer, Brig. Gen. Carl Spaatz, Assistant Chief of the Army Air Corps, who was then a major, told the court the Army did not possess a single pursuit plane fit for war and the pursuit squadron had no range for gunnery practice.

What has become of the judges, prosecutors, and other witnesses who took part in the trial and conviction of General Mitchell, then Assistant Chief of the Air Service? To what extent do any of these men now hold positions in which they have authority to influence the course of national defense?

Though General Mitchell died 5 years ago, and though the sessions of the court, being public, were copiously described in the press, records in the case are still withheld as confidential by the office of the Judge Advocate General. In consequence, the present article is based to some extent on newspaper reports. Should injustice unwittingly be done, it may be charged to the writer's inability to gain access to official documents. The findings, on the best information available, are given herewith.

Of 10 officers who sat on the famous tribunal, 5 are dead. The others have retired, the last in 1934, and none has been recalled to active duty. One of their number, however, Gen. Douglas MacArthur, who served as Chief of Staff from 1930 to 1934, is field marshal of the native army which the Philippine Government is training in preparation for independence. As such, in case of war with Japan, he might play a stellar role in the defense of the islands.

GULLION, JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL

Maj. Allen W. Gullion, who was Mitchell's chief prosecutor, is today Maj. Gen. Gullion, Judge Advocate General, in supreme charge of the administration of military justice.

Army and Navy officers who testified against General Mitchell, and in that degree contributed to his overthrow, include the following survivors with their present rank and posts:

Lt. Gen. Lesley J. McNair, Chief of Staff, General Headquarters; reputed "brains" of the Army.

Lt. Gen. Hugh A. Drum, commanding the First Army, Governors Island, N. Y.

Maj. Gen. George V. Strong, commanding the Eighth Army Corps, Brownwood, Tex.

Brig. Gen. Francis B. Wilby, commanding the First Corps Area, Boston.

Col. Jarvis J. Bain, staff officer, Second Army, Memphis.

Capt. John T. G. Stapler, Chief of Staff and aide to the commandant, Third Naval District, New York.

Capt. Kenneth Whiting, general inspector of naval aircraft, eastern division, New York.

Capt. Holden C. Richardson, in charge of litigation, Bureau of Aeronautics, Navy Department.

Commander Frederick W. Pennoyer, Jr., commanding the support force Atlantic Fleet.

Apparently no officers of the Navy appeared in General Mitchell's defense. On the other hand, several young military flyers boldly risked jobs and careers, defied the caste then ruling the Army and testified publicly in his behalf. Among such champions were the following, with their rank today:

Major General Arnold.

Maj. Gen. Gerald C. Brant, commanding the Gulf Coast Training Center, Randolph Field, Tex.

Maj. Gen. John F. Curry, commanding the Second Air Force, Spokane.

Brigadier General Spaatz.

Col. Frank M. Kennedy, Chief of Building and Grounds Division, Air Corps office, War Department.

Lt. Col. Harold L. George, executive officer, Headquarters Squadron, Second Bombardment Wing, Langley Field, Va.

An enthusiastic witness for General Mitchell was Representative Fiorello La Guardia, now mayor of New York and director of the Office of Civilian Defense. Mr. La Guardia himself had been a major in the American Flying Force during the World War, and taken part in night and day bombing excursions on the Italian front.

SUMMERALL WITHDREW

The senior Army dignitary called to the stand by the prosecution was Maj. Gen. Charles P. Summerall, who a year later became Chief of Staff, organized the country's first mechanized unit, retired in 1931, and is now president of The Citadel, South Carolina's military college at Charleston. His emergence in the role of partisan witness excited comment at the time because he had been slated to preside over the court martial. He withdrew as soon as the proceedings started on being challenged by the defense for "prejudice and bias."

Other big wigs of the Army who testified against General Mitchell included Maj. Gen. Frank W. Coe, Chief of Coast Artillery, and Maj. Gen. William J. Snow, Chief of Field Artillery. They retired, respectively, in 1926 and 1927. As a writer in service journals, General Snow still exerts influence on the policies of his arm. A witness for the prosecution who was destined to become Chief of Naval Operations was Rear Admiral William V. Pratt. He retired in 1938 with the rank of admiral, and at present is a naval writer and radio commentator.

By order of Dwight F. Davis, of St. Louis, who succeeded John W. Weeks as Secretary of War on October 14, 1925, 1 law and 12 general officers were designated as judges on October 20 to try General Mitchell on a charge, with 8 specifications, of conduct prejudicial to military discipline and tending to bring discredit on the military service.

SLADEN DISQUALIFIED

The defense used its single peremptory challenge to disqualify Maj. Gen. Fred W. Sladen, Superintendent of West Point. Like General Summerall, Maj. Gen. Albert C. Bowley, commanding Fort Bragg, N. C., withdrew when challenged for "prejudice and bias." The court, as finally organized, was composed as follows: Maj. Gen. Robert Lee Howze, president; Major Generals MacArthur, William S. Graves, and Benjamin A Poore; Brig. Gens. Edward L. King, Frank R McCoy, Edwin B. Winans, George Le R. Irwin, and Ewing E. Booth; and Col. Blanton Winship, law member, from the Judge Advocate General's office.

Howze, Graves, Poore, King, and Irwin are dead. All the surviving brigadier generals were promoted to major generals before retirement. The same rank, third highest in the Army, was later bestowed on Colonel Winship, who retired in 1933. But Col. Herbert A. White, assigned by the Judge Advocate General to defend General Mitchell, was still a colonel when placed on the inactive list some years afterward.

Since the verdict was decided by secret ballot, all that can be known is that at least seven of the judges held General Mitchell to be guilty. In a court martial not involving capital punishment or imprisonment for more than 10 years, a two-thirds vote is enough for conviction. Four ballots, therefore, would have acquitted the defendant. As chief counsel, General Mitchell chose a civilian, Representative Frank R. Reid, Republican, of Illinois, who resigned from Congress in 1934. A passage during cross-examination of the defendant almost led to a mistrial. General King, in an audible aside to Colonel Winship, made the comment, "Damn rot." The incident was closed when General King was induced to apologize.

HEARINGS LASTED 2 MONTHS

The hearings, which opened in Washington on October 28 and concluded 2 months later with a verdict of guilty on all specifications, brought an end, after 24 years of service, to one of the most colorful careers in the Army's history. The son of Senator John L. Mitchell, of Wisconsin, William Mitchell was born December 29, 1879, at Nice, France. He entered military life by enlisting as a private in 1898, and became the youngest officer in the Spanish-American War, the first American officer under fire in the World War and the first flying officer of the United States Army to cross the German lines, on April 22, 1917. Through eminent gallantry he won the Distinguished Service Cross, Distinguished Service Medal, and Croix de Guerre with five palms. He was made commander of the Legion of Honor and companion of the Order of St. Michael and St. George.

His progress was such that he became commander of the Air Service Group of the American Expeditionary Force, serving throughout the campaign in France and leading the aviation of the Army of Occupation into Germany. In 1919 he was appointed Director of Military Aeronautics; in 1920, Chief of Training and Operations; and, in 1921, Assistant Chief of the Air Service.

General Mitchell expressed his convictions on the flyleaf of a book called Skyways. It was dedicated to the author's young son and daughter, "who in their lifetime will see aeronautics become the greatest and principal means of national defense." This belief was coupled with advocacy of a cabinet department of defense, embracing Army, Navy, and air force as equal and separate components.

CONTROVERSY INTENSIFIED

With a zeal that with time grew embittered and intemperate, General Mitchell preached to deaf ears all the lessons as to the role of air power which have startled the globe in the present war. But he was a prophet without honor in his own service. The controversy was intensified rather than appeased when he won permission in 1920 to bomb several former German warships off the Virginia Capes.

The destroyers were sunk with ease, but a light cruiser, the Friedrichshafen, and a 26,000-ton battleship, Aus Friesland, remained afloat after days of bombing, though their decks were awash almost ankle deep. Finally, by accident, it was claimed, an Army flyer dropped a 600-pound bomb 100 feet from the battleship's starboard bow. It exploded underwater, like a torpedo, and the vessel went to the bottom. The cruiser was then dispatched by the same means. This experiment established, General Mitchell argued, that any battleship could be sunk from the air. It proved just the contrary, according to naval authorities, and so the debate has raged to this day.

In the early part of 1925 General Mitchell gave acrimonious testimony before a congressional committee as to the folly of Army "brass hats" in opposing extension of the air arm. Secretary of War Weeks, in a letter to President Coolidge, recommended that the disturber should not be reappointed as Assistant Chief of the Air Service. His name was not submitted to the Senate. General Mitchell reverted to his regular rank of colonel and was "buried" at the air center in San Antonio.

AROUSED BY "SHENANDOAH" WRECK

Smarting under this disgrace, he was aroused to fury by the wreck of the naval airship Shenandoah, with a loss of 14 lives. Calling in reporters, he issued a statement on September 5 making deadly charges, but also bristling with recriminations so insubordinate that many believed he had determined to blazon his cause to the four corners of the Nation by making himself a public martyr. This accident, he declared, was a direct result of "incompetence, criminal negligence, and almost treasonable administration of national defense by the War and Navy Departments."

When threats of discipline answered him from Washington, General Mitchell put out a second statement on September 9, more unrestrained than the first, in which he announced: "What I have said about the conditions of our national defense hurts the bureaucrats in Washington. It ought to hurt them, because it is true." He added that "Our pilots know they are going to be killed if they stay in the service in the old flaming coffins we are still flying."

On account of General Mitchell's World War record the court martial returned what it described as a "lenient" verdict. He was merely stripped of rank, command, and duty, with forfeiture of all pay and allowances for 5 years. President Coolidge approved the sentence, with some modification of the forfeiture penalties, on the ground that General Mitchell's utterances "could not be construed otherwise than as breathing defiance to his military superiors." General Mitchell resigned from the Army February 1, 1926, retired to a stock farm in Virginia, and died suddenly on February 19, 1936.

Ex-President Hoover's Call to American Reason

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. VORYS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. HERBERT HOOVER

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the full text of the great radio address delivered by former President Herbert Hoover entitled "A Call to American Reason," on June 29, 1941, from Chicago, Ill.:

A CALL TO AMERICAN REASON

Six weeks ago I made a statement to the American people upon the relation of the United States to this war.

That address has received large approval. It has naturally been disliked by the extremists. That is the psychosis of war. That disease has two outstanding symptoms. Those who catch it lose their reason in the fever of emotion. And in that fever intolerance rises to a pitch where it seeks to frighten men from free speech by defamation.

Since making that address four momentous events have happened which greatly change the shape of things. They must be incorporated in American thinking. There is the war between Hitler and Stalin. There is the final proof that in certain vital circumstances air power is ascendant over sea power. There are the provocative actions in the sinking of the Robin Moor. Propaganda of fear or hate to force us into war has been intensified. It comes from foreign sources, from Cabinet officers, and American organizations. They urge step after step of executive action which would drag us into undeclared war.

There are those who argue that we are already in this war. The Constitution of the United States provides that Congress has the sole authority to declare war. It is equally their responsibility to see that this country does not go to war until they have authorized it.

The only reason for not submitting the matter to the Congress would be that Congress could not be trusted. Or that the people, through them, should not be allowed a voice. No President in a democracy should take that responsibility, for there will be no unity of spirit in an executive war. If Congress decides to go to war, then we willingly give all and we willingly surrender all our freedoms necessary to win that war. And until Congress shall by constitutional action declare war, no man in America may demand the end of debate on this issue of peace or war.

In these 6 weeks, opposition against joining in this war has grown stronger in the American people. Yet we have moved officially nearer to war. And let me say at once that President Roosevelt has held steadfast to his promises not to send "our Army, Navy, or air forces to fight in foreign lands outside America except in case of attack." We have not yet taken the irretrievable step into war by firing a gun.

The arguments given for our joining in this war during the past weeks have crystallized into seven categories. The first is that it would more greatly aid Britain if we go into the shooting stage of the war than for us to remain as an arsenal. The second is that Hitler means to attack the Americas and we should attack first. The third is that the American mission of freedom requires we destroy these totalitarian ideologies and impose the four freedoms on other nations. The fourth is that a free America cannot live in the same world with dictatorships. The fifth is that our economic future will be destroyed. The sixth is that the sinking of the Robin Moor constitutes an attack on the United States which requires war. And the seventh is that we must go to war to impose permanent peace on the world.

The American people should weigh wars just as they would weigh any other issue. They should weigh them on the realistic scales of benefits and losses, both material and spiritual.

No man can tell what the kaleidoscopic changes in this appalling situation may be. We must constantly reappraise its dangers. The constant question is what we should do now. But there are certain courses of practical statesmanship; there are certain eternal principles to which we must adhere. There are certain consequences to America and civilization which we must ever keep before our eyes.

I shall speak again without emphasizing the emotion that arises within me when the whole destiny of my country is imperiled. I can hope to appeal only to reasoning people. And it is cold reason, not eloquence, that America needs today.

AID TO BRITAIN

I shall first weigh the problem of aid to Britain before I deal with the other arguments.

In my last address I insisted that we could give Britain more aid if we stayed out of the war. I suggested that until our production increases we should scrape the bottom of the barrel. That would be more than she now receives. I stated that if we join the war we must retain a larger part of our production for our own immediate defense. Thus Britain would get less than she does now.

To prevent these supplies being sunk I proposed we hand over to Britain the same convoy warships that we would use if we joined the war. If she operated them, it would do her as much good as if we do it.

The recommendations were based upon just plain mathematics of what would get the most supplies to Britain—not emotional dialectics.

The bomber planes which Britain wants so badly are flown over the Atlantic and therefore are not sunk by submarines. The figures now disclosed by the Maritime Commission, the Government departments, the Red Cross, all of them, show that less than 4 percent of the supplies shipped from American ports to Britain have been sunk.

These percentages of loss could become very much larger and still the net supplies to Britain would be greater by our staying out of war.

Furthermore, many of these ships are being sunk from the air. No amount of American naval protection could stop that.

There is also the problem of Japan. We must not forget that she is under contract to Hitler to attack us of we join in this war. For her to enter would be a disaster to Britain in two ways. She would cover the seven seas with raiders sinking more British supplies. And we would need at once to retain all the air power and ships we can produce to protect our own coasts and to drive her off the seas.

In view of these disclosures and these reasons, the answer to those who argue that it would aid Britain for us to join this war is that it would do her more harm than good.

Let me add a word upon Britain's magnificent defense to those who say Britain is lost. She has not lost a square yard of her empire. She has managed to maintain an extraordinary portion of her exports of manufactured goods over the seven seas with all the labor and raw materials that implies. She still draws a large part of her food supplies by long voyages to the Southern Hemisphere. She has apparently not found the need to concentrate her life line on North America, which was done to economize shipping in the last war. She is by no means in the extremity of a siege. The war between Hitler and Stalin relieves her of immediate pressures.

REVOLUTION IN MILITARY POWERS

Before I apply the weights of realism to the other arguments for our joining this war we must take account of military developments in the war itself. They profoundly affect America's relation to this war.

It is more than ever evident that there has been a shift in the relative strength of military power just as revolutionary as was the invention of gunpowder to armored knights of old.

Comparatively small mechanized armies are now dominant over fortifications and mass armies. Air power has now demonstrated its superiority over sea power in certain circumstances.

During the past 6 weeks the Bismarck, a first-class battleship, was first crippled from the air. In the battle of Crete the British were forced to withdraw their naval forces in the face of air attacks from nearby land bases, with the loss of four cruisers and several destroyers. Other warships have been put out of action in the last month from the air by both British and Germans.

One result of this shift has been to assure a sort of zone around the shores of nations where bombing airplanes render attack by naval vessels very much more difficult and often impossible. The shift has added greatly to the powers of American defense.

Hitler today occupies or controls all the Continent of Europe outside Russia. Unlike the last war, there is no arena of land operations. His whole strength would need to be met on the beach somewhere. And he controls every mile of the beach.

Japan is still under agreement to attack us if we join the war. She becomes far more potent to destroy our interests in the Pacific the moment we become engaged in the Atlantic.

It is too early to forecast the military consequences of the inclusion of Russia in the war. It does not seem likely that it will bring the end any nearer.

CAN AMERICA BE CONQUERED?

With these weights we can examine the second argument for joining this war. That argument is that Hitler will eventually make a military conquest of the Western Hemisphere, and we better attack first. There are two questions here. First, can Amedica be conquered; and, second, can we conquer the Axis?

The Atlantic Ocean is still 3,000 miles wide. For either the United States or Germany to gain victory gigantic armadas of warships and transports must be set afloat. Enormous armies must be transported all at once and ready for attack on the beach on either side. Neither enough warships nor transports exist today to do that from either side. It would take 10 years to prepare. These armadas could be protected by air power only in the first part of their journey. And then naval power becomes effective. When they get closer to the shore air power comes into action. And it is now demonstrated that enough air power is almost complete defense against surface ships. And after that there must be the battle on the beach. England can prevent Hitler's crossing even 25 miles of water.

Those who assert that the Germans might capture and use the British Navy against us must now recognize that the proved vulnerability of warships from bombing planes removes most of that argument.

There is no important military man who tells me that we and Britain combined could, short of long years, prepare, transport, and land enough men or machines in Europe to overcome Axis land and air power. And not a military man of substance believes the Axis could do it to us.

There is here also the element of Japan. She is 6,000 miles away from continental United States, and conclusive grip at each other's throat is even more improbable.

Even with the development of long-range planes, the Germans or Japanese cannot make an effective air attack upon us. They could do some terrorization. But that does not win wars. Certainly, after the exhaustion of this war, the Nazis are not coming for a long time. If we are prepared, they won't think of coming.

In any event, the answer to the argument that we may be conquered by the Axis is simply that, if we prepare, America cannot be brought to subjection by any combination of military power.

As relative military power stands today, there appears no method of bringing this war to a conclusion except by years and years of destruction and exhaustion. Sea power is ineffective through blockade to bring conclusion because Hitler has supplies of food and raw material or is on the way to get them. Britain has the seven seas open. Armies cannot be effectively landed across water against air power. The defenses against daylight attack precludes the destruction of munitions works and thus manufacture goes on. The night air raids reduce cities to rubble and kill civilians, but that does not bring the war to conclusion. The end of stalemate becomes part a question of morale and stamina.

If we enter such a war we only increase the moral and economic wastage of the world. If we stay out, we preserve much for the reconstruction of the world.

And in considering all the possibilities if we go to war, we must contemplate that the British might not be able to hold out during the long years that this war would need go on. Then we would be left with no possibility of bringing the war to conclusion except by a compromise peace.

IMPOSING THE "FOUR FREEDOMS"

The third argument of those who would have us join in this war is that we must destroy the whole dictator ideology and impose the "four freedoms" on other nations.

That is, we must go to war to impose the ideals of democracy against the ideals of despotism. That is an ideological war. It is an ancient holy war. We may weigh it in both the scales of American idealism and the scales of realistic practicality.

WHAT OF RUSSIA?

In the last 7 days that call to sacrifice American boys for an ideal has been made as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal. For now we find ourselves promising aid to Stalin and his militant Communist conspiracy against the whole democratic ideals of the world. Collaboration between Britain and Russia will bring them military values, but it makes the whole argument of our joining the war to bring the "four freedoms" to mankind a Gargantuan jest. We had better refresh our memories a little.

Four American Presidents and four Secretaries of State, beginning with Woodrow Wilson, refused to have anything to do with Soviet Russia on the ground of morals and democratic ideals. They even refused diplomatic recognition. They did so because here is one of the bloodiest tyrannies and terrors ever erected in history. It destroyed every semblance of human rights and human liberty; it is a militant destroyer of the worship of God; it brutally executes millions of innocent people without the semblance of justice; it has enslaved the rest. Moreover, it has violated every international covenant; it has carried on a world conspiracy against all democracy, including the United States. And do I need to prove that it continued doing this down to 7 days ago?

When Russia was recognized by the United States in 1933, the Soviet entered into a solemn agreement that they would refrain from any propaganda, any organization, or in any way whatsoever to injure the tranquillity, prosperity, order, or security in any part of the United States.

Seven years later the Dies committee reported unanimously and specifically that the Communist Party in the United States is a Moscow conspiracy, masked as a political party; that its activities constitute a violation of the Treaty of Recognition; that under instructions from Moscow the Communists had violated the laws of the United States; that throughout the entire time they had been supplied with funds from Moscow for activities against the American people and the American Government. The Dies committee only confirmed what most Americans already know. Is the word of Stalin any better than the word of Hitler?

On August 22, 1939, Stalin entered into an agreement with Hitler through which there should be joint onslaught on the democracies of the world. Nine days later Stalin attacked the Poles jointly with Hitler and destroyed the freedom of a great and democratic people. Fourteen days later Stalin destroyed the independence of democratic Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia. Ninety days later on came the unprovoked attack by Russia on democratic Finland. Is that not aggression, and is not every case a hideous violation of treaties and international law?

Stalin has taken advantage of the very freedoms of democracy to destroy them with the most potent "fifth column" in all history. He contributed to the destruction of France. He has daily implanted class hate in America and a stealthy war against our institutions.

In these last weeks it is declared not only by public officials but by labor leaders themselves that the strikes which hamstring the defense of the United States have been Communist conspiracies. Thus Russia has continued her mission of destroying our democracy down to last week.

We know also Hitler's hideous record of brutality, of aggression, and as a destroyer of democracies. Truly Poland, Norway, Holland, Belgium, Denmark, France, and the others are dreadful monuments. But I am talking of Stalin at this moment.

One of the real compensations America received for our enormous sacrifices in the last war was from the large part we played in establishing the democracies of Finland, Poland, Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. We nursed them in their infancy. We spent hundreds of millions to help them grow to manhood. Does America feel quite right about aiding Stalin to hold his enslavement of them? That is where power politics has carried us. No doubt we will make good our promise to aid Russia. But the ideological war to bring the four freedoms to the world died spiritually when we made that promise.

If we go further and join the war and we win, then we have won for Stalin the grip of communism on Russia and more opportunity for it to extend in the world. We should at least cease to tell our sons that they would be giving their lives to restore democracy and freedom to the world.

And American ideals of humanity and Christianity have received another shock from this war. That is the food blockade on 80,000,000 people in the occupied democracies. Even an experiment to prove whether or not the children could be fed without advantage to the enemy was denied. Millions of them who have sacrificed everything on the altar of democracy are condemned to die. The denial of food to the children of allies is a weapon of this war. If we enter this war we subscribe to it. Then we have taken that blot on our own national soul.

Now let us explore the practical side of an ideological war. I agree that the world would be vastly better if the whole totalitarian idea were extirpated. But those who still cling to this as the mission of America should ask realistically how much of a job it is, especially in the face of this revolution in military weapons and this actual military situation.

Such a war means that Hitler must be defeated; it means Mussolini must be defeated; it means the war party in Japan must be defeated; it means that Turkey, Spain, and Portugal must be defeated; it means that unless Hitler first disposes of Stalin we must defeat him also. Does any sane person believe that by military means we can defeat two-thirds of the military power of the whole world in even years and years? It would be another children's crusade.

We cannot slay an idea or an ideology with machine guns. Ideas live in men's minds in spite of military defeat. They live until they have proved themselves right or wrong. These ideas are evil, and evil ideas contain the germs of their own defeat.

Hitler's real weakness would be in peace. His invasions have won not the loyalty but the undying hate of two-thirds of the people under his control. They have known self-government and liberty for centuries. They are people of great spiritual and intellectual resistance. They cannot revolt in arms against tanks and planes but they will never accept a new order based on slavery. And these aggressions have won the fear and hate of all the rest of the world. Conquest always dies of indigestion.

The whole Nazi ideology and the Nazi economic system are based upon coercion of the individual, the group, or the class. Those coercions can be held in preparing for war or during war. They cannot be held in peace. Even if Hitler got peace, the Nazi system will begin to go to pieces. Therefore, we do not need to despair that these evil ideologies will continue forever on this earth.

CAN WE LIVE WITH DESPOTS IN THE WORLD?

And there is the fourth argument that America and the Western Hemisphere cannot live with despotism in Europe. It would not be pleasant, but it can be done. The strong men of this Republic carried this democracy in the weakness of its infancy through a whole world of complete dictatorship, a world of imperialism, a world of aggression. Have we less stamina, less courage, than they?

WHAT OF OUR ECONOMIC LIFE?

And there is the fifth argument that if dictatorships continue in the world, our economic life will be strangled and die. I have expounded this subject at great length elsewhere. I may say here that this country is 93 percent self-contained. While I do not relish it and do not believe in any event it will be needed, if it is needed then we can make it 97 percent self-contained. And the cost of it would be less over 20 years than 1 year of war.

I suppose even totalitarian Europe would want to trade. At worst, we would have to set up defenses so that they do not take advantage of us. But totalitarianism will die of its own false principles, and that storm will pass.

THE INCIDENT OF THE "ROBIN MOOR"

Some groups seek to represent the incident of German sinking of the Robin Moor as a casus belli. If that ship had started for a German port with that cargo Britain would have rightly seized her as contraband, according to Britain's own definition of contraband. If British captors could not have taken her to port then, under international law, they would have the right to sink her. There is no freedom of the seas in trading with any belligerent. The difference here is the brutal treatment of the passengers and crew who, although finally saved, were left in jeopardy by the Germans. That was an outrageous violation of international law and humanity. The President is right to protest violently. But an incident of this kind standing alone is not reason for a calm nation to go to war. It can get satisfactions by patience.

MAKING PEACE IN EUROPE

The seventh category of arguments is that we must join in this war to impose permanent peace on the world. Suppose we join the war. Suppose we have victory over Hitler. Suppose we should march down the Unter den Linden. What happens then? It is possible to say right now what would happen.

Within a week after Germany is defeated each 1 of 20 nations in Europe will necessarily declare its national independence. Each one will set up a government of its own. Within another week each will begin to organize an army. They will occupy their utmost boundaries. In order to get revenue and to protect jobs for their own people, each one will again set up their tariff walls. And these nations will at once coagulate into groups and combinations for power politics, intent on increasing their strength at the peace table. There will be reparations and territory to divide.

All this is what happened before the Peace Conference in 1919, and it will automatically happen again. Moreover, many nations will have suffered greatly. Hate and revenge will sit at that peace table again.

No responsible statesman on the Democratic side has yet stated how or by what plan this inevitable result of victory is to be molded into permanent peace. We are asked to go in blind as to the ultimate purpose of this war.

If we stay out and retain our economic and moral resources we will be able to contribute to the rehabilitation of the world, and we may be able to make an affirmative contribution to a method to end war and bring about a better world.

DICTATORSHIP IN THE UNITED STATES

And what happens in the United States during and after a war that must take years and years even if it were won? We must at once establish further centralization of authority amounting to practical dictatorship in the United States. We will disguise its name, but total war cannot be won without it. We must bring about unity by force. We must regiment industry and labor. Intellectual life and civil liberty must be shackled to the war machine.

The necessities of war organization require vast taking over and operation of industry by the Government. War organization creates vested personal power, vested economic interests, vested habits, and vested ideas. We have a taste of all this already in organizing preparedness only.

It is easier to regiment a people than to unregiment them. They can be deprived of their liberties by a ukase, a command, or by administrative order. It is a long and painful climb back to freedom. Does any American believe that these vast powers vested in Government will be restored to the people if we join in World War?

When we came out of the last war our national debt was about 10 percent of our national wealth. Instead of that we will have a debt equal to 50 percent of our national wealth if we ever go into this one. The only answer is to inflate wages and prices by huge amounts in order to make it bearable. That would rob every present life-insurance policy, every savings-bank deposit, every college endowment of its buying power. That would be the ruin of the saving classes in the United States. No such event has ever happened in history without moral degeneration and the wreck of the whole form of government.

After this war is over it is certain that the forces pressing for continued economic dictatorship would be stronger than ever.

Lord Lothian in his last impressive address wisely remarked as to the dictatorships in Europe that these world evils "grew out of the despair * * * from long years of war, inflation, * * * unemployment, and frustration." What profit to us is it to destroy totalitarianism abroad and create it at home?

AMERICAN PREPAREDNESS

There is a reason for keeping out of this war that the proponents of war constantly ignore. We are not prepared. A cool-headed people would first prepare themselves before they rush to battle. We do not yet have 50,000 mechanized troops. Our planes could repel attack on this side of the Atlantic, but most of them are obsolete for fighting in Europe. And we would likely be fighting a two-ocean war with a one-ocean navy. Can we not listen to the experience of France and England in launching unprepared war?

The administration of our preparedness program is not yet efficiently organized. Over a year ago I expressed the hope that we start such organization with the experience we had gained in the last war. I recommended that some capable citizen be placed with full responsibility for our whole armament program. That has not yet been done. We are still confused in a mass of committees, boards and commissions.

If anything calls for us to keep out of war now it is just this unpreparedness. And we should arm to the teeth. When we are armed, then the voice of America will be heard, and it will be listened to.

THE SUM OF ALL

Now what sort of conclusions does this all add up to? For the situation as it stands today we should hold to our undertaking to be only the arsenal and engage in no shooting. But watch and arm. The reasons are:

Because we can be of more service to Britain if we stay out of this war.

Because these two continents, the one that Hitler now commands or would even command with Japan in, and the other which the United States possesses, are unable to reach each other's throat—that war can be ended only after long, long years of exhausting strain.

And the end of exhaustion may be compromise peace; it certainly means misery, poverty, frustration, and possibly revolution.

Because the moment we begin shooting in the Atlantic then Japan is under obligation to begin shooting at our interests in the Pacific—if she carries out her contract with Hitler. She cannot win, but it is usual to build up one's reserves before taking on two wars.

Because we cannot impose the four freedoms unless we can win military victory over not only Hitler and Mussolini, but Stalin, Matsuoka, Franco, and several others. Joining in a war alongside Stalin to impose freedom is a travesty.

Because even supposing there were victory over Germany, there is no declared war aim or method that assures the bringing of permanent peace to the hates and diverse interests of Europe.

Because of necessity we shall be compelled to set-up practical dictatorship in America. We shall be compelled to go on with it for years after the war is over. Freedom would return to America, but this generation would not see it again.

Because we are only partly prepared.

Because if we prepare, as we must prepare, there need be no fear in the American heart that the Axis one-and-all will ever conquer this hemisphere. The whole shift in these weapons of war adds to our defensive strength.

A PROGRAM FOR AMERICA NOW

No man can see what the future may bring. Whatever that future may be, only one defeat can come to America. We have no need to fear military defeat if we are prepared. Our only defeat would be if we lost our own national freedoms and our potency for good in the world.

There is no course we can pursue amid these stupendous dangers that is perfect, or without risks, or that may not require change. But let me propose for reasoning people a course for us at this time which avoids the most destructive forces and holds fast to the most constructive forces. And that program is neither defeatist nor isolationist nor interventionist.

1. Give every aid we can to Britain and China, but do not put the American flag or American boys in the zone of war.

2. Arm to the teeth for defense of the Western Hemisphere, and cease to talk and to provoke war until we are armed.

3. Uphold Congress steadily in assuming the responsibility to determine peace or war.

4. Stop this notion of ideological war to impose the "four freedoms" on other nations by military force and against their will.

5. Devote ourselves to improving the four freedoms within our borders, that the light of their success may stir the people of the world to their adoption.

6. We can hope a peace table will assemble some day, whether it be the result of stalemate or victory. The world will be glad to have America sit in at the peace table.

When that day comes the other nations will be sufficiently exhausted to listen to the military, economic, and moral powers of the United States. And with these reserves unexhausted, at that moment, and that moment only, can the United States promote a just and permanent peace.

7. We should go to that peace conference without the hates which come with war. We should go with a plan thought out and matured. We should prepare a new concept of human relations that will give the world some hope of permanent peace.

FINALLY

Here in America today is the only remaining sanctuary of freedom, the last oasis of civilization and the last reserve of moral and economic strength. If we are wise, these values can be made to serve all mankind.

My countrymen, we have marched into the twilight of a world war. Should we not stop here and build our defense while we can still see? Shall we stumble on into the night of chaos?

Bureaucratic Spending Must End If We Are to Have Anything to Defend

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in a newspaper release which came across my desk today the Department of Labor Statistics announced that the cost of living has increased 50 percent during the past 12 months. The Department's daily index of 28 basic commodities reached a new high peak on June 27, the release stated.

What does this mean?

It means that the hard-earned income of the wage earners and farmers of America is being depleted, is being rendered less valuable, is being depreciated, if you please, and these wage earners and farmers have no way to protect themselves.

This means, further, that a sort of predatory raid is being made on the pocketbooks of the people that does not have even the questionable merit of the desperate sort of recklessness that characterizes the bandit who sticks a gun in your midriff and takes your purse. The poor people, the wage earner and the farmer, have not the vestige of chance except through this Congress or, through the bureaucrats in the executive branch of the Government, to protect themselves against this sort of thing.

While the cost of living has thus been rising, the airways have come to throb and pulsate with appeals to the people for this, that, and the other so-called defense activity. The people are being beseeched to buy defense bonds. They are being beseeched to "bundle for Britain." They are being beseeched to donate and to buy in every direction—all in the name of national defense.

In addition to practically every known method of taking the dollars from the peoples' pockets, this Congress is now getting ready to pass the most gigantic tax bill that was ever lifted to the shoulders of our overburdened people. We now have the greatest national debt any nation in the world ever staggered under. And we are told by Mr. Stacey May, research director for the Office of Production Management, that besides aiding Great Britain we can expect to spend $40,000,000,000 a year for some years to come if we are to build an adequate defense. No man can even hazard a guess as to what the national debt will be before the present wars are over and our national defense has been built.

It is in view of these multifarious drafts upon the pocketbooks of the people that I was shocked when I read in the Washington Times-Herald of June 29 of a new bureaucratic set-up in connection with our "good neighbor" policy which is going to create 282 new high-priced jobs; which is going to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars to print books containing the President's speeches to be given away. Why, Mr. Speaker, if these were the speeches of anybody other than the President, such a project would be characterized by the name of propaganda.

Mr. Speaker, I want to read into my remarks at this point the Times-Herald article, written by George D. Riley, showing some of these new high-salaried jobs that are to be passed around like seeds in the field to sprout a new crop of debts to be paid for by the bended backs and the sweating brows of the farmers and wage earners of the Nation. The article is as follows:

NELSON ROCKEFELLER TO BRING LATIN AMERICANS TO TAKE OVER JOBS IN UNITED STATES CITY GOVERNMENTS—282 HIGH-PRICED JOBS TO BE FILLED; MAGAZINES AND BOOKS WILL BE FREE

(By George D. Riley)

Nelson Rockefeller is going to hire an assistant coordinator at $9,000, a liaison officer at $8,000, an executive assistant at $8,000, 2 Latin American consultants at $8,000, and a host of others who will get big pay. In addition he is going to engage 36 $1-a-year men. There will be a total of 282 new jobs.

He will add a director of music at $5,600, a publications section chief at $8,000, a director of public cultural relations division at $8,000. Here are some others:

Director, art section, $6,500; director, education section, $6,500; director, languages, $8,000; director, welfare-health, $6,000; director, communications, $9,000; director, radio section, $9,000; director, movies section, $8,000; director, news section, $8,000; syndicate specialist, $6,500; director, travel section, $6,500; director, sports section, $6,500; director, commercial development section, $8,000; director, special division, $8,000; director, finance division, $7,000; director, natural resources, $7,000; general counsel, $8,000; director, public education division, $8,000; director, projects direction division, $9,000.

And a long list of other titles. The messengers will continue to get $1,080 (4) and $1,200 (6). The secretaries to all these big shots will get only $1,800.

Mr. Rockefeller will spend $195,000 to print 60,000 copies of a book containing the President's speeches. A magazine, 80,000 copies of which will be printed monthly, will be issued. Forty thousand will be circulated free.

Three hundred thousand dollars will be spent to import young men from South America to give them jobs as administrators (Rhodes scholarship level) in the city governments throughout the United States and "other similar agencies." News scribes will be brought in from Latin America and given free tours of the country. Wire services will be subsidized to give free pictures to South America.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if Mr. Rockefeller or any of the rest of these bureaucrats ever stopped to figure out how many miles of hot and dusty furrows the farmers of Michigan, Illinois, and Iowa, and the other agricultural sections must plow under the hot summer sun in order to pay these $8,000 and $9,000 salaries, and in order to bring these young men from Central and South America and employ them at the expense of the American people.

I wonder if any of these bureaucrats ever took the trouble to figure out how many bushels of corn, or how many bushels of wheat, or how many pounds of butter, or how many dozens of eggs must be produced in the agricultural sections of the United States to pay $195,000 for 60,000 copies of a book containing the President's speeches?

How many American citizens, I ask, must labor from the early hours of dawn until the last faint hours of twilight on the farms of America to pay $300,000 which is to be spent to import these young men from South America to take nice high-salaried jobs in the various cities of the United States?

A good-neighbor policy is all well enough in its way, but there is no such thing as a good-neighbor policy that requires one neighbor to work hardships and sacrifice on the part of his own family to be a good neighbor to the next family nearest to him. I, for one, am beginning to believe that this so-called good-neighbor policy is being carried over into a system of power politics in the Western Hemisphere that may become as dangerous as power politics have always been on the Continent of Europe. We are training the South and the Central American peoples to depend upon us for loans, for military protection, for markets, for everything that somebody in the State Department or in some other bureau of the executive branch conjures up as a possible bait that might be extended to these countries by Hitler or Stalin or Mussolini. I believe that these South and Central American statesmen are just as enlightened concerning the interests of their own nations as we are. We do not have to coddle them like new-born infants in order to win their loyalty and cooperation. They know just as well as we do that their only hope for continued independence lies in their strong neighbor to the North. They know just as well as we do that unless we do protect them, and unless they do cooperate with us, Mr. Hitler or Mr. Stalin will overrun them and reduce them to a state of slavery with no more compunction than they could expect from a rampaging herd of mad elephants.

There is something very subtle and very dangerous about this business of playing Lord Bountiful to other countries and other peoples. It is all very pleasant to be able to hand out millions to other countries and to receive the adulation, and the decorations, and the banqueting, and feasts, all of those pleasant things that come to a Lord Bountiful. It is easy, indeed, for these bureaucrats in Washington to play the Lord Bountiful to all these other countries; but I want to say right here that it is not easy for the wage earners and the farmers to toil and sweat and sacrifice to pay the enormous costs of this Lord Bountiful policy.

Now, I am calling attention to this situation at this time because this is just one of numerous bureaus and departments and boards and commissions that are ladling out the American people's money by the barrel. They act as though they believe—and in some cases I think they do believe—the pool of public credit is an inexhaustible reservoir from which can be drawn off, without end and without stint, a flood of money to be handed out to any and every country in the world that the President or some of his advisers may decide could use a few hundred million dollars.

We all know the bureaucrats who devised these schemes of spending the public's funds to create highly paid occupations for themselves cannot be expected to end these extravagant and insane methods of spending money. They cannot be expected ever to even want to end the waste of the public funds because bureaucracy thrives and stays in power by wasting the public funds.

This Congress must call a halt on this sort of thing. I believe it far past the time when the American people should have been told what is happening here in Washington and out over the United States, where bureau is piled upon bureau; where department literally elbows department; where board crowds board in the buildings of the Capital; where commission treads upon the heels of commission; where all of these agencies are multiplied and multiplied again in order to spend the taxpayers' money and to keep the farmers and wage earners of this Nation working for the rest of their lives, and to keep their children, and their children's children working to pay these debts so lightly created by these political Lord Bountifuls.

It may be of interest to the hard-working artisans and farmers of America to know that in this great city of Washington the Federal Government faces a shortage of office space at the beginning of the fiscal year of 1942. The swift expansion of all of these spending agencies has taken up every foot of available space in the Nation's Capital. We now know, by reason of information revealed in the second deficiency appropriation bill, that Uncle Sam will need 2,790,000 square feet of office space in addition to the 22,794,904 square feet already occupied in Washington. This will make a total of 25,584,804 square feet of floor space occupied. Every farmer knows what this means when it is pointed out to him that this equals 587⅓ acres of land, crowded, desk to desk, file case to file case, executive to executive, stenographer to stenographer, clerk to clerk, with these spending agencies, each one of which considers its function to be to spend all that it can get Congress to appropriate, rather than to try to save.

The trouble with this whole situation, Mr. Speaker, is that the bureaucracy that has grown up in Washington in the last 9 years is hell bent for spending the people's money because they themselves, with their fancy salaries in the upper brackets, consider spending to be their job.

It is time, if we are to avoid inflation and repudiation and utter economic chaos in this country, for Congress to take some account of these enormous, these inconceivable sums of money that are being so blithely spent but which must be so laboriously repaid by the taxpayers of this country.

Let no man fool himself. The cost of all these follies and extravagances and wastes will be paid by the poor people of this country, not by the rich people. Let me point out to my colleagues in this House, that if we confiscated every dime of all income of $5,000 a year up, the Government would not get enough revenue to pay by approximately $2,000,000,000 the nondefense expenditures for the year of 1941.

This Congress must bear the responsibility for the ruin which inevitably must follow such a headlong, reckless course of spending such as we are now embarked upon. There is not a vestige of excuse, there is not a shadow of justification for saying that because we contemplate war and because we are building a national defense, that we must abandon efficiency and economy. To the contrary, every tenet of justice, of good government, of sound finance, of patriotism, of good sense, tells us that we should achieve the greatest possible economy and efficiency in both our defense and nondefense expenditures. In Heaven's name, Mr. Speaker, what will we accomplish if we completely wreck and ruin this Nation, destroy our economy and our form of government by waste and inefficiency and corruption in trying to build a defense? What will there be left to defend if we keep spending at this rate?

We must awaken to this danger. We must stop waste. We must compel efficiency, and if we do not do it and do it soon, it will not be "God bless America," it will be God help America!

Refugee Children in America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD KNUTSON

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

Man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I have just had an experience that affected me most profoundly. Indeed, as I pen these words it is difficult for me to see to write.

For the past half hour I have listened over the radio to an exchange of greetings between refugee children in America and their parents in Britain—a program that stirred me to the innermost depths of my soul. As I listened to the eager and excited voices of the little kiddies, and to the restrained but loving and brave responses of the parents, a melancholy came over me that brought tears to my eyes and dimmed the bright sunshine that came through the windows. Yea, it seemed that even the joyous songs of the birds out of doors were hushed.

All were brave, although I could detect a tenseness, an anxiety on the part of the parents, more especially the mothers. That is understandable, coming from those who had entered the valley of death to bring forth their loved ones.

As I sit in my office in Washington this peaceful Sunday afternoon it is difficult for me to realize that 3,000 miles away men are slaughtering each other and laying waste cities and hamlets, not because they hate each other—

Theirs not to make reply,
Theirs not to reason why,
Theirs but to do and die.

They are killing and destroying because their leaders have been stupid, blind, and selfish. Unfortunately, it is the inarticulate masses that must pay the price of their leaders' incredible follies.

"But what good came of it at last?"
Quoth little Peterkin.
"Why, that I cannot tell," said he;
"But 'twas a famous victory."

The thousands of refugee children in America, and in many parts of Europe, are innocent victims of a heartbreaking tragedy that has no parallel in modern times. They have been exiled from their homes to live in strange places and among kind-hearted strangers that they may be spared the harrowing experiences their parents are nightly undergoing; that their young lives might be preserved—preserved for what? That they may some day reenact the tragic and cruel roles that their fathers, uncles, older brothers and cousins are daily compelled to enact? God forbid.

The masses in all countries ask but to be permitted to live their lives in peace, to raise their offspring to become useful members of society. They are not concerned with lust of empire nor ambitions of politicians. One and all wholeheartedly abhor war with its bloodshed and destruction and misery, and if they could be heard in the councils of the chancelleries their vote would be for peace, and to outlaw war. It is they who must do the fighting and dying; it is they who must pay the cost in blood, in treasure, in suffering. It is anomalous that the masses are deprived of all voice when the time comes to cast the die for peace or war, yet it is so.

Happily, it will not always be thus. Some day the great body of common folks, like you and me, will demand a seat at the council table when the fate of millions is being decided. When that happy day comes the spears will be beaten into pruning hooks.

Control of government must be wrested from the hands of selfish, cruel, and lustful megalomaniacs who can see no farther ahead than the tip of their nose, and whose sole concern is self. Their day is drawing to its close. Then it will no longer be necessary to separate mothers and fathers from their loved offspring at a time when the little ones most need the loving and wise ministrations of the home to guide and direct their young and plastic minds.

I am but a humble being, by the grace of God an American citizen, but I would not change places with any of the war lords of Europe or Asia, whose hands reek with human blood. They have destroyed what it has taken centuries to build, and have sold unborn generations into bondage of debt and disease. Their names will go down in history with the barbarian conquerers of the Dark Ages; their souls will know no peace. An eternity of contrition cannot wash their sins away. They have left an indelible stain on the pages of history; they have caused suffering and misery that mere words cannot portray.

And whosoever shall offend one of these little ones that believe in me, it is better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he were cast into the sea.

Alonzo Dillard Folger

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN H. KERR
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, I shall not undertake to fully review the life of my distinguished friend, Hon. ALONZO DILLARD FOLGER, whose tragic death removed from this body and deprived the State of North Carolina and this Nation of a matchless service and an example of unselfish devotion to his State and Nation measured by his great intellect and his rare ability to grip the love and inspire the confidence of his fellow man. When Mr. FOLGER died the State of North Carolina lowered its majestic head in deep supplication and sorrow. From the mountains of this great commonwealth to its sand dune shores upon which beats the turbulent Atlantic every human soul who knew this public servant experienced and expressed a deep sense of sorrow.

It is fortunate for any man to be born in or at the foothills of the beautiful Blue Ridge Mountains. These mountains are nature's contribution to earth's beauty and glory and it appears that the Master of Art left out nothing when he created these sublime scenes. The panorama of these mountains will ever draw men to God and inspire man to attain those noble attributes which the Master of Men commanded when He walked this earth.

Born in or near these mountains were many men whose lives and service adorn the history of this Nation and the memory of these men will be cherished with pride inexpressible as long as this Republic survives. It was in this section that Andrew Jackson, Zeb Vance, Thomas L. Clingman, General Hoke, Daniel Boone, Thomas H. Benton, Thomas Ruffin, Richmond Pierson, and many others first saw the light of day and nurtured inpirations which lead them to unselfish service and proud achievements. The subject of this tribute, LON FOLGER, was born in that section of North Carolina which contributed a long list of noble men and women to this Nation, a few of whom I have just mentioned. His ancestors were among those Scotch-Irish patriots from Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia who destroyed the mighty British Army of Lord Cornwallis when he endeavored to subjugate the southern colonies and make secure the conquest of all the American colonies. Our deceased colleague was a fine lawyer, a good judge, a superb political organizer, a faithful trustee of the great University of North Carolina and a public servant whose life and acts were so upright that he was universally beloved by all who knew him and honored as few have been in our State in this generation. I asked his distinguished brother and successor here what was the noblest characteristic possessed by our deceased colleague; his answer was the answer I knew he would make to me, and the answer all others who knew him would have made; it was "his unselfish love for his fellow man and the sacrifice he readily made for those who needed his help and comfort."

The Saviour of man gave one commandment to those who would live after Him—this was the dying declaration made on Calvary, and on that tragic occasion He said to His faithful followers: "A new commandment I give unto you, that you love one another; as I have loved you, that you also love one another," and then went away to His death and destiny.

LON FOLGER loved his fellow man. This was the touchstone of his life, the secret of his power and influence, and 5,000 friends came to look on his casket and pay a last tribute to their friend, and 5 times 5,000 were saddened as his spirit went to "that City which has foundations whose maker and builder is God."

He was buried in the sight of these mountains which gave to him the happy dreams of his boyhood and inspired his ambition, his love, his joy, and delight which neither gold nor power could buy. If you should analyze the character of Mr. FOLGER or most men who are loved by their fellow man, you will find that it is made up of the simple virtues of life; happiness, friendliness, patience, self-denial, industry, and charity. It is said of Abraham Lincoln that his simplicity was his chief charm. Everybody that knew him felt that he was a real man, a large-hearted, generous friends, always ready to help everybody out of trouble. He never covered up anything; never had secrets; the door of his life was always open so that any man could read his utmost thoughts. Theodore Roosevelt once said in a speech that he delivered to the people of Colorado:

If when I die the ones who knew me best believe that I was a thoughtful, helpful husband; a loving, wise, and painstaking father; a generous, kindly neighbor, and an honest citizen; that will be a far more real honor, and will prove my life to have been more successful than the fact that I have ever been President of the United States. Had a few events over which no one had control been other than they were, it is quite possible that I may have never held the high office that I now occupy, but no train of events could accidentally make me a noble character or a faithful member of my home and community.

LON FOLGER was a noble character and a faithful member of his home and community. He was true to every obligation he undertook in this life and everyone who knew him knew this. His simple virtues endeared him to all and his reputation was coextensive with the boundary of the great State in which he was born and died. He was Nature's nobleman, a friend of man, and obeyed without equivocation the only commandment our Savior ever gave to this world. No verse was ever more adequate as a tribute to the life of LON FOLGER than those beautiful lines of Leigh Hunt entitled "Abou Ben Adhem and the Angel":

Abou Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase)!
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace
And saw, within the twilight in the room,
Making it rich like a lily in bloom,
An angel writing in a book of gold.
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the presence in the room he said,
"What writest thou?" The vision raised its head,
And with a look made of all sweet accord
Answered, "The names of those who love the Lord."
"And is mine one?" said Abou. "Nay, not so,"
Replied the angel. Abou spoke more low,
But cheerily still, and said, "I pray thee then,
Write me as one who loves his fellow men."
The angel wrote and vanished. The next night
It came again with a great wakening light,
And showed the names whom love of God had blest;
And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest!

America First

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

ADDRESS BY CHARLES A. LINDBERGH

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the wonderful address given by that fearless and unambitious American, Col. Charles A. Lindbergh, in the Hollywood Bowl on June 20 to a crowd that overflowed to high up on the mountainside. This modest hero has an infinity written on his brow and has a majority of our people with him.

We who oppose America's entrance into this war have one great advantage over the interventionists. We will be successful if we can bring the true facts and issues of the war clearly before the people of our country. They can be successful only by confusing our people in regard to these facts and issues. We fight with the blade of truth as our greatest weapon. They use the bludgeon of propaganda. We ask you to study our statements since this war began. They dare not ask you to study theirs. Time lies with us, for knowledge cannot be permanently suppressed, and every fact that is learned sharpens our weapon.

Possibly the most ominous and deplorable development of the war, as far as the United States is concerned, has been the deliberate attempt to misinform and confuse our people. Some day, in the not distant future, the men who are responsible for this will be called to account by an aroused and enlightened nation. The attempt to involve our country in war by subterfuge and propaganda is not a crime to be passed over lightly. Public opinion will bring the charges, and history will be the judge.

But there is time for that in the future.

Now we have a more important mission to accomplish. Our first mission is to stay out of this war, and all of our effort, for the present, must be directed toward that objective. After the war is over, we can turn to reforms. Reforms must come, but they must come with tolerance and not with war.

Tonight I shall try to cut through some of the propaganda and misinformation which has entangled public thinking in recent months. It is impossible to cover everything in a single address, so I shall hold my discussion primarily to two of the greatest fallacies which have been advanced by the groups who want to get us into war. They claim, first, that the developments of modern warfare make this country more vulnerable to foreign invasion than before, and, second, that the best way to defend America is by defending England. I will try to show you conclusively tonight why these claims are false, and why the exact opposite is true. The fact is that the developments of modern warfare make America less vulnerable to invasion than we have ever been in the past. The fact is that the surest way for us to lose a war is by trying to defend England or any other part of Europe.

A general principle cannot be laid down, the importance of which I cannot overemphasize. Our entire national policy should be wound around it. It is that while the developments of modern warfare have increased the vulnerability of nations within a hemisphere to each other, they have decreased the ability of one hemisphere to attack the other successfully. For instance, the development of aviation made France and England much more vulnerable to Germany than they were before. But aviation makes it more difficult for Europe to attack America, or for America to attack Europe, than it has ever been in the past.

The interventionists have been telling you that aircraft have removed the safety we once had in our isolated geographical position—that the barriers of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans no longer exist. But just the opposite is true. Aircraft alone could not carry more than a small fraction of an army large enough to invade America. They could not begin to carry the supplies for such an army. An invading army would still have to come to America by sea, and aircraft make a sea invasion more difficult than it has ever been before. In fact, the edevelopments of this war indicate that aircraft may make it impossible for an enemy force to land on our American coast, regardless of how strong that force may be.

It has been shown time and time again that warships suffer heavy losses whenever they come within striking distance of enemy aviation. The British Navy was unable to remain in the Skagerrak under the bombs of German aircraft. It was forced to retire from the coast of Norway. It could not withstand the attack of the dive bombers at Sicily. It had heavy losses in the Aegean during the campaigns of Greece and Crete. Additional instances of the effect of air upon sea power were given in the British attacks on the Italian fleet and in the location and disabling of the German battleship Bismarck. But possibly the most significant of all is the fact that neither the Germans nor the British have attempted to land forces by sea on any coast adequately protected by air.

When we analyze the situation carefully, we find that nearly all of the developments of modern warfare would be to our advantage in the defense of America, and to the disadvantage of any foreign enemy attempting to attack us. This is obvious if you stop to realize that an enemy would still have to come by sea, and that ships have changed very little in recent years. Their speed is not much different today than it was in the last war. We would have plenty of warning of the approach of a hostile fleet, and—here is the significant point—almost all the developments of modern warfare that our enemy was bringing would be safely boxed up in the holds of his ships. Aside from the relatively small number of planes he could release from aircraft carriers, and possibly a few long-range bombers, his modern equipment would be useless unless he could actually unload it and assemble it on our shores. But while our enemy was still in midocean on board his ships, we could concentrate our air force, our coast artillery, our tanks, and our mechanized divisions with a speed and effectiveness that has never been known in the past. The advantages of modern warfare would be ours, not his.

I ask you to visualize an enemy convoy headed toward America, a thousand miles off our coast. The picture is not a great deal different than it would have been 25 years ago. The battleships would be a little larger, and there would be a number of aircraft carriers; but otherwise the convoys of today have not changed much in appearance from convoys of the last war.

Next, I ask you to visualize the preparations in America for the reception of that convoy. Our sky would be full of long-range bombers. Our concrete highways would be lined with tanks and mechanized divisions. Reconnaissance planes would keep us informed by radio of our enemy's exact position. About the only thing that would appear the same as in the past would be our Navy steaming out to sea. And like the enemy, it, too, would have aircraft carriers and larger battleships.

With these pictures in mind, you can see why I say that the developments of modern warfare are to our advantage in defending America, and not to an enemy's advantage in attacking us; you can see why it is more difficult than ever before for the armies of one hemisphere to attack the other hemisphere successfully. You can see clearly how false and misleading the interventionists' claims have been. Even if the British Fleet itself should turn again us, we will still be able to defend ourselves. That fleet would be no more able to meet the challenge of air powers in America than it has been able to meet the challenge of air power in Europe. Aviation, if we use it intelligently, will make American shores impregnable to attack.

Now, let us turn to the interventionists' second claim. They say that the best way to defend America is to defend England. But when you pin them down by asking what the defense of England means, they tell you that in order to defend England we must crush Germany and restore all the territory Germany has occupied since the war began. If you ask them whether we must also restore the territory occupied by Russia and Japan, they usually look the other way and make some vague statement about supporting the four freedoms throughout the world. And if you ask exactly how all this is to be done, you seldom get any reply at all. I have yet to hear anyone who advocates our entry into this war outline intelligently where we would attack or how we could win. They simply shout "fight," and usually they are not the people who would do the fighting.

To understand why the best way to defend America is not by defending England, it is necessary to study Europe and the position in which England finds herself in this modern era. Of all the nations in the world, England is probably the most adversely affected by the developments of modern warfare. This the interventionists do not tell you, but it becomes obvious when you stop to realize that English life, strength, and Empire have been built upon control of the seas. In generations past, Englishmen could live in security on their islands as long as they maintained the strongest navy in the world. But the submarine and the airplane have broken that security. It is no longer enough to control the surface of the sea, and it is no longer possible to control it within effective bombing range of enemy aircraft. For the first time in history England cannot protect her shores with her navy. For the first time her cities and her industries can be attacked regardless of how many battleships she has.

The geographical advantage of the British Isles in an age of ships does not exist in an age of aircraft. England is actually at a disadvantage from the standpoint of aviation. The area, the terrains, and the climatic conditions of Great Britain are not advantageous for flying. Enemy air bases on the continent of Europe curve around her in almost a semicircle. No matter how many fighting planes we build in America and send to England, it is not possible to base enough squadrons in the British Isles to equal in striking power the squadrons that Germany can base on the continent of Europe. English cities and industrial areas are within easy range of enemy bombers, while British bombers must fly much farther to reach similar enemy objectives. Fuel, food, and other supplies must be taken to England by sea, in ships which can be bombed and torpedoed by her enemy. I repeat again that the very developments of modern warfare which have strengthened the position of America have greatly weakened the position of England, and I challenge anyone to prove otherwise.

Now, let us consider what we in America would have to do in order to defend England. As I have said, the interventionists admit that by the defense of England they really mean the defeat of Germany. England herself has so far refused to reconsider the terms on which she declared war, and since they involve the restoration of Poland, it might be necessary for us to defeat Russia as well as Germany if we enter this war. But there are still more complications. We find that Spain is friendly to Germany, and that France has come to an agreement with the Axis. Even Japan has formed a military alliance with the Axis Powers. So when we translate the English of the interventionists into plain American language, we find that what we are really being told is that the best way to defend America is by attacking the rest of the world—by sending our soldiers cross the Atlantic Ocean and across the Pacific Ocean, to overcome the armies of Germany, Italy, Japan, and possibly Russia, France, and Spain as well.

Now, suppose we are foolish enough to attempt this. Let us see what we must do. If we enter war, we must be prepared for all eventualities. We must be prepared to fight Japan in the Pacific at the same time that we are convoying our troops and supplies across the Atlantic. And since the allied armies no longer hold any territory on the continent of Europe, we must be prepared to force a landing on a hostile coast against the same German Army and air force that broke the Maginot Line and routed the British Navy whenever it came within bombing range of their bases.

We would have the same problem in attacking Europe that European armies would have in attacking us. But in that case it would be our problem to transport our Armies on ships, and try to land on their shores under the bombardment of their aircraft, the torpedoing of their submarines, and the fire of their coast artillery and mechanized divisions. Yet the interventionists tell you that the best way to defend America is by defending England.

Let us face the true facts as they appear before us in plain American wording.

First. We are still unprepared for war, and it would take us years to prepare adequately for the type of war we now consider entering. It would mean turning this country into a military nation that exceeds Germany in regimentation. Life as we know it today would be a thing of the past.

Second. Even if we were fully prepared at this time, we would face the superhuman task of crossing an ocean and forcing a landing on a fortified continent against armies stronger than our own and hardened by years of war. It would probably mean the loss of millions of American lives.

Third. We in America have the best defensive position in the world. No foreign power can invade us today, and with reasonable preparation on our part, no combination of foreign powers will ever be able to invade us Since they cannot invade, it will be only a question of time before they desire to trade with us. And I have full confidence in American ability to hold its own in a trade.

Men and women of California, I have tried to show you tonight why we can defend America, and why it is difficult, if not impossible for us to wage war in Europe successfully. I would like to leave with you one more thought, and that is what we are doing to Europe by encouraging and prolonging this war. England and France were never in a position to win this war. Those who urged them to declare war were not true friends. They have pushed two great nations to disaster. Those who urge that the war be continued are pushing all Europe into chaos. I have said since war was declared, and I say again, that with every month that passes, England will be in a worse position to negotiate peace terms than she was before. With every month her suffering and her hardships will increase. But suppose I am wrong. Suppose we in America throw all of our people, and all of our resources—throw the entire future of this country into the greatest war of history. Suppose that by some miracle of fate, after 10 or 20 or 30 years of struggle, after losing many millions of lives, that we were at last able to bring Germany to her knees in the midst of a devastated, starved, and prostrate Europe, what would we have gained? What would be the result for England, for France, for ourselves, except the downfall of all European civilization, and the establishment of conditions in our own country far worse even than those in Germany today? Who would be the winner of such a war except Russia and Japan?

I ask you to face the facts of war as they are, to consider them carefully, and then to put your support behind a negotiated peace in Europe. I ask you to consider the alternatives to a negotiated peace, and see if they are not worse. The alternatives to a negotiated peace is either a Hitler victory or a prostrate Europe, and possibly a prostrate America as well. I tell you that the only way our American life and ideals can be preserved is by staying out of this war. I tell you that the only way European civilization can be saved is by ending it quickly. If anyone tries to tell you otherwise, make them outline clearly their alternative. Make them tell you not what they think should be done, not what they wish could be done, but exactly how this Nation is going to accomplish what they advocate. Make them tell you how many ships and how many men their policy will require; how many dead and how many wounded our country will suffer; how many years of war we must go through. After that, the decision is up to you as the free citizens of the greatest democracy left on earth. As I said at the beginning of my address, we who oppose this war ask only that the true facts and issues be placed openly before the American people. This is a democratic country. Its direction is in your hands not in the hands of any one leader or group of leaders. Your leaders are not elected—as in the totalitarian states—to dictate to you. They are elected to represent you. You have the right as a free people to demand that representation. It is your right and your duty to decide the direction your country takes—to peace or to war. Your decision is final, and in your decision we have confidence. All we ask is that you be given the truth with which to judge, and the opportunity of expressing your opinion.

Interests Opposed to St. Lawrence Seaway Project

EDITORIAL FROM THE DULUTH (MINN.) NEWS-TRIBUNE

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, hearings are now in progress before the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House in connection with H. R. 4927. This is the legislation introduced in the House for the purpose of ratifying the agreement for completion of the St. Lawrence seaway project recently made between officials of Canada and the United States. It is interesting to note that the eastern railroads are actively opposing this legislation. An editorial in the Duluth News-Tribune for June 24, 1941, in discussing this situation is very interesting. It is as follows:

[From the Duluth (Minn.) News-Tribune of June 24, 1941]

THE SEAWAY AND THE RAILROADS

From the National Seaway Council comes a leaflet discussing the attempt of the eastern railroads to make it appear that the St. Lawrence waterway would be a threat to all the railroads of this country.

The seaway council shows, to begin with, that the western railroads would benefit immensely by hauling seaway-shipped goods to and from the ports of the Great Lakes. On top of that the lowered shipping costs would contribute to the growth of Midwest industry, and as these industries grew, railroad business in this part of the country would increase, too.

Then it shows that the maximum possible tonnage moved over the seaway could not exceed 11,500,000,000 ton-miles, or about 3.4 percent of the entire railroad tonnage moved in this country. Since there will probably be nowhere near this tonnage on the seaway, and since all of the tonnage there would not come from the railroads, much of it being new, seaway-created business, the injury the eastern roads would suffer would be comparatively slight—perhaps none at all if they were alert enough to get their share of the fast freight business which the development of Midwest industry would create.

As to the savings and benefits of water transportation, the seaway council finds an example in the ore movement from the Mesaba Range to Pittsburgh. Of transportation charges of $3,265 a gross ton, the railroads at both ends of the haul get $2.075, and the railroad-owned docks $0.39. The water carriers get $0.80 for 815 miles of haul.

In an earlier, free day, Midwest railroad men spoke strongly in favor of the waterway. The figures make it clear that they would be doing so today if eastern control of these railroads did not prevent them from doing so.

Courts Recognize Necessity of the Automobile

NEWS RELEASE OF THE NATIONAL AUTOMOBILE DEALERS ASSOCIATION

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to insert a release of the National Automobile Dealers Association, an article setting forth the fact that court decisions have fixed the status of the automobile in the Nation's economy as a necessity, which once was considered a luxury.

The news release follows:

COURTS RECOGNIZE NECESSITY OF THE AUTOMOBILE

Court decisions generally fix the status of controversial subjects and one of these has been the controversy over the status of the automobile in the Nation's economy, the National Automobile Dealers Association points out in the ninth study of its series to acquaint the public with the function of the automobile in national defense.

The study quotes the case of Nelsen against Tilly, December 20, 1939, in which the Supreme Court of Nebraska held that "it cannot be seriously disputed that the motor-vehicle industry has grown to huge proportions in both the State and Nation. Motor vehicles, once luxuries, are now necessities."

In commenting, National Automobile Dealers Association says, "The more than 40,000,000 drivers in this country will heartily agree with that decision. The truth of it has been brought home to most of them whenever their cars have been laid up temporarily for repairs. Ask any service manager and he will tell you how urgent each repair job is that comes into his shop, how impatient the owner is about getting his car back in good running order, and how often he has requests for loaners if a customer's car is to be tied up for a day or so.

"For further convincing evidence, ask any of the many thousand industrial workers who have no other way of reaching their jobs, or, if they have, are forced to lose precious time in walking, making connections, and transferring. Note the jammed parking lots surrounding factories. Watch the streaming traffic into and out of business districts each morning and evening. Without going further, try to imagine the inconvenience that would be caused by unnecessary restriction on the availability of private motor vehicles—the loss of personal efficiency. It is hard to think of anything that would so upset our whole mode of living.

"In England, at the outbreak of the war, the notion still persisted that the private passenger car was a semiluxury. So they put their cars in storage. Then, under the disorganizing effect of air raids, mass transportation was slowed down and crippled, with serious effects on the efficiency of thousands of workers.

"The British soon discovered that their private cars had become a necessity. Through Government encouragement, automobiles were brought back into use, lapsed licenses renewed, and a plan launched whereby motorists who agreed to carry a certain number of passengers to and from work were given a large increase in the gasoline allowance.

"So, in the United Kingdom, where car ownership is only 1 to 19 persons, the private passenger car had made the transition from semiluxury to necessity without the British realizing it. In the United States our dependence upon private transportation is much greater. Ownership is 1 car to every 5 persons."

Dedication of Post Office at Clyde, N. Y.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 30 (legislative day of Thursday, June 26), 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES M. MEAD, OF NEW YORK

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by me at the dedication of the post office at Clyde, N. Y., on June 28, 1941.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is refreshing to get away from the Capitol and to be here with you today. I am honored to have a part in the dedication of this handsome Federal building. Its modern facilities will be enjoyed by all of the citizens of Clyde and of the surrounding neighborhood.

This month the Clyde Post Office observed its one hundred and twenty-first birthday. That takes this office back to 1820, 9 years before the name "Clyde" was designated for this community. It had formerly been known as Galen, then a part of Seneca County.

What vast progressive steps have been taken since those early days!

This new Post Office Building which we dedicate today is, in itself, an evidence of Clyde's forward progress. You will agree, I know, that this is an edifice in which the community may take deep civic pride. It cost over $44,000 to construct this building, but it has been an investment in efficiency, culture, and civic betterment which will, in the end, pay rich dividends.

You have here an attractive public building of colonial design constructed with superb workmanship and equipped with up-to-date appurtenances and conveniences. You are going to enjoy this building and you are going to point to it as a useful and aesthetic contribution to your community.

While this building is laid on a strong, material foundation, its real foundation is in your hearts. You made this building possible. It was built by virtue of your patronage, your cooperation, your ideals. This is, indeed, your building. Its doors are open to you. Its purpose is to provide you a better postal service. Soon it will become as familiar and as welcome to you as an old friend.

I need not tell you that the Post Office Department conducts the largest single business in all the world. It grew out of a postal system established by the American Colonies prior to the War for Independence. Benjamin Franklin served as our country's first Postmaster General. He first served under the British Crown and later under the Continental Congress. He laid the foundation for this great service of government which was to expand through the years as new Territories and new States were pioneered and settled.

The Post Office Department has kept apace with advancements in industry and science. Today the United States mails speed across the continent, fly across the skies, and sail across the seas by almost every known means of communication.

By train, plane, automobile, ship, horse, motorcycle, subway—by dog sled, skiis, and snowshoes—by foot and bicycle—rapid and efficient delivery of the mail has become an accepted and commonplace fact.

We enjoy this best of all postal services at low rates of postage, and we place complete confidence and trust in the sanctity, secrecy, and certainty of the mails.

Today, in a world that is ablaze with chaos and warfare—in a world that seems to offer little of security, stability, or sanity—we can, as Americans, view practical accomplishments like this building in the light of human progress. It represents a material translation of that symbolic quality that we call Americanism.

Its foundations are laid in the free soil of the Republic; its superstructure reflects the dignity and prestige of our democracy.

History may record that these days through which we are now living are among the saddest the world has yet endured. History may also record that America stood by her historic principles heroically and stemmed the tide of world domination by despots who sought to subjugate the human race. We hope, we pray, that history will record our current efforts as an unexcelled defense of human liberty.

We will surely be judged through future generations by the effectiveness and the justice of the course we now pursue. More and more it becomes evident that we hold in our hands the destiny of free men.

The world is a flaming sphere of death and destruction. We witness the spreading aggression in the Orient, the ceaseless attack on Britain, the sharp clashes in Africa, the new and bloody war in Russia, the attack in the Near East, the Battle of the Atlantic. The contagion of warfare is on our every side. The Western Hemisphere stands as a great bulwark of freedom in a world blacked out by this spreading holocaust.

Our task in this crisis which engulfs the world and blankets civilization, even in the most remote recesses of the globe, challenges the effectiveness and the vitality of democratic Government. This new world—this dynamic, imaginative, and productive land of hope and opportunity—was pioneered and built up by men and women who possessed a passionate devotion for the cause of individual liberty. We became a great melting pot into which poured the oppressed and the persecuted and the desperate and lonely of all the nations of the world. This hodgepodge of nationalities—this incredible collection of soulful but oppressed peoples—this awkward combination of many tongues and many colors and many creeds—some way, with the help of Providence and with an inspired determination, bound themselves together in a monumental effort to build a new world which would be strong and enduring because it was free.

Yes, this Western Hemisphere is the miracle of civilization. It breathes and progresses by sheer will power, driven ever forward by the dynamic force of independent self-governing, God-fearing, peace-loving citizens.

This is the world in which we are favored to live. This is the system that is our heritage. This is the existence that is ours to protect, to preserve, and to defend.

Today, let no one tell you otherwise, there are calculating madmen loose in the world who covet our success, our resources, and our wealth. These are tyrants who succeed only with the instruments of force and treachery. Their promises are worthless; their motives are despicable; their ambitions are brutal.

The mechanized might of their military machine has rolled over virtually all of Europe. It has crushed to earth the wealth and liberties and aspirations of millions of defenseless and peace-loving people. Nation after nation has been betrayed, invaded, conquered, occupied, and subjugated. The list of victim nations is a lengthening role of Axis dishonor. Today, these gangster rulers of Europe fight among themselves for the spoils of military conquest. But the only encouragement we can expect from that carnal campaign is the knowledge that we have just a little more time to prepare our own defenses and to strengthen our own arms of resistance.

We have determined that the only manner in which force can be repelled is by the provision of an equally irresistible force. We are providing that defense and, when we have completed our program, we will be a nation strong enough to meet any invasion even from the strongest aggressor, or combination of aggressors.

America has been engaged in an exhaustive and prolonged national debate on our role in this world upheaval. The debate has been conducted in almost every home, in our newspapers, on the radio, in our great public forums, and in our legislative chambers. Out of this discussion has come a solidified public policy. This country has decided that there is only one course it can honorably pursue, and that is to strengthen our own defenses and to lend every possible measure of assistance to those democracies who fight our common cause, to those who resist with inspired heroism and with an unshakable devotion to human liberty, the attacking Axis Powers.

Adolf Hitler can now well see that his fiendish ambitions have been challenged and he must know from a standpoint of realism that in the end despotism can never triumph over democracy.

But let us not for one instant tolerate overconfidence or a spirit of false optimism with respect to the magnitude of our efforts. We have new and graver responsibilities, more burdensome and less pleasant tasks, and increased and unhappy sacrifices directly ahead. To meet these new requirements we need a new and bolstered morale, a new and inspired spiritual and moral rearmament. We need an unassailable unity; a unity of purpose, effort, and production; a unity that encompasses 130,000,000 Americans is our need.

To the successful completion of this all-out program of production we must unstintingly pledge our wholehearted and uncompromising cooperation. We need more ships, more planes, more tanks, more guns, more instruments of defense and preparedness. We need more pilots, more technicians, more skilled workers. In a word, we need more production, more training, and even more cooperation.

This does not in any way reflect on the masterful beginning which we have already made, but it indicates the route we must follow if we are to effectually satisfy the demand for an invulnerable defense. In this unity which we must achieve to a greater and greater degree, we can tolerate no half-hearted, halfway measures. Neither can we afford to tolerate and to harbor those who are within our shores for the avowed purpose of weakening our united effort.

The "fifth columnists," the Communists, the bundists, the saboteur, the traitor, and the spy are the mortal enemies of America. Every success that they achieve is a victory for the aggressors. We will stamp them out wherever we find them. We will make this an unwelcome place for them and for their sympathizers.

Furthermore, we will reject the advice and the counsel of those who would confuse and mislead and divide our people. We will permit no petty grievances, no paltry partisanship, no fatalistic policy of appeasement to divert us from this declared objective to preserve the American system. No desire for selfish reward will tempt us to impede the progress of our national program. Strikes and lockouts in defense industries will yield to the democratic processes of arbitration. These things must happen and these domestic victories must be won. To fail in any respect will threaten our national effort.

This Republic requires a complete unanimity of effort on the part of all sections, classes, races, religions, and political parties. It requires speed and more speed, courage and energy, faith and cooperation. It requires a solid phalanx of all of our citizens in support of the leadership of our President and of our elected and chosen officials.

I cannot too strongly impress upon you what I consider to be the acuteness of our circumstances today. I cannot too fervently plead with you to lay aside every other consideration in the performance of this momentous task.

I cannot too earnestly appeal for your cooperation. I realize that my attitude may not agree with yours in every details, and I realize that there are trivial disagreements among us with respect to some details of this great program, but in the over-all effort we must be in agreement.

An appreciable division among our people in this grave hour would be an appalling calamity in this land made safe and free by Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln. Such a division would be an open invitation to those abroad who hope they can weaken us by such a division.

Every time we falter and every time we take serious issue with our leadership, we play into the hands of the Axis program. And so, the demand for our unified effort is indispensable.

Our devotions must be to God and country. We hope that the pathetic and chaotic circumstances of the world today may, by some stroke of fortune, dissipate and that, at an early date, the clouds of war and hate and aggression may disperse. We hope that the sun may shine again upon a world at peace, for that is the kind of a world that meets our aspirations.

But we will not let our love for peace, nor our reluctance to question the motives of others, nor our tolerance of the weakness of others, to thwart or dim or impede this fateful program of aid and defense into which we have been unhappily forced.

We hate this business of war, and we despise those who insist that there is no other recourse to the settlement of international disputes than that of military conflict. We abhor and shudder at the ruthless bombings of civilian populations. Our hearts are filled with sympathy at the plight of women and children, starving and dying across the seas. We can see no justification for these unspeakable atrocities. We hold the Axis leadership responsible. We are determined that we shall not send our young men into the holocaust abroad where the diving Stukas and the armored might of the Panzer divisions reduce human life to a paltry consideration.

We want none of that horrible experience. We will, however, protect the Western Hemisphere from the "isms" that poison the Old World. We will resist every step that is taken to menace these shores. We will not bow to the dictates of any tyrant, nor will we sacrifice our rights to the freedom of the seas or of our peaceful pursuits at the intimidation of those who despise our favored system.

We are succeeding in our program, and, in the end, America will be a stronger and happier and more prosperous Nation. But to reap the reward of peace and security, we must uphold the leader of our Republic—the accepted spokesman of democracy everywhere, the President of the United States, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

National Unity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAMILTON FISH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. HAMILTON FISH OF NEW YORK

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio speech made by me over the National Broadcasting Co.'s blue network on Monday evening, June 30, 1941.

National unity in the present crisis is highly desirable, and easily attainable. All American citizens are united for national defense and want to expedite the production of war supplies and defense articles. The Congress in adopting the lend-lease bill has provided for a program of all possible aid to Great Britain consistent with our own national defense. That is the law of the land and it should be upheld and maintained.

All loyal Americans are bitterly opposed to the activities and sabotage of the "fifth columnists" and our enemies from within. We are a united people in demanding that all alien Nazis, Communists, and Fascists, and all un-American groups should be seized and deported if possible, and that their seditious propaganda and activities should cease.

There should be no partisanship in national defense. Partisanship must give way to patriotism during the national emergency. However, that does not mean that free speech should be curtailed or constructive criticism abandoned—that is the doctrine of the dictators and a function of the totalitarian systems.

If President Roosevelt really wants national unity, I urge him to repeat the assurances that he gave the American people before the election that he would keep this country out of war unless attacked, and in case of any cause for war—casus belli—to submit a war resolution to the Congress for its determination.

If war is to be declared in the future the President must, in an honest, honorable, and American-like way submit the issue to the Congress where, after a great national debate, a war resolution would be voted up or down.

If the President will accept this challenge and give these assurances, I would gladly stop making speeches over the radio and elsewhere against our involvement in war.

I believe the America First Committee and all antiwar organizations would stop their activities immediately.

Of course the President should also muzzle the fire-eaters in his own Cabinet, who would destroy America by bringing bankruptcy, poverty, chaos, and revolution here through involvement in European and Asiatic wars.

The war makers who are trying to get us into war are not so much the President, but a comparatively small group of 10 percent of the American people, who are particularly well represented in the Cabinet. The worst offenders are former Republicans—Messrs. Stimson, Knox, and Ickes. Every speech these interventionists make is not only warlike but that we must get into the war now. Secretary of Agriculture Wickard is just as militant although he was in his twenties during the World War and did not serve a day in our armed forces then. He now spends most of his time going around the country trying to excite the farmers and to persuade them to send their sons to war. Messrs. Ickes and Wickard, our two most pronounced fire-eaters and war makers, are invincible in peace but were invisible in war.

The declaration of war by Hitler against Stalin, or nazi-ism against communism, has had a tremendous effect on American public opinion, and has definitely decided for us the greatest of all issues—that we will not go into the European war.

To fight for democracy, the four freedoms, and against dictatorships has an appeal to all liberty-loving Americans, but to participate in a war between two aggressors and two dictators, both opposed to the "four freedoms." leaves us icy cold. The attitude of most Americans is a plague on both their houses.

I am opposed to nazi-ism, and can think of nothing too bad to say against its aggressions and ideology; but there is one thing worse, and that is the bloody hand of communism. American mothers will not willingly sacrifice their sons to make the world safe for communism or to fight and die for the "red" flag, Joe Stalin, and world revolution under the guise of democracy.

Let the war makers rave and gnash their teeth, but the day Hitler went to war with Stalin the American people decided to keep out of the rotten mess in Europe and let the Nazis and the Communists fight it out to their heart's content.

We may be able to save America, but not if we try to force the four freedoms on Asia, Africa, Soviet Russia, and Nazi Germany with American blood and treasure.

The talk of imposing democracy on China, India, and Africa by armed force, where it never has existed, was the height of American hypocrisy from the beginning.

Dictator Joseph Stalin has played a dirty trick on Comrades Stimson, Knox, Wickard, and Ickes. Pal Joey, by leading the fight for democracy and religion, has stolen their thunder and their clothes. Now these fire-eaters propose to turn the lend-lease bill into a Lenin-lease bill and send our money and defense articles to Soviet Russia in the name of the four freedoms. What a travesty! Oh, Democracy, what crimes are committed in thy name!

I wonder where the great Catholic church will stand when the issue becomes clear? I wonder whether it will want to help build up communism, world revolution, and atheism, not only in Russia but throughout the world.

The following is an extract from a letter I received from a constituent, dated June 25:

"It is my desire to retract what I said in my recent open letter to you, and I hereby apologize for same. That was written and mailed before I knew about the German action against Russia.

"Having often said that I would prefer to live in a democracy headed by the vilest specimen of man than be the subject of the most virtuous dictator, I do not hesitate now to add that as between Hitler and Stalin I should rather a hundredfold be enslaved by Nazi Hitler than by "red" Stalin. That our leaders should want to give aid to Russia is utterly repugnant and reprehensible and merely indicates their insincerity of purpose in this entire mess."

Let me say to my constituent that we free Americans propose to make this Nation invincible and impregnable on land, sea, and air, and that no nation or group of nations will ever dare to attack us or even get the chance to enslave us.

I do not believe in making the Bug River or the Volga our first line of defense for communism, or substituting the Internationale for God Bless America.

If I had my way, I would have the Congress provide free transportation to Soviet Russia for all American Communists—alien and native-born—who want to fight for Dictator Stalin, with his hands still dripping with the blood of millions of his own people, priests, women, businessmen, farmers, and wage earners, and for the red flag and world revolution. They have been talking that way for 20 years; now let them make good, and let Congress provide free transportation with a one-way ticket.

I would do the same for the Nazis, Bundists, Fascists, and all others who seek to undermine and destroy our free institutions.

In the remaining time I want to discuss the results of the poll taken in my district, which shows as of noon today, a total of 30,461 postal ballots cast. Of these, 27,423 voted that the United States should stay out of war and 3,038 voted that the United States should enter the war now. This is almost exactly 90 percent opposed to war, being two one-hundredths of 1 percent above 90 percent, or 9 to 1.

I had anticipated a 2 or 3 to 1 majority against war, but am utterly amazed at the final 9 to 1 majority. The first day's poll showed a 6 to 1 majority against war, but when Hitler declared war on Soviet Russia the poll jumped to over 9 to 1, and has maintained the same average for the past week.

The poll has done what I hoped it would, by exposing the hypocrisy and virtual conspiracy of the war makers who, representing only 10 percent of the American people, have tried through the sheer weight of hysterical propaganda to bulldoze, frighten, and force 90 percent of the people into a foreign war against their will.

Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, one of my constituents, in her column My Day complains that the poll is unfair, but if the various qualifications and evasions that she suggests were incorporated the poll would have been of no value.

Every American knows, including Mrs. Roosevelt and the Cabinet, that we are on the brink of war. In my letter accompanying the postal ballot, I said that "I was conducting the poll to find out the sentiment of the people of my district on the greatest issue with which the American people have been confronted since the birth of the Republic. It transcends all political, social, and family affiliations."

It is plain evasion of the issue by Mrs. Roosevelt or anyone else to add "in case of attack." Every American would be in favor of defending America and going to war in case we were attacked, including the 90 percent who voted against war.

I confess that I have discounted Mrs. Roosevelt's war propaganda statements ever since she deliberately stated that President Roosevelt did not promise to keep this country out of war during the last campaign. The English language is still our customary method of conveying information. When the President said, "We will not participate in foreign wars, and we will not send our Army, naval or air forces to fight in foreign lands outside the Americas, except in case of attack," it meant to the American people and to the President precisely what he said.

The moving finger writes; and, having writ, moves on. Nor all Mrs. Roosevelt's piety nor wit shall lure it back to cancel half a line. Nor all her tears wash out a word of it.

I have enjoyed seeing the New York Herald Tribune, that arch interventionist newspaper, twist and squirm editorially at the 9-to-1 majority in my district and try to build up an alibi against such an overwhelming vote in opposition to our entrance into the war now. Why the New York Herald Tribune has for months been clamoring for war, yet when a clear-cut vote on that issue is taken and the result is against its views it starts to bellyache and whimper like a spoiled child.

The trouble is that the simple truth is the most disagreeable thing to face in the world. If the result of the poll had gone to suit the Herald Tribune, Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt and the interventionists and war makers, do you think they would have rushed into print with excuses, alibis, and evasive and red-herring arguments?

No; Mr. Editor of the Herald Tribune, Mrs. Roosevelt, et al, there have been no complaints from these who voted to stay out of war—they did not insist on details and specifications that might have only served to confuse the single greatest issue since the Declaration of Independence. They did not have to be told through qualified questions that aid to Great Britain and China was the accepted policy of the United States under the lend-lease bill. They did not have to be told that if we were attacked, or even Canada or South America, that we would defend this continent.

Mrs. Roosevelt and probably the President, my No. 1 constituent, ought to be interested in the poll at Hyde Park, which was 220 to stay out of war to 26 to go into war, or 89.5 percent. Garrison, my home district, was 205 to stay out and 24 to go in, or 89.4 percent. The Millbrook vote was 261 against 39, or 87 percent, Cornwall 138 to 23, 85 percent, and Tuxedo Park 179 to 44, the lowest, at 80 percent.

There were 137 persons who returned their ballots without marking them, or who wrote to me personal letters criticizing the poll. In answer to them, Mrs. Roosevelt, and the New York Herald Tribune, I will merely read an editorial from the Newburgh News, one of the largest daily newspapers in my district:

"Attack of Orange County town meeting on Representative HAMILTON FISH'S poll on the issue of peace or war takes the form of a charge that the ballot is unfair. We would say, instead, that the attack is unfair. Colonel FISH has made the issue simple and direct. His critics would make it complex, and bring in qualifications, with the result the poll would be of no merit at all."

The various pro-war groups in the district made a concerted campaign during the conduct of the poll over the radio and by holding meetings to get the voters to write in these protests. but since there were only a total of 137 who did so this campaign had very little effect on the people and their desire to keep out of war.

We are not in this war, and we are not going into this war, unless attacked. We are not going into any undeclared war, either. Congress alone can declare war. In spite of the fact that Capt. James Roosevelt says we are in the war now, I would, as an old veteran of the last war, remind him that war means shooting and killing and mud and blood, and so far there has been none.

It is preposterous to think of America being alined with Soviet Russia and Joseph Stalin as our pal and comrade, with his hands dripping with blood of murdered priests and nuns and the same dagger in his hand which he plunged into the backs of Poland, Latvia, Estonia, Lithuania and our friend the little honest Republic of Finland.

The issue of war or peace affects the security, safety, and destiny of America, and it must be decided by one yardstick and one yardstick alone, what is best for America.

I leave tomorrow for 4 weeks' military training at Fort Bragg, N. C., with full confidence that the destiny of America is safe in the judgment of the people who are 90 percent against war and in their elected Representatives in the Congress, and that America will not participate in any undeclared war or any foreign war without the approval of the Congress.

Present World Crisis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 30 (legislative day of Thursday, June 26), 1941

ADDRESS BY EDWARD J. FLYNN AT DENVER, COLO.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. Edward J. Flynn on June 14, 1941.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Tonight I wish to speak to you briefly about organization, politics, and their relation to our present world crisis.

It has always been my contention that a large part of my job as chairman of the Democratic National Committee is to do what I can to increase the efficiency and, incidentally, to increase the responsibility of the local organizations of the various States. We can do a lot of planning in Washington, but the actual work must be done by the State committees and county committees.

I do not know that it is the case here, but in certain other States we have found that our national committeeman and the local leaders sometimes get at cross-purposes. It is not because these political officials are not equally anxious for the success of the party, but differences arises, ambitions clash, strivings for prestige sometimes complicate things, and some of the effort that should be directed to organization work is dissipated as a result of these comparatively unimportant party divisions.

This trip of mine is largely to thoroughly familiarize myself with the status of Democratic affairs in a number of States. It is not for me to decide who is right and who is wrong in intraparty controversies, nor can I issue orders that one group or one individual have precedence over another. What I am striving to do, however, is to sit down as an impartial observer with representative Democrats and see if among us we cannot iron things out so that the Democracy of each State shall be thoroughly united and therefore capable of the best efforts in the next campaign.

It is no part of my function to lecture the Democrats of any State. You know better than I can know what differences exist and what steps are necessary to compose these differences. I hope that none of you will take my statements here as expressing criticism. There is no personal application, but there is an appeal for party loyalty and party unity.

And now I want to talk as an American. The welfare of the country is the paramount issue. What should we do in the distressing situation that confronts the world today? Some few years ago, at the start of this second great World War, people in this country felt that it would never spread to this country. They listened to Hitler and believed him when he told us that he did not want conquest, but wanted sufficient expansion for the German people so that they might be able to live. There was probably very little quarrel with his ideas along these lines. The American people believed that Germany was entitled to fair expansion in order that its people might have more security and contentment. Our President even suggested that a conference be arranged for this purpose, but his good offices were spurned.

If the war had stopped when Hitler obtained the expansion that he originally stated was necessary, the American people would probably not have been concerned with the great World War today. But it did not stop at that point. We who have watched have seen him destroy the freedom of Denmark, Poland, Norway, Belgium, Holland, France, and of Greece, not counting the domination of the Balkan countries and the nations along the Baltic Sea.

When that situation developed it was time to review our position insofar as the aims of Mr. Hitler were concerned. We then looked back, as we should look back, to a perusal of the aims that he set forth for the German Nation under his leadership. No one can dispute that in his book Mein Kampf, without equivocation, he stated that the German people were ordained to rule the entire world. It was at that point and at that point only that we, as Americans, knew that we must view with great alarm the doctrines that he set forth in his book. Nazi-ism and fascism are without doubt the most vicious forms of government that have yet been devised by man. They are molded from the one central idea, and that is that the state is supreme and the individual is merely a creature of the state, to be used in whatever manner the state decides to use him. To Americans who believe that the will of the people is the supreme law of the land this philosophy is so foreign to our form of democracy that the two can never come to agreement.

When we come to this conclusion insofar as our American way of life is concerned and insofar as our democracy is concerned, we must then—and we did again—review the situation and endeavor to find out what would be the best way of maintaining our democratic form of government.

Let us for a moment consider Germany. Let us see what happened to the various industries in Germany. Does anyone consider for one moment that our industries could exist under a form of nazi-ism? Certainly we know by actual fact that industry has become the creature of the state in Germany. It is no longer possible for individuals there to exercise their free right of business adventure. They must do what the state tells them to do—they must plant what the state tells them to plant—they must, in all things, hold themselves subject to the will of this overpowering monster: the Nazi state. Certainly there is no one in America who would be willing to live under that system of government.

There are those who say that this can never happen here—that we, within ourselves, are so constituted that we can isolate ourselves from the rest of the world and still continue living under the same conditions that we have in the past.

The most dangerous situation that confronts America today is not the invasion of this country by a foreign foe—although that may be possible—but the real danger and the real menace that we are facing is a world dominated by the Fascist and Nazi philosophy of government. Can we, with all of the advantages of living that we have in this country, compete with a world dominated by the Nazi philosophy—not only in Europe, but also in Asia and Africa?

This, in my opinion, is the crux of what we are fighting to maintain in this country. Combining the fear of invasion by troops with the greater menace of the invasion of Nazi philosophy we must protect our democratic way of life.

Now, let us be logical and let us face facts. I have no love for England. My forebears were of Irish ancestry. They suffered at the hands of England. That, however, does not deter me from believing that our first line of defense is England and the British Empire. At the present time, Britain is fighting a great fight. Her cities are in ruin; her civilian population has suffered the greatest privations that any nation has suffered in the history of the world. They are standing there as a solid wall against the philosophy that would defeat the very things that we hold dear in America.

From the physical standpoint, the defeat of Great Britain would mean Axis control of the industries, the agricultural resources, the shipbuilding facilities, and the armament plants of the entire world outside of the Americas. Against these resources, backed by the imposition of the totalitarian philosophy and economic system upon other continents, how long could we resist? How much faith could we attach to treaties or trade agreements with a nation without honor—a Nazi state that believes treaties and agreements are made only to be violated?

It amuses me somewhat to hear men who are opposed to the present policy of the President of the United States, but announce with great fervor their desire to prepare this country for any eventuality and to give all aid to Britain, term themselves "isolationists." This is an incongruous situation.

Certainly we are not isolationists, for we believe in preparation against a foe that might attack us—and certainly we are not isolationists when we believe in assisting Britain in the great fight she is waging.

I am not trying to appeal to the emotions of my listeners here tonight. I am trying to give a factual presentation of the situation that this country faces. I am trying to bring home to you in this great Middle West, the danger that lies ahead for our beloved country.

In this land men and women have come from every nation in the world. They have come here for a better way of life—they have come here for freedom of speech and for freedom of religion—rights and privileges that were very often denied them in the country from which they came. There is undoubtedly a spark of affection—and probably more than a spark of affection—for their lands. However they came here—they have become Americans and, in my opinion, they are Americans—first, last, and all of the time. Their feet are firmly planted on American soil—their hearts are filled with love of this great Nation, and when they are awakened to the personal and national peril occasioned by a tyrannical group of men who have subjected millions of individuals to their wills, they will forget nationalities and remember only that we are all citizens of a common country—believers in a common cause. The ambitions and the courage of men and women who braved the hazards of distance and privation to build new lives in a new country will inspire them to give their maximum support to the preservation of Americanism.

It is wise to approach this subject without rancor. It is wise to divest ourselves of whatever feeling that we might have for our lands of origin. We must approach this subject as Americans, and consider what is best for America. Is it better for America that the entire world should be dominated by Hitler's philosophies of force and of slavery? Is it better that the world should be dominated by an economic philosophy that does away with the rights of individuals to labor and to live as they will or is it better that throughout the world democracy, as we understand it, should triumph? That is the primary consideration insofar as America is concerned.

The President of the United States does not want war—no one wants war—but the President of the United States and the people of America want the honor and integrity of this country respected—and so we are arming to the teeth—we are arming so that in any eventuality that might confront us we will be ready and able to meet whatever force is directed against us.

Next year we face, perhaps, the most important session of Congress ever held. World conditions are such that no man knows what 1941 may bring forth. We do know that decisions of the utmost consequence to our country must be made. The Nation has entrusted these grave responsibilities to a Democratic administration. We can thank God that we have in the White House an experienced, courageous, and intellectually brilliant Chief Executive. He, with the support of Congress, must determine the course of this Government in a period of vital crisis.

The dictator powers have a distorted view of the significance of our elections. They convey to their populations that our party controversies and rivalries are evidences that a democracy cannot be united, and that the minority party's attitude constitutes a revulsion, if not a revolt, against President Roosevelt. Their controlled press never fails to stress this point of view, and the readers of those newspapers are permitted access to no other information.

It is our democratic belief that this sort of thing ought to be answered by an overwhelming endorsement of our President, through the election of Members of Congress and other officials, of the President's own political faith. That would be notice to the world that our country has confidence in its Chief Executive and applauds and approves his policies.

In my capacity as chairman of the Democratic National Committee, I urge the men and women of our party to put their organization in the best possible order. To forget whatever differences may have arisen in their own ranks and to make a supreme effort to elect Democratic Congressmen next year.

This is not because of any doubt that Republicans are as patriotic as the rest of us with respect to the emergency. The President testified to the same import when he named to head the martial departments of the Government two eminent Republicans, as well as when he drafted into the defense service leading figures from the industrial world without any inquiry concerning their politics. It happens that most of these men are Republicans. What of it?

Politics ceases at war, but not short of war, particularly in Congress. It is no mere coincidence that with a Democrat in the White House a majority of the Democrats uniformly vote for the various defense steps and, in most cases, a majority of the Republicans vote the other way.

The G. O. P. has not folded up. On the contrary, it is concentrating upon mending its fences, and laying the foundations for next year's elections. Politican organizations exist just for one purpose—and that is to win elections. Our minority party friends hope to get a majority of the House of Representatives. They will be disappointed, but that is not going to hinder their efforts as a prelude for regaining control of the Government 2 years later. Meanwhile it is their strategy to be as troublesome as possible. So they insist on debating on everything that is recommended by the administration as long and as bitterly as they think the country will stand it.

Let me make clear, however, that a few of the most influential of the minority leaders have turned their backs on such tactics. They know that whatever power Congress grants Congress can take away, and they place patriotism ahead of party.

The net result of opposition tactics is that it is likely to take many times as long to get things done in Congress as is needful, even allowing full time for complete consideration of every measure.

Therefore I insist that while it is obviously in the minority's interest to get as many of their people into Congress as possible, it is to our political and patriotic interest to see that as few of them get there as we can manage.

It is on this ground especially that I am asking Democrats to organize; to strengthen their clubs and start new ones; to avoid the party peril that lies in divided lines begotten of thwarted ambitions or personal hostilities or too bitter rivalries.

We need the help of every able party worker—even if we don't happen to like the color of his hair. Here, as elsewhere, no enrolled party membership is great enough to carry an election alone. To win we must have the adherence of a multitude of voters whose party ties are flimsy or even nonexistent. To get their support, systematic campaigning is necessary. Yours, like every other Middlewestern State, is progressive—liberal, if you prefer the term—and naturally belongs in our company. Give us the independent vote and with the ballots of enthusiastic regulars of our own order, victory will be ours. Our President has wrought well for our country. Now I call on you to reward him by making easier his even graver tasks. With maximum legislative assistance from a Democratic Congress, and with our supporting strength, he can lead us along the road to security and peace. Trusting in Divine Providence and with faith in our leadership, our singleness of purpose can make us invincible.

As Americans we love this country—as Americans, we believe in democracy; and when the issue is finally brought to the forefront and finally calls for a decision, I am convinced that the American people will think as Americans and act as Americans—and so preserve for our own children and our children's children a great heritage: the democratic way of life.

Air Power or Gold Braid

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK C. OSMERS, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. FRANK C. OSMERS, JR., OF NEW JERSEY

Mr. OSMERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address, which I delivered on the American Forum of the Air, Sunday, June 29, 1941, broadcast over the Mutual Broadcasting System:

Aside from those who have been raised in the stodgy traditions of the Army and Navy, almost everyone favors a separate and unified air force. Why? The average citizen is not thinking of war in terms of Hannibal's elephants crossing the Alps, Pickett's sabers at Cemetery Ridge, the Battle of Jutland, or the taxicabs of Paris at the Marne. Instead, when he is thinking of the future of his country and the safety of his home, his mind turns to the Battle of France, of the Atlantic, of Britain, of Crete, of fire bombs, incendiaries, and parachutists.

My advocacy of a separate and unified air force is the result of a firm conviction that without real air power the future safety and integrity of our country and its citizens is in serious jeopardy.

Frankly, does America's danger lie in an attack by enemy navies or land forces, or is our danger essentially and solely from the air?

The men charged with providing us with air power have failed to do their job. The Army and Navy brass hats still regard an air force as an auxiliary with which to support land or naval operations. Exactly the opposite is true. No operation in modern war can be conducted until a nation has obtained control of the air over the combat zone. Every battle of the present war proves that. How long would England last if she lost control of the air over the Channel? What would happen then to her gallant home defense?

If we are lucky, we shall have a two-ocean Navy in 1945. In several years we may have a modern Army, although serious question has been raised as to its fundamental concept. Secretary Stimson's recent order consolidating the Army's air forces is merely a sop to rising public opinion and indignation.

To our everlasting discredit we have ridiculed and cashiered those few hardy and farsighted prophets who saw the reasons for a separate air force after the first World War. We have turned over this vital arm of our national defense to gold-braided philosophers in ivory towers. No military machine can rise above its leadership, and the ceiling we have placed on our air force threatens our national integrity.

In some measure to counteract that, I am introducing on Monday an amendment to my bill for a separate air force and a department of air. It will create a United States air academy so that the air officers of the future will be steeped in the traditions of the air force as those of West Point and Annapolis are steeped in the traditions of the Army and the Navy.

A typical constituent of mine said to me the other day: "I like your bill for a separate air force and a department of air, but I do not think it goes far enough. Air power is ruling the world. Make the Army and the Navy subordinate to the air force."

Now, I do not subscribe to any such complete housecleaning. We shall always need a land Army and a strong Navy. Obviously we cannot defend this hemisphere, or invade Europe, Asia, and Africa as some would have us do, without a strong separate and unified air force commanded by airmen. Great Britain's defense best illustrates that. That being so, why place our defense in the hands of men who think in terms of bulk armies and giant dreadnaughts like the Bismarck and the Hood? That is just like placing a man who used to run a livery stable in charge of a modern garage.

The vitamins A, B, and C of air power are the planes, the men, the leadership. We have the men. We can build the planes. We must supply the leadership.

Committee for Reciprocity Information

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER F. GEORGE

OF GEORGIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 30 (legislative day of Thursday, June 26), 1941

STATEMENT BY E. P. THOMAS

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement made by Mr. E. P. Thomas, president of the National Foreign Trade Council, Inc., before the Committee for Reciprocity Information in connection with the negotiations for trade agreements with Argentina and Uruguay at a hearing held in Washington, D. C., on June 25, 1941.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The National Foreign Trade Council filed on June 12, 1941, briefs with the Committee for Reciprocity Information relative to the trade agreements now under consideration with the Republics of Argentina and Uruguay. When the subject of a trade agreement previously was considered in the case of the Argentine Republic—in October of 1939—the council likewise filed a brief and I had the honor to appear before this committee.

In view of the material currently or previously filed with the committee, I will refrain from repetition and from entering into details regarding the proposed agreements.

It was a matter of keen disappointment to all foreign trade interests represented by the council, that the previous negotiations for these trade agreements were not consummated following the hearings in October 1939. Whether this failure was due to the unwise opposition of sectional or political elements in this country, or for other reasons, it created a most unfavorable impression.

Coming several months after the outbreak of the present World War, when the economy of our Latin American neighbors—particularly that of Argentina and Uruguay—was so severely disrupted by the loss of European markets, this failure to bring about a reciprocal understanding with Argentina had a profoundly unfavorable effect not only on our political and commercial relations with that country, but a reactionary effect on our trade relations with other countries. It was damaging to the prestige internationally of the Hull trade policy, and particularly in the Latin American countries which had agreed to adhere to that policy. It meant a continuation of exchange discrimination against us in Argentina and other detrimental obstacles, to which we have referred in our brief, filed on June 12, 1941.

At a time when it was becoming so necessary to Pan-American solidarity to reinforce our political and economic relations with the other Americas, to insure mutual adherence to our reciprocal trade agreement policy, the effort to bring about these improved relations met with an unfortunate setback. It is now proposed to undo the harm and the wrong then done by our failure to achieve such better relations, which would have been insured had trade agreements then been effected.

The National Foreign Trade Council is an advisory and coordinating body whose functions are nonpolitical. It represents trade interests of the whole country on a purely national and nonsectional basis.

The National Foreign Trade Council and the annual conventions held under its auspices have given unswerving approval of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act from its inception. It was annually endorsed by them as the most effective means for counteracting the unilateral, bartering, and compensation methods of totalitarian powers, which already had affected our trade disadvantageously in many world areas and had seriously affected the economy of a number of American nations.

Now, and in all the Americas more than ever, it is necessary to insure solidarity and mutual cooperation for purposes of hemispheric economic defense. The obvious and logical process for attainment of these aims is through reciprocal concessions, which is the basis of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

The keystone of pan-American reciprocity is the River Plate area. In the opinion of the foreign traders which the council represents the trade agreements now under consideration by your committee are the most important of all such remaining agreements. On the satisfactory negotiation of these agreements rests the future cohesion of the Americas, both economical and political. They will prove to be a boon to United States industry as a whole, and, by strengthening the economic positions of Argentina and Uruguay, leave them less vulnerable to economic, and consequent political, pressure from totalitarian powers.

The remarkable feature of the agreements under consideration is that they can be operated effectively without financial sacrifice on the part of the United States and, in fact, with distinct benefit on a national basis. Even those regional interests who consider that these trade agreements would constitute a threat, theoretical or otherwise, to their sectional and exclusionary objectives, could be assured of reasonable safeguards under such agreements and still retain in the agreements all of the mutual benefits. Any broad condemnation of the agreements, or demands for extreme protection for special production in which the United States is not self-contained, would be tantamount to a reopening of the whole question of reciprocal trade agreement policy and the neutralizing of the law which has reiterated and confirmed it.

Legitimate objections to concessions, which can be substantiated as harmful to American economy as a whole, can be satisfied by the exercise of governmental controls, without resort to, or continuance of, exclusionary procedure, which in the past has been so detrimental to our trade relations by import restrictions that vitiated the vaunted good-neighbor policy.

Prohibitive tariffs, on a product of which the United States production is insufficient, is nothing but a direct charge and hardship on the American consumer and the foreign producer. The latter is called upon to supplement the insufficiency without adequate compensation, and the exchange available to purchase United States goods and services is thereby reduced. This results in decreased employment in United States factories, and on farms which otherwise would benefit by the increased buying power from factory employees arising from increased exports. Insistence on prohibitive tariffs is poor economics and bad politics. The effective exclusion of a product, on the theory that it would bring contamination of disease, is too evidently a sanitary subterfuge refutable by conclusive evidence of a scientific character.

I am convinced that nothing but the national interest as a whole, and the need at this time for hemispheric solidarity, should be permitted to affect the carrying out of the trade agreements under consideration. Having regard to the economic benefits to be derived by the United States—not only during the present period of stress, but on an increased scale as a long-term policy looking to an era of peace—there would appear to be no sound reason for deferring the completion of these agreements. When this consideration is coupled with the obvious desirability and, in fact, absolute need, for solidifying the pan-American economic and political fronts, all specious arguments for isolationist protection of production insufficient for national needs, should yield to this war-time emergency.

The post-war return of the world to normal, multilateral, reciprocal trading on the most-favored-nation basis is predicated on a reaffirmation of our adherence to this policy by the consummation of these trade agreements as outstanding evidence of our good faith, and of our firm intention to aid these and all other American nations in the most practical form at our disposal, and one of mutual advantage.

I thank you.

Prospective Entry of United States Into European War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 30 (legislative day of Thursday, June 26), 1941

ARTICLE BY LARRY RUE

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article appearing in the Times Herald of Washington of this morning entitled "London Forecasts United States Entry Into War Almost Any Day."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Times-Herald]

LONDON FORECASTS UNITED STATES ENTRY INTO WAR ALMOST ANY DAY—HITLER'S DOOM SEEN IN AMERICAN ACTION; LONE VOICE RAISED AGAINST AID TO REDS

(By Larry Rue)

LONDON, June 29.—"United States Troops May Go Overseas."

This headline on the front page of the Sunday Express over a Washington story stating that the United States administration has "decided to ask Congress for a formal declaration of a national emergency in order to give President Roosevelt a free hand in defense moves," is one of the many press intimations that America may throw her full military and naval force into the war.

Such a declaration from Congress, the story explains, "would lift restrictions on the President's power to order troops to points outside the Western Hemisphere and would give him the powers lacking under the national emergency proclamation which he has already issued without formal concurrence of Congress."

The Sunday Times, reporting the same story, captioned "Roosevelt asks for new powers, free hand urged," refers readers to a story on the editorial page under the caption "United States," and informs them: "Intervention in every way the aim."

The New York correspondent cables how President Roosevelt succeeded in establishing a policy of aid to Russia without encountering "congressional opposition of much consequence" and adds that the "wide concensus" in America is that the time now is ripe for her to strike.

SMASHING MOVE FORECAST

The Sunday Empire-News front pages a story by its diplomatic correspondent stating, "Important moves forecast; swift and bold." The forecast reads:

"Within a very short time, probably within the next few days, we may expect an important declaration which may definitely turn the tide of war. It will make a vast impression throughout the world and demolish any hope Hitler might have concerning his Russian onslaught. More cannot be said at the moment, but I am convinced the move is imminent."

In the meantime, the diplomatic correspondent promises that Britain can be depended upon to develop the offensive against Germany and strike crippling blows at her war industries, her Luftwaffe, her Army, and, equally important, her morale.

He says the German attack against Russia, instead of lulling the United States into lethargy, has only spurred them on to greater efforts.

HITLER'S DOOM PREDICTED

The tabloid Sunday Graphic editorializes: "Russia, America, and Britain fighting together can hold Hitler until winter comes and spell his impending doom," and predicts that the "reaction of the American people can be only one thing, 'Very well, we will show him.'"

It thinks that Independence Day is a good time for the United States and Britain to celebrate, "not with firecrackers, but with the boom of guns and the crash of bombs making war upon the enemy."

"America can play a tremendous part in insuring the survival of Russia," writes Editor John Gordon in the Sunday Express, suggesting that "even without declaring war America could mobilize her best technicians and pour them through Vladivostok into Russia."

He urges that "our business now is to kill Germans and Italians ruthlessly and remorselessly wherever they are" and advises that "even if we regard Italy so tenderly that we are loath to do the bombing ourselves, borrow a few squadrons of Russians to do it for us. It would pay big dividends."

The London Times suggests the manner in which the United States might extend naval aid. "There are sites, for instance," it points out, "in British Gambia, no more than a day's motor run from Dakar, which might be leased to the United States, similar to the West Indian bases, and provide facilities for effective patrol of important routes.

"The possibilities of this new use of a small British possession now nearing its centenary as a crown colony might well be further explored."

Committee for Reciprocity Information

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER F. GEORGE

OF GEORGIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 30 (legislative day of Thursday, June 26), 1941

STATEMENT BY MRS. HARRIS T. BALDWIN

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement made by Mrs. Harris T. Baldwin, vice president of the National League of Women Voters, before the Committee for Reciprocity Information on June 23, 1941.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The National League of Women Voters wishes to express support of trade agreements with Argentina and Uruguay. Through the already proved methods of the trade-agreements program, long supported by the league, we believe it possible further to reduce trade barriers on a nondiscriminatory basis in the Western Hemisphere. In addition to the economic advantage from these trade agreements, they would be a demonstration of economic cooperation among free nations, strengthening democratic government everywhere. They present an alternative to totalitarian trade methods in other parts of the world. Failure to negotiate these agreements would be most discouraging to inter-American cooperation at this juncture of world affairs.

By our tariffs of 1922 and 1930, particularly the latter, we dealt severe blows to Argentine and Uruguayan exports to the United States, thereby curtailing their purchasing power for United States goods and cutting off our exports to those countries. Our own tariff policy prior to 1934 thus turned these countries away from the United States market to Europe and gave Europe an advantage in their markets.

This situation was undesirable in peacetime, with serious effects on our general as well as on our trade relations with these two countries. In the present critical circumstances it is of utmost importance to bring about a change in this situation—to attempt to correct by economic cooperation the damage done by economic warfare.

Trade agreements with Argentina and Uruguay would be of immediate benefit to the three countries. We need many of the products they have available for export, particularly strategic and critical materials required in carrying forward our defense program—our battle of production for defense at home and aid abroad. They need increased purchasing power with which to buy goods which we are in a position to supply, including articles they have normally bought from Europe. The economic situation in the other American Republics generally, particularly in South America, has become critical by reason of the loss of European markets, shortage of shipping, and other disruptions growing out of the war.

In order to prevent social and political instability in the Western Hemisphere, sound economic conditions are essential. While under our good-neighbor policy and as a part of our defense program we are extending loans and credits to Latin American countries, including Argentina and Uruguay, continental solidarity can be permanently developed only on the basis of mutually beneficial trade relations. The long-time defense of the Western Hemisphere therefore requires the negotiation of trade agreements with Argentina and Uruguay.

The National League of Women Voters has addressed this statement to the Committee for Reciprocity Information as evidence of public support of the trade-agreements program.

Maine Is Still Mother of Ships

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH O. BREWSTER

OF MAINE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 30 (legislative day of Thursday, June 26), 1941

ARTICLE BY RICHARD MATTHEWS HALLET

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article on shipbuilding, published in the Christian Science Monitor of June 28, 1941.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Christian Science Monitor of June 28, 1941]

MAINE IS STILL MOTHER OF SHIPS

(By Richard Matthews Hallet)

The legend of the Old Man of the Sea is accurate. He can take many shapes. He can take the shape of a playtime idol, redolent of springtide glories, and the full-summer regattas of small sailing craft crowded with "golden boys and girls." And he can take the shape of national extinction, as he did for the modern Americans' predecessors in the Western Hemisphere, the Aztecs. The sea is not a shield, but a sword, a naked blade for the nation that can fit a handle to it. And that handle is, and always has been, ships.

Overnight—and not for the first time overnight—the people of the United States have perceived the fact. Lately in Congress it was pointed out that in the World War a baker's dozen of German submarines had worked mischief on our shores. A hundred modern submarines could do incalculable mischief with torpedo, gas, and mine. We must have a defense, a patrol against mine-laying submarines. We must have mine sweepers.

At once $400,000,000 was appropriated for these mine sweepers, and, since a shortage of steel was foreseen, $300,000,000 of that sum was earmarked for wooden hulls. From the floor of the Senate, Senator MILLARD TYDINGS, of Maryland, announced that these hulls would be built mostly on the Great Lakes.

Instantly Senator RALPH O. BREWSTER, of Maine, was on his feet. He was new to the Senate. This was his maiden speech there, and he drove it in like a wedge to break up this great raft of an appropriation drifting toward the West. Had the Senator from Maryland forgotten that Maine was mother of ships, that for three centuries she had built wooden ships, and that these ships had showed a clean pair of heels to anything afloat? Maine still had the skills, the art was not lost there, though the shipyards were empty and the chips in them were gray.

Senator TYDINGS receded from his position, and shortly naval officers made a survey of these Maine shipyards, checking skills and equipment. The builders were asked to submit proposals for 97-foot and 135-foot wooden hulls. Contracts followed. Boothbay region yards alone now have more than $3,000,000 in these contracts. Rockland and Camden total still more. The industry, at the point of extinction, has been revived again. Good judges of trees are in the woods, marking oak for keels and cutwaters, and in the boat sheds keels are on the ways.

An art or craft, it seems, can never be quite lost so long as men still live who have practiced it. Old hands on the Maine coast are showing young hands how to go to work. The other day at East Boothbay I saw a young apprentice dubbing away with a paring adz at a balk of oak timber. The old adzman at his side, who knew how to take a shaving no thicker than rice paper, chuckled and cast a sidelong look.

"Little and often is Jim's motto here," he said. "He goes at it to make a hole like a wood pecker, and that's a strain on a man's neck. But he'll learn."

The master builders are "down on their marrow bones" in the mold lofts, laying down the ships' lines from Navy blueprints. In the old days they took these lines from models. They whittled out their ships in little, and held them first in the hollow of their hands. If you wanted a 200-foot ship, you made a 4-foot model; and when you risked your reputation on that model, you had to have an eye for ships. The least error in design on that small scale and the ship herself would sail "like a crab."

J. J. Wardwell, Rockland master builder, who has designed 150 ships and built 83 under his own hand, says that in shipbuilding the end is implied in the beginning, just as with any other work of art. He likes models better than lines, blueprints. He tells of building a pogie steamer for a famous Boston ship designer.

"That fellow worked from lines," Wardwell says a little disdainfully. "He came down here when the hull was shaping up, and I said to him, 'She's too sharp forward. I think she'll bury.'

"That Boston designer didn't think so. He had got the lines worked out to satisfy him; so we went ahead with her. When she put to sea she buried herself so deep she washed the anchor off her fo'c'sle head.

"So the designer said, 'You don't like lines. Try it your way. Build a model for the next one.'"

Wardwell built a model and lugged it up to Young's Hotel in Boston. The ship designer took one look at it and confessed the folly of his ways.

"I didn't want to make feeling, but I do set a lot of store by models," Wardwell says. "That fellow gave in. 'Take her from the model,' he told me. I did, and that ship carried 1,000 barrels more fish and was only a knot slower than the first one, for all her blunter lines. Well, why not? You look at a model and you can see what you have got. You work from lines, and you have got to reason it to yourself whether she will sail or not. You can't just look and see."

But if you are going to just look and see—and know forthwith—you have to start young. Wardwell was 12 years old when he went to work under his father at Stockton Springs. At first he tended the steam box, where the planks were steamed for bending. Soon he was strong enough to drive the reaming irons ahead of the deck calkers, opening the seams to receive oakum. Later he worked with adz and broadax. It's a cruel thing to get the hang of.

Wardwell got two pine-tree shillings a day for his work, so you can see it wasn't yesterday when he first had the smell of sour oak in his nostrils. He's 88 now, and makes a true part of Maine's shipbuilding legend.

You begin a ship, of course, by tipping up her keel; and for keels you must have oak. "Nothing like oak," most builders say. "It's the natural underwater wood." Wallace Goudy of East Boothbay, one of the best judges of standing trees, says that oak, when cut, should first be dropped into a pond, or into salt water, for, say, 6 weeks. Gray oak sinks at once, and the water draws the acid out of it. Many Maine builders have supplies of oak already soaking. If a man knows where good ship oak is, he keeps it dark—like the fellow who won't tell you where mayflowers are springing. An average oak tree sells for $10. Lately, a 90-foot stick sold for $36; but such a stick is almost too big to be handled by the cant dogs.

Once the keel is tipped up, the builder sways the stern frame into place. The frames—the ribs—are bolted together on a staging at the ship's prow, slid down greased planks laid on top of the keel, and tilted up with tackles. These frames, when in place, give the ship's form.

"How do you know the ship is true? How do you fair her up?" I asked one master builder. "How do you fix it so she doesn't bulge on one side more than on the other?"

"In the old days," he said, "they used to fair her up by eye."

"The master builder took his stand at the prow, and had axemen and adzmen on either side. He waggled his port flipper and the adzmen dubbed a little on that side. He waggled his starboard flipper, and then the starboard adzmen dubbed a little."

That was rule-of-thumb with a vengeance. Later builders carried up a center line, and from that measured out to each side every little while "to see how she was running." Usually she didn't vary a half inch either way.

Once the ship is in frame, the planking goes on; and all agree that the planks must be "wedged snug." Wood to wood. If you can see daylight between the planks, then later in a seaway, the ship will have some play there. She'll "work like a basket," and maybe "spew her oakum," in the trade jargon. And then in all likelihood she'll "pop a plank," and if the cargo happens to be paving stone, as it was in plenty of Maine schooners, why, down she'll go.

In former days, the plank fasteners were wooden trunnels—tree nails—except for the butt bolts. The pod auger men dipped their augers in grease, and bored the holes; and then the trunnelmen sledged home the trunnels, and drove little wedges in their heads to spread them and make a true fastening. This made all one wooden skin, and had more flexibility than iron, which, if it once bends, stays bent. But these mine-sweeper hulls, with smaller planks, must be spiked and not trunnelled.

Masts are no great problem on a mine sweeper, and can be stepped easily enough. But in the old schooner-building days of Camden, Rockland, Bath, and Boothbay Harbor, masts and spars were already hard to find. Maine forests as early as the seventeenth century supplied masts for the British Navy and the King's broad arrow on the straight pine marked it for its destiny. Straight trees, even in a virgin forest, were few and far between, even by the nineteenth century. Now it is harder than ever to find tall spars growing in the woods. But mine sweepers need only stumpy spars.

The sparmaker gets his "eights" by snapping chalked string down against the peeled round of his spar; planes it 8-sided with a wooden plane; turns the 8 sides into 16; and so approaches roundness, mingling the smell of pine resin in the yard with the smell of the ship's sour oak. By now the hull, too, is planed to a satin finish; and the masts are stepped by purchases hanging from giant shear poles which straddle the mast holes in the deck.

It was an old custom for the owner to drop a $5 gold piece into the step before he stepped his mast; and there is a tale of one such owner, "tighter than a miser's dream of heaven," who substituted a bright penny for gold—but the sea gods marked this treachery, and the ship, coming from New Caledonia with a cargo of nickel ore, hung her forefoot out over a wave, broke open amidships, and went down.

Launchings are ticklish. The sea is called the ship's native element, but the ship sometimes holds herself aloof, and will not feel "that thrill of life along her keel." Sometimes she sticks, and Tom Walker and high water together can't slide her overboard. Then the builder must shore her up, dig out the ways, and build them up for a second launching. Once at Searsport, they had to take the ways out three times from under a cantankerous ship. According to Kit Marlowe, there was once a "face that launched a thousand ships." That was the face of Helen of Troy. On the Maine coast, beef tallow is considered better—tallow, with a smear of lard on top of it. But even tallow has been known to stick.

"I remember when we launched the John B. Prescott at Camden, Maine," says J. J. Wardwell. "It was a winter morning, 14 below zero. We had greased the ways with beef tallow, same as always; but it froze hard. The Prescott didn't seem to want to go. We split out the keel blocks, and still she couldn't quite make up her mind. When she did start, she was 20 minutes going just the first 3 feet. You could see her inch along, and that was all. H. M. Bean, the builder, was fit to be tied. Says I, 'Mr. Bean, don't you tear your shirt. You get me a couple of dishes of thin oil, and I'll see what I can do.' * * * I had left a couple of feet between the bilgeways, and I poured the oil in there, and away she went, smooth as a smelt, and left the ways smoking."

The song of a bird can start an avalanche, and a dish of oil can launch a ship. But it takes elbow grease to build one. Likewise it takes art, and the art can never be lost while the Maine legend lives.

Shortage of Oil and Gasoline in the East

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 30 (legislative day of Thursday, June 26), 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE DECATUR (ILL.) REVIEW

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a short editorial entitled "Realizing the Situation," printed in the Decatur Review of May 31, 1941.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Decatur Review of May 31, 1941]

REALIZING SITUATION

Because the East is short on gasoline and oil, gasless Sundays may be imposed on the entire country. It sounds somewhat like New York going on daylight saving time and the broadcasting companies subjecting the entire country to a change in broadcasting hours.

The shortage of oil and gasoline in the East is due to transfer of tankers to the British. When one-fifth of the tankers that have served Texas gasoline to the Atlantic seaboard began delivering their loads to Britain the East was pinched. Oil lines reach up into the Middle West, one gasoline pipe line ending just north of Decatur at Forsyth.

The threat of gasless Sundays may be more than a threat. For weeks there have been hints of what would have to be done, but the country continues to go along and here and there you hear that most of the talk is an attempt to scare people into a warlike frame of mind. Others say the people are being eased into the situation. Even the big tax bill that has been talked about will not get through Congress before August.

Perhaps gasless Sundays, a sudden stop because of priorities, new and heavy taxes, will awaken the people to the situation that Washington says exists.

Twenty Years of Forestry Progress in the Lower South, 1921–41

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HALE BOGGS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

REPORT BY E. L. DEMMON

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am including an interesting and informative report which describes the magnificient work and achievements of the Southern Forest Experiment Station at New Orleans.

Entitled "Twenty Years of Forestry Progress in the Lower South, 1921–41," this report was compiled by E. L. Demmon, director of the station. I commend it to the Members of the House for their study.

TWENTY YEARS OF FORESTRY PROGRESS IN THE LOWER SOUTH, 1921–41

(By E. L. Demmon, director, Southern Forest Experiment Station)

On July 1, 1921, as a result of congressional action, the Southern Forest Experiment Station was established, with headquarters at New Orleans, La. This was 1 of the first 3 such regional stations to be organized; others were set up later and at present there are 12 regional forest experiment stations in continental United States.

Now, after 20 years, it seems appropriate to review briefly the progress of forestry in the lower South (that section within the boundaries of the Southern Forest Experiment Station territory, including the States of Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, as well as southern Arkansas, eastern Texas, and eastern Oklahoma), during these last two decades and to appraise the important forestry tasks immediately ahead, giving particular consideration to the role of forest research in these concerns.

Although definite progress has been made since 1921, the 1941 situation is not one to cause great exultation. Over 50 percent of the forests of the lower South still lack organized fire protection, with the result that about 20 percent of the total forest area is burned over each year. Most of the present forest stands are greatly understocked and are producing but a fraction of their potential capacities. Too much cutting is still done in disregard of silvicultural principles, especially in the operations of the thousands of small portable mills in this region. Many millions of acres of southern forest lands are in need of planting if they are to grow timber crops within any reasonable period and adequately safeguard soil and water resources. Markets are lacking for great quantities of low-grade material and of little-used tree species and for the potential production of naval stores (turpentine and rosin). All in all, southern forest lands, under good management, are capable of providing continuous employment and hence higher standards of living for at least double the number of persons they now support. The idleness or only partial use of many millions of acres of southern forest land, unsuited to or not needed for farming, represents a great economic loss to the region and to the United States. To take full advantage of the opportunities offered by its forests, the South needs additional forest industries and remanufacturing plants, effecting a higher degree of processing, and the production of more goods for the consumer market.

The South also needs, now more than ever before, an outlet for the surplus of labor resulting from the decline of its main source of cash income, cotton. Not only did the cultivated area of cotton in the 13 southeastern cotton-producing States decline from a peak of 46,000,000 acres in 1925 to less than 25,000,000 acres in 1940, but the recent losses in export markets caused by the war will undoubtedly result in further reductions in cotton planting. This displacement of land and labor from the chief cash crop of the region points to a tragic need for readjustments in land use and for additional opportunities for employment. In any such readjustment, the South's forest lands, occupying 6 out of every 10 acres of its present land area, should be utilized to the fullest extent. Application of such a program, however, is not simple; it involves cooperation by many agencies in the careful drafting and execution of such plans as will insure that both the land and its resources are utilized conservatively and for the greatest good of all the people.

Prior to 1921, forestry had made little headway in the lower South, although some significant work had been begun. A few timberland owners had initiated simple forest-management practices following surveys of their holdings and the preparation of detailed management plans by the United States Forest Service, but most of those efforts were sporadic and shortlived. In 1921, there were only two States in the lower South with active forestry departments, Texas and Louisiana, whose departments were established in 1915 and 1917, respectively. Only one forest school in the lower South was in operation in 1921, at the University of Georgia, having been established there in 1906. The Southern Forestry Congress, organized by a public-spirited group of foresters, lumbermen, and conservationists, played an outstanding part in stimulating forestry development throughout the South, from its inception in 1916 until its final (12th) meeting in 1930.

In 1921 there were but few national forests in the lower South. These totaled only about a million and a half acres net and were made up largely of unappropriated portions of the public domain, supplemented somewhat through purchases made under the Weeks law of 1911.

Organized forest-fire protection in 1921, which consisted mainly of seasonal patrol, existed only on the national forests and on somewhat less than 8,000,000 acres of private forest land. The lumber companies providing forestry measures other than fire protection could be counted on the fingers of one hand. A few industrial forestry pioneers, among whom Henry T. Hardtner, of Urania, La., and Col. William H. Sullivan, of the Great Southern Lumber Co., at Bogalusa, La., were outstanding, had begun to practice conservative cutting, including the leaving of seed trees, and had undertaken some artificial reforestation, but the general run of timberland owners were still unimpressed with the possibilities of growing another crop of timber. What finally sold a number of lumbermen on forestry was the realization that some of the trees they were cutting had grown to maturity since their sawmills were first established.

FORESTRY DEVELOPMENTS, 1921–41

A number of significant actions have stimulated forestry progress in the lower South during the last 20 years. The study of the national forestry situation made by the United States Forest Service pursuant to Senate Resolution 311 (66th Cong., 2d sess.), introduced by Senator CAPPER, was published as Timber Depletion, Lumber Prices, Lumber Exports, and Concentration of Timber Ownerships, June 1, 1920. Interest was aroused as a result of the hearings held in the South by the committee on national forestry policy of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States during 1922, and also the hearings of the Select Committee on Reforestation of the United States Senate (S. Res. 398, 67th Cong., 4th sess.), of which Senator CHARLES L. MCNARY was chairman, held in Florida, Mississippi, and Louisiana in March 1923, which were followed in 1924 by the passage of the Clarke-McNary Act, broadening the provisions of the old Weeks Act of 1911 for cooperation between the Federal Government and the States in fire protection, planting, forest-extension work, and forest tax study and reform.

Stimulating influences during the latter part of this period were the national forestry picture presented by the Forest Service in its comprehensive report "A National Plan for American Forestry" (Copeland Report) in 1933; the greatly expanded program of Federal acquisition of land for national forests and of increased fire protection on Federal, State, and private lands as a result of the establishment of the Civilian Conservation Corps in 1933, and of other emergency relief organizations which furnished labor and materials for forestry programs; the formulation of minimum forest conservation practices under Article X of the Lumber Code (under the National Industrial Recovery Act) in 1933 and 1934, and the setting up of conservation agencies by the trade associations representing the pine, hardwood, and cypress industries in the South; the voluntary adoption of specific forest conservation practices by the representatives of the southern pulp and paper mills in 1937; and the open hearings before the Joint Congressional Committee on Forestry held in Jacksonville, Fla., in November 1938, and in Mobile, Ala., in November 1939. Of outstanding importance in the southern forestry movement has been the work of three Federal foresters: Dr. Austin Cary among lumbermen and turpentine owners, W. R. Mattoon among the southern farmers, and W. W. Ashe in the national-forest acquisition program. Their efforts combined with those of other public-spirited men and groups bore fruit in the establishment during this period of State forestry departments in the six remaining States in the lower South—Alabama (1924), Georgia (1925), Mississippi and Oklahoma (1926), Florida (1928), and Arkansas (1933). The work of these State forestry departments has contributed in no small degree to the advances made in forestry during the past 20 years. Other notable contributions have been made by the work of the State extension foresters. Georgia was the first State to appoint an extension forester (1924), followed by Alabama and Texas (1925), Louisiana and Arkansas (1926), Mississippi (1927), Florida (1933), and lastly, Oklahoma (1940).

The last 20 years has witnessed the establishment of two additional professional forestry schools in the lower South, at Louisiana State University in 1925 and at the University of Florida in 1935.

With the growth of the State forestry departments, great strides were made in fire protection, which has been the chief activity of these organizations. In 1940 there were over 57,000,000 acres of forest land in Federal, State, and private ownership under organized protection in the lower South. Notwithstanding this progress, over 50 percent of the forest land in this region is at present without organized fire protection.

Rapid expansion of the national-forest program in the South made a new regional administrative office necessary. Regional headquarters were established in July 1934 at Atlanta, Ga. Aside from administration of the national forests, which had increased to 6,716,188 acres in the lower South by June 30, 1940, one of the most important activities of the Atlanta office lies in the stimulation of private forestry practice through its Division of State and Private Forestry.

Private forestry has advanced notably since 1921, largely as a result of the increased opportunities for organized fire protection through cooperative Federal and State funds that became available for that purpose. With gradual cutting out of the original virgin forests and the increasing acceptance of the value of second growth, everywhere there have been signs that timberland owners and operators were beginning to realize the potentialities of forest growth. Leaving of seed trees, cutting to a diameter limit, protection from fire, and in some cases artificial reforestation have appeared as significant steps toward good forestry.

Some of the stimulation given southern forestry during the last few years has come about as a result of the phenomenal expansion of the pulp and paper industry in the South. In large part, as an outcome of the pioneering research work of the United States Forest Products Laboratory at Madison, Wis., and the stimulating influence of Dr. Charles H. Herty, this industry has not only taken national leadership in the production of kraft paper and board, of which it now produces 80 percent of the United States requirements, but has also branched out into the fields of white paper, newsprint, and rayon. The capacity of wood-pulp production in the 11 Southeastern States has been increased rapidly; in 1941 it will probably reach 4,000,000 tons, using about 6,000,000 standard cords of wood, and accounting for over 40 percent of the total United States production of pulp.

Appraising the progress of forestry is not an easy task. Undoubtedly, much forestry is being practiced, respecting which no records are available. The latest data on the area of land under good forest management, compiled by the United States Forest Service in 1938, indicated that over 13,000,000 acres of commercial forest land in industrial and other private ownership (not including farm ownership) in the lower South was being managed with the objective of continuous production. Many of these large forest-land owners have hired technically trained foresters; their holdings, along with the National and State forests, are serving as examples of good forestry practice. A few municipal forests have also been established.

RESEARCH AND FORESTRY PROGRESS

Little has been said thus far of the place of research in the progress of forestry in the lower South. Research contributions have been made by some of the State forestry departments, the forest schools, the forest industries, and such organizations as the United States Forest Products Laboratory, but the discussion here will be confined to Federal forest research at the Southern Forest Experiment Station. Although at first glance southern station contributions may seem more or less obscure, because they have not been especially spectacular, they have unquestionably helped to prepare and smooth the way for southern forestry progress.

These contributions have been made in a number of ways. The Southern Forest Experiment Station staff has prepared and distributed a great number of timely reports containing current findings based on its studies, thousands of letters of advice and guidance have been written in response to inquiries, numerous talks and addresses have been delivered before a variety of different groups, many conferences have been held with people desiring forestry information based on research findings, frequent demonstrations on the station's nine experimental forests and at other centers of station work have been arranged, and cooperation has been extended to public and private forestry agencies throughout the South, all of which taken together must have exerted a real influence on the development of better forestry practices. Many station contributions to the knowledge and techniques of southern forestry are now in wide use throughout the region.

Starting in 1921, with a handful of forest technicians, new to the job of research, the station has gradually expanded and carried through a definite program aimed at determining the scientific basis for sound forest management. Since the station was established it has gathered and disseminated much preliminary information, but because timber growing is such a long-time enterprise, and because of the great diversity of soils, forest types, land uses, and economic conditions in the station's territory, embracing as it does over 120,000,000 acres of forest land, much vital information essential for permanent, successful forest-land management is still lacking.

A LOOK AHEAD

The past two decades have seen substantial and encouraging growth in the practice of forestry in the lower South. This progress, however, has been only a start toward the goal of intensive use of the 120,000,000 acres of forest land in this region. But 20 years, after all, is a relatively short period in the life of a tree or a forest, and shorter still in the life of a nation. Let us be encouraged, therefore, by the substantial progress made and the visible results obtained. Certainly, with increased forestry practice in this region vital to its future economic security, with such an enormous area of land available and apparently suitable for no more intensive use, and with so much to be learned about the technique of timber growing, there can be little question about the need and urgency of an adequate program of forest research.

There seems no doubt that the South will continue to show progress in forestry practice, unless our whole world is turned topsy-turvy. In the present national effort toward defense southern forests are playing an important part, contributing much-needed lumber, naval stores, paper, and other products, as well as sites for Army camps and training maneuvers.

This increased demand for forest products has been particularly great during the last year, when the demand for lumber and timbers for defense construction work, added to normal requirements, has undoubtedly led to an excessive drain on southern forests. The fact that much of this cutting is done with no regard for the future and to the serious detriment of our forest resource should give us cause for concern. The situation emphasizes the need for adopting conservative cutting practices that will provide all the material essential for the emergency, but will leave the forest in optimum condition for future productivity, so that southern forests will contribute fully to the Nation's social and economic welfare. The enforcement of minimum cutting standards by legislative enactment has been recommended recently by the United States Forest Service, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Joint Congressional Committee on Forestry, the latter in a report, "Forest Lands of the United States," submitted on March 24, 1941. The proposed cutting standards would vary with local conditions, and would be largely based on the findings of forest-research agencies such as the Southern Forest Experiment Station.

Contributions of southern forests in the period of adjustment that will follow the present emergency should be great, through providing a backlog of employment for the million or more workers whom they are capable of supporting under conditions of full productivity and use. Their value for control of floods, for public recreation, and for wildlife should not be overlooked. In all projected forestry programs, forest research can stimulate and promote a better understanding of the part forests can contribute to the better security of the people of the lower South and of the Nation.

CREED BY WILLIAM LINDSAY YOUNG

Miss RANKIN of Montana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend by remarks in the RECORD, I include the following creed by President William Lindsay Young, of Park College, Missouri:

CREED

I believe in national defense against racial antagonisms which weaken that social solidarity essential to a healthy nation.

I believe in national defense against the persecution of minorities, because such persecution is detrimental to the preservation of our democratic heritage.

I believe in national defense against State coercion of the individual's conscience, because such coercion destroys the character foundations of our Nation.

I believe in national defense against those who use patriotism as a cloak in order to reap profits from the present tragic world suffering.

I believe in national defense against an economic system which lacks sufficient opportunity for the young, makes possible an army of millions of unemployed, and lacks adequate security for the old.

I believe in national defense against political demagogs and all vested interests which tamper in any way with those rights of freedom of speech, press, and assemblage as guaranteed by the Constitution and the Bill of Rights.

I believe in national defense against the futile faith that a strong army and navy is all that is needed to preserve and perpetuate that cherished freedom for which our forefathers so valiantly struggled.

I believe in national defense against any "ism" harmful to human personality, which, under God, is sacred.

—President William Lindsay Young, Park College Missouri.

War and the Housing Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 30 (legislative day of Thursday, June 26), 1941

ARTICLE BY DOROTHY ROSENMAN

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, in behalf of my colleague, Mr. WAGNER, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Dorothy Rosenman entitled "War and the Housing Problem."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Liberty Magazine for April 26, 1941]

WAR AND THE HOUSING PROBLEM—GHOST TOWNS—OR HOMES? WHICH WILL WE GET FROM OUR BUILDING FOR DEFENSE?

(By Dorothy Rosenman)

America is rushing to build up its defenses; as a result, there are communities swelling like gouty feet. Six thousand and two hundred inhabitants of Radford, Va., watch 11,000 men build the Hercules Powder Co. plant in which from 4,000 to 6,500 will work. Defense workers in Paso Robles, Calif., live in auto trailers. In San Diego, 50,000 new people absorb all vacancies within commuting distance and require additional housing. Twenty to thirty thousand people pour into Hampton Roads, Va., to work in the Navy operating base.

Rub your hands with glee because employment rises, but scratch your head hard at the housing problem which this very work creates. Machines must be housed, so factories are built. Machines must be worked by men and women. These men and women and their families must be housed, so homes must be built.

Hospitals, as well as homes, are overcrowded, and chicken pox, flu, etc., have full opportunity to grow into epidemics. Laborers, clerks, stenographers, and technicians travel miles to and from work each day because they can find accommodations no nearer. It is fatiguing and does not make for efficiency. It cannot go on; neither can 10,000 persons continue to huddle where 4,000 belong.

Our people have risen to face a defense emergency; obstacles are hurdled; hardships are endured; things hum. Those who make them hum must be adequately housed in properly planned communities—communities that will not waste into future blights and slums.

"Three hundred thousand homes for industrial defense workers required immediately," says the United States Defense Housing Coordinator." "Two and a half million new homes, exclusive of those for farm and defense operations, are needed to fill the immediate demands of the country," says the National Resources Planning Board. Take away the emergency and you still face the lack of 2,500,000 dwelling units to rehouse those families living in downtrodden old houses, shacks, and tenements. It's not a new prob'em; it's one that has been accumulating.

A nation that required 2,500,000 new homes—even before this new defense emergency—could absorb the 300,000 that it now requires for defense workers when the crisis is passed. It could, if those dwellings were constructed and located with this purpose of absorption in mind. And why should they not be?

Understand the problem, and understand that since the last war we have learned much about the mass production of housing units. In 1917 we had no public-housing experience or program; in 1917 we had not begun to recognize our peacetime housing needs; in 1917 we made many errors in building homes for the emergency. These errors proved expensive and wasteful.

Thoughts of future "ghost towns" now make us shudder. We had them after the last war, when the particular industries around which they had sprung shut down. It is not sensible to build more permanent housing than a community can absorb in normal times. This does not mean that we should build shacks. Removable or prefabricated houses are practical for this purpose. They can later be trekked to town, village, or farm in need of permanent housing.

Another practical solution is being made by the Federal Farm Security Administration. Rural housing is notably sorry. F. S. A. has been striving to replace thousands of decrepit insanitary farmhouses with adequate modern dwellings. With its well-developed organization it has started (Radburn, Va.) building new houses for new defense workers on farms within a radius of their work. The farm owner agrees to buy the house at a depreciated price and tear down his own old house when the defense tenant for whom the house was built is no longer needed in the community.

By these methods defense workers can be brought into new communities and they can be sheltered. The community suffers no housing afterpains. At the same time the permanent need for housing is being fulfilled.

Two and a half million families who need decent homes must serve as a constant reminder that the 300,000 units for defense workers should be built so that they can still be used after the emergency. There are few cities in the United States that do not need to rehouse a large proportion of their population—the lower-income groups that have inhabited old unfit homes.

This is an all-time need that can be well served by wise administration of the defense-housing program. Homes built in or near cities with a housing problem can be planned for siphoning of slums and poor housing after the emergency.

"You cannot do that. Speed is necessary. To build for future use, much planning is necessary."

You can. A house and a community well planned is as quick to construct as a new slum. Experience has taught this.

"What experience?"

The experience of the United States Housing Authority, which has constructed defense housing in 85 days, and has in the last 3 years, through local housing authorities, built 514 large-scale construction units in all sections of the Union for the lowest income groups.

Robert Moses, the public-housing skeptic, said in his Liberty article of December 16, 1939, "The Federal Government can do little more than blaze the way to housing improvements." Trail blazing in itself is a contribution not to be belittled, especially when it has already built 162,000 low-rent housing units, which will house 572,000 people, in 256 different communities of the United States. Contrary to Mr. Moses' expectations, about 52 percent of these projects have been on cleared slum sites, and 47 percent have been built on vacant land, and will drain 572,000 people from poor housing Trail blazing—in lowering construction costs; in planning sites so that sun and light reach all apartments, and children have a place to play; in setting coverage and density standards so that our cities and the real estate leaders have begun to think of land in more realistic and useful terms; in contributing an incentive to the rebuilding of neighborhoods of foreclosed and tax-delinquent properties.

Trail blazing in rebuilding human beings!

As a way of progress, this is an achievement; as a way of facilitating the mechanism of defense construction, it is a godsend, for experience is a great teacher.

The U. S. H. A. by February of this year was constructing 19,585 units for defense workers. In defense areas houses being completed for the lowest income group are being turned over to defense workers; after the emergency they will be returned to the purpose for which they were built. In like manner, houses built by the Government for the emergency should be constructed with the thought that after the emergency they should, wherever feasible, be turned over to the local housing authorities for the use of the low-income tenant.

Many sincere advocates of a public-housing program swept from their purpose by the surge of the spectacular emergency at hand, cry "Build for the crisis now, and defer building for the lowest income group to the slack days that are bound to follow a resumption of normal times." The answer to that is that there will be plenty of bad housing left for public attention and to supply employment when that time comes. Since the over-all need is so great, it would be sensible to build these emergency houses not with abandon but with purpose—the purpose of using them for public housing later on.

There are, of course, those who say that the whole public-housing program is wrong and should be scotched. It is argued that subsidized housing is costly. To those it must be said that no inexpensive wand waves in any other social improvements, like parks, playgrounds, swimming pools, or parkways. The taxpayer pays heavily and gets value received. Eradication of slums—rural or urban—will not be accomplished by wishful thinking or fairy wands, or bad words aimed at so-called social upliffers. It will cost the U. S. H. A. the net sum of $11,840,000 or $73 a family a year to subsidize these homes.

Granting all that public housing has accomplished, there are those, like Mr. Moses, who search for other reasons for condemning it. It does not cure all of our social problems or the political ones either. He wonders about color washing out; he wonders about it, not in respect to the pools and parks under his jurisdiction, but in respect to public housing.

Of course, prejudice against the Negro has not been eradicated by housing projects—and will not be. But over the country different communities have tried to meet the problems in various ways. In New York City there are Harlem River housing project, which is all Negro; Red Hook housing project, which has 2,502 white families and 31 Negro families; Jamaica housing project, with 312 Negro families and 135 white families—all living peacefully.

No solution to the complex economic problems that beset this country, as well as the world, is found in public housing. But an attempt and a beginning is made to better the way of life of those of the lowest income group. Should wages rise so that the wide discrepancy is eliminated between what the human market seeks for housing and what it can afford to pay, then subsidies can also be eliminated.

Subsidized housing is not expected to compete with that constructed by private funds. It is, and should continue to be, erected for those families whose income is so low that they can afford to pay so little for rent that to build for them is unprofitable and presently impossible.

However, both in the defense and low-cost housing market there is an important role for private enterprise. It cannot construct for the lowest of low-wage earners, but it can build for those just above that level who are still within that "one-third of a Nation ill-housed," if it were willing to build for investment rather than speculation. The market cries for attention.

Investors are not answering the call. Speculators are. And who holds the bag? Government at one end, and the man of little income and uncertain security at the other. In the defense crisis private enterprise is being encouraged to construct homes. The Federal Housing Administration guarantees 80 percent, and it is now proposed that they shall guarantee 90 percent of the investment. The great business entrepreneur whose risks are thus rendered nil usually bolsters his chances against a loss still further by refusing to rent his houses. The defense worker's job may be temporary, but he must buy his home. There is no assurance of profit to the great real-estate entrepreneur after the emergency is over, so he up and runs—with the loot.

Private enterprise must face this issue squarely. So must government. There is plenty of real investment money to be had. Where investment is warranted, it should be urged to invest; where private investment is not warranted, government must spend public moneys to bring the necessities of living to those who need them—both in times and conditions of emergency and in normal days.

Fancy cupboards of money piled in banks and insurance companies, ready to pour forth at the slightest encouragement. Read Mr. Moses' plea for "the only possible solution of the financing problem"—to have loaning agencies supply cheap money to stimulate construction of houses; and get thrilled thinking that he, too, has found the way to set the ball rolling. Unfortunately, Mr. Moses, since writing these words, has experienced the pangs of disappointment in working with insurance companies and banks in an attempt to build limited-dividend houses. This redounds not to Mr. Moses' discredit but to that of those institutions so rock-bound by tradition that their boards of directors can but bewail the passing of an era and contribute nothing to the foundation of its successor.

Whether there be a crisis or not, a democracy must provide the necessities of life for its people. Housing is such a necessity that private enterprise and government must marshal their forces to provide adequate homes.

Let us therefore plan our defense housing—both that built by the Government and that built by private enterprise—so that it can fit into the larger permanent program in the days to come, to house that third of the Nation now living in housing below the American standard of life.

Prospective Development of International Law in the Western Hemisphere, as Affected by the Monroe Doctrine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 30 (legislative day of Thursday, June 26), 1941

PRIZE-WINNING ESSAY BY WILLARD BUNCE COWLES

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD the 1941 prize-winning essay in the national legal competition of the American Bar Association. The award, which is considered one of the high honors of the legal profession, is made annually under a $100,000 bequest of the late Judge Erskine M. Ross of California. The prize was $3,000. The committee of judges consisted of ex-Justice William L. Ransom of New York, Mr. Justice William O. Douglas of the United States Supreme Court, and Dean Joseph A. McClain, Jr., of the law department of Washington University, St. Louis, Mo.

The winner this year was Mr. Willard Bunce Cowles, a well-known international lawyer engaged in the private practice of that branch of law, who is also a special assistant to the Attorney General. He has served the Government in international law cases before national and international tribunals and was formerly associated with the law firm of Milbank, Tweed, and Hope and the faculty of Columbia College in New York.

The significance of this activity of the Bar Association, and especially of this year's competition, appears in the following excerpt from an editorial in the June issue of the Bar Association's Journal:

> At a time when the future of free institutions in this hemisphere seems likely to depend on the soundness and the solidarity of the actions taken by the republics of North and South America, the Ross Essays for this year deal appropriately with the "Prospective Development of International Law in the Western Hemisphere as Affected by the Monroe Doctrine." Such a subject naturally produced notable essays, more than a few of them. Nearly all of the essays revealed an awareness that the grave dangers confronting the Americas compel a reconsideration of the traditional concepts of neutrality and nonintervention, in favor of a broadening accord of action based on the rationale of self-defense.
> The winning essay * * * brings together in an impressive manner the developing precedents which are implementing the concept of unity for defense. It deserves study and thought by every lawyer who is trying to help his community or his circle of friends to think, speak, and act wisely on current issues.

The complete essay, which is documented, and other references to the competition appear in the June 1941 issue of the American Bar Association Journal at pages 342, 386, 363, and 331. Space limitations prevents its being printed in full in the RECORD. It is stated in the Journal that the essay was submitted on February 15, 1941, and that the views expressed do not necessarily reflect those of any agency of the Federal Government.

There being no objection, the essay was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROSPECTIVE DEVELOPMENT OF INTERNATIONAL LAW IN THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE, AS AFFECTED BY THE MONROE DOCTRINE

(By Willard Bunce Cowles)

The present world situation is bringing about a realization among the American states that the normally applicable rules of neutrality and nonintervention are inadequate to cope with existing conditions. Under the leadership of the United States, they are taking the position that the principle of self-defense is applicable. This principle, which underlies the whole international system and is more fundamental than normally applicable principles and rules of international law, may be invoked when the peace and security of a state is threatened by the action of another. Under such circumstances, the menaced state may take extraordinary defense measures, limited only by their reasonableness in the light of existing conditions or those to be anticipated. Precedents, particularizing and implementing this rule of reason, are now developing in the Western Hemisphere.

I

In the Declaration of Panama (1939) the Inter-American Consultative Meeting declared that the American states, as neutrals, had an inherent right to have the waters adjacent to the American continent kept free from hostile acts "as a measure of continental self-protection." The Declaration defined the limits of a security zone, stipulated that the American states will consult on measures for its observance whenever they consider it necessary, and provided for patrolling the area, if deemed necessary. The following recommendations of the Inter-American Neutrality Committee on the effects of the institution of the zone, were accepted at the Habana Consultative Meeting: The zone areas are not to be regarded as territorial waters, but open sea; belligerent activities should not be undertaken within the zone; measures of self-defense are not proscribed there nor are belligerent operations begun outside the zone and continued within it, provided they are continuous; and the American states should adopt regulations to prevent contacts of merchant vessels in their ports with belligerent warships; a belligerent should not be penalized merely on the ground of being the aggressor nation in the war, inasmuch as all belligerents have a right to use the high seas for peaceful purposes and to defend themselves from attack; penalties should be imposed on the local aggressor in the zone, that is, against the belligerent which initiated hostile acts there. It was further recommended, in the case of a violation of the zone, that the American governments should make a joint investigation to decide which belligerent was the local aggressor; in the light of the determined facts, make a collective protest to the government whose warship is believed to have initiated the action; deny admission to their ports of the warship or aircraft deemed guilty of such violation, or all warships of that belligerent.

After the Graf Spee incident the American states jointly protested to the belligerent governments for violating the zone and threatened to prevent belligerent vessels from using American ports if they committed further hostile acts in the zone. The belligerents * * * taking the position that they were not bound by the Declaration of Panama, pointed out that it had not received such general assent as to modify the existing laws of neutrality which, in their opinion, had not been violated.

The Inter-American Neutrality Committee reached the conclusion that general consent to the declaration was not necessary. Its legal justification of the zone is a remarkable document. It is a mixture of the law of neutrality, self-defense, and the * * * Kellogg Pact, involving two interpretations of aggression—an aggressor government, and aggressive action in any specific case within the zone. The committee's reasoning is having a decided influence on the current implementing of the principle of self-defense. * * * An aggressor under the Kellogg Pact has no right to make war anywhere; it has no more right to wage it on the high seas than on land; the high seas are, however, open to all vessels (including those of an aggressor country) for peaceful purposes, but not to make war, except in self-defense; neutral interests are paramount to belligerent interests by inherent right implied from the principle of self-defense and from the renunciation of war; the neutral can accordingly treat a belligerent unit on or over the high seas, within a reasonable distance from its shores, as a trespasser if it initiates hostilities, and the neutral can use reasonable force to prevent belligerent activities there which might affect its peace or the peaceful pursuit of its commerce.

This is new doctrine. Its effect on the development of the law remains to be seen. * * *

II

The hemispheric stage is set for several other developments on the basis of self-defense. * * * The Consultative meetings at Panama and Habana passed resolutions concerning foreign subversive activities tending to jeopardize democratic institutions. As an apparent result of the Nazi diplomatic incident in Uruguay, the Habana meeting recommended that the American governments adopt legislation and administrative regulations for the effective prohibition of "every" political activity by foreign persons "no matter what form they use to disguise or cloak such activity." If the American governments are to attempt to prohibit every political activity of diplomats and consuls by legislation and regulation, we may expect to see some carefully drawn documents defining the limits, on the basis of self-defense, of diplomatic and consular functions and privileges. Perhaps a rule of reasonableness will be developed respecting the number of such officers which will be received by any American government.

At the Habana meeting the American states asserted that they had the right, in self-defense, to set up provisional regimes in American regions now in non-American possession, if a forced change of sovereignty should be threatened. An emergency committee, to administer such regions, has been in existence since October 24, 1940.

There is a difference of opinion among international lawyers whether the German control of property, held by its nationals at home and abroad, is merely a high degree of police regulation or a virtual transfer of ownership to the German state with only the title and limited rights of use reserved to the national. If German assets in the American States are the public property of the German state, their freezing would presumably be justified on the ground of self-defense against propaganda, espionage, and sabotage. Such action (if ownership is in the German state) would imply a limitation on the scope of the international rule that the public property of a foreign state is immune from interference.

The so-called right of angary is a belligerent right to appropriate and use urgently needed neutral property within belligerent territory during the course of hostilities, provided just compensation is assured the owners. * * *

A press dispatch of February 3, 1941, states that the Argentine Government is studying the possibility, under the right of angary, of requisitioning idle Dutch shipping in her ports. According to this report, the Argentinian position is that the states not at war have a right to use idle shipping in their harbors "urgently needed to meet national emergencies." * * * Whether or not the law should be developed in this direction depends to a large extent on how it is applied and on hemispheric defense needs. Under any such interpretation of the right of angary, owners of vessels would receive just compensation. If Argentina acts upon this basis it may be that other American governments will follow suit. * * * This would seem to be more desirable than having the vessels unproductive.

A neutral government, under general international law, is required to refrain from any participation in an existing war. * * *

By contrast, the lend-lease bill will permit the United States to manufacture, or procure, any defense article for the government of any country whose defense the President deems vital to the defense of the United States, and to sell, transfer, exchange, lease, lend, or otherwise dispose of any such article to any such government and to place any defense article in good working order for such a government. * * * The Senate report and the House majority report justify the bill both on the principle of self-defense and also under the Kellogg Pact. * * * The same self-defense considerations, which "emasculated" the Kellogg Pact through numerous reservations, are now in effect being used to enforce the principle of nonaggression which underlies the pact.

III

The Monroe Doctrine has important effects on inter-American relationships today. The doctrine is a policy of the United States, not international law. * * * It has two aspects. The first, which stems from self-defense, is that the United States will prevent or redress external aggressions against the territorial integrity or political independence of Latin-American states, as any such action is "dangerous to our peace and safety." The second is that the American Continents are not subject to colonization by any European power.

The doctrine was gratefully received at first by the Latin Americans. Doubts of its value to them were expressed later. Latin Americans understood the basic desire of large states to influence the affairs of nearby states; they believed, with Disraeli, that nonintervention was impossible, in the long run, for a great power; and they knew that similar pledges by European states to maintain the territorial integrity of the Ottoman Empire were but a prelude to its partition. The association of the Monroe Doctrine with imperialism still has a considerable effect on inter-American relationships. The so-called Roosevelt corollary, Olney's fiat, the big stick, and manifest destiny are still remembered.

Such fears have been partly dispelled by the application of the good-neighbor policy, the continentalization of the Monroe Doctrine, and the nonintervention protocol. * * *

The trend now in Latin-American countries is to regard the Monroe Doctrine as belonging to them as much as to the United States—each is now bound to guarantee the territorial integrity of the others. They are collectively developing international law and have jointly expanded the noncolonization principle of the Monroe Doctrine by providing for the contingent administration of European colonies and possessions in this hemisphere. Consultation is thought of as a continentalized Monroe Doctrine in action.

IV

But consultation in reality means much more than this. * * *

The American governments are committed to consult without delay when the following occasions arise: Threats of aggression from outside the hemisphere (including "fifth column" activities); threats to change, or actual changes of, the sovereignty of any geographic region of America, now subject to the jurisdiction of non-American states; failures to observe the security zone; threats of hostilities between two or more American states; and interventions of one American state in the affairs of another. Indeed, the initiation of consultation is justified by any act susceptible of disturbing the peace; or (upon agreement) any important economic, cultural, or other question, in which the American states have a common interest.

Under the Declaration of Lima a consultative meeting, if unanimous, has enormous power: It can take any measures it deems advisable under the circumstances of a particular case to preserve the peace and it was assumed at Lima that the consultative procedure would be adequate for the American states jointly to determine the aggressor in particular cases and to decide upon appropriate inter-American sanctions.

Though consultative meetings have thus far dealt chiefly with external problems, they may shortly become important in intrahemispheric relationships. An intense boundary dispute is now in progress between Ecuador and Peru; the relations between the Dominican Republic and Haiti have been severely strained since the massacre of several thousands of Haitians on the Dominican frontier in 1937; and Bolivia still aspires to Arica (Chile) as an outlet to the sea. The American states have agreed not only to consult in all matters between themselves which affect the peace of the hemisphere, but not to have resource to hostilities or take any military action whatever for 6 months while consultation is in progress. * * *

The implications of such mediating functions were expanded in the Declaration of Lima: The American states declared that "in case the peace, security or territorial integrity of any American Republic is * * * threatened by acts of any nature that may impair them, they proclaim their common concern and their determination to make effective their solidarity, coordinating their respective sovereign wills by means of the procedure of consultation, * * * using the measures which in each case the circumstances may make advisable." The prospective development of precedents and rules in the field of mediation in the Western Hemisphere can best be seen by comparing this declaration with Article 11 of the Covenant of the League of Nations. Article 11 declares that "any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the League or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole League, and the League shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations."

The terms of the two provisions are substantially the same. Both declare that a threatened breach of the peace is a matter of common concern; that the parties may, in jointly attempting to keep the peace, take such action as may be appropriate thereto under the facts of particular cases; and both are applicable, irrespective of whether or not third states are directly affected by the threat. The main differences, apart from phraseology, are that the declaration of Lima is in the form of a declaration and limited to threats of war against inter-American peace, whereas article 11 is in treaty form and applies to a threat anywhere.

The League's practical application of article 11 to concrete cases contributed to the technique of the prevention of war in the case of disputes between small states. Article 11 was the League's mediating provision, under which a provisional remedy known as the cease-fire practice developed. * * *

Under the cease-fire practice the following things could be done by the League Council immediately upon the outbreak of hostilities or a serious threat thereof: Issue warnings to the disputants reminding them of their treaty obligations to settle disputes by peaceful methods; order them to cease firing and to withdraw their armed forces behind their own borders; make a temporary armistice, pending a decision on the merits; use neutral military attachés on the spot to carry out its orders, who could give specific directions implementing the council's orders and personally supervise the cessation of hostilities.

The inter-American consultative system carries the same implications. Less drastic procedure would presumably be applied, at first at least, in settling inter-American disputes. * * * Nevertheless, if an American disputant were recalcitrant, and if there were unanimity on the part of all the American states (other than the disputants), a consultative meeting, in the name of all the American states, could bring great pressure to bear on the disputants to settle the dispute on its merits in accordance with the inter-American peace machinery. * * *

V

It is realized in the United States that the free flow of commerce is a highly important factor in the economy and unity of the country. There is not equal unanimity in respect of free international trade, even as regards the American states. International law and organization are far less advanced in the economic field than in the political. The existing principle of international law is that states are free to decide for themselves whether or not they will grant favors to other states or groups of states, and there is no international counterpart to the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Federal Trade Commission.

Secretary Hull's unconditional most-favored-nation trade agreements policy is a concrete program for the reciprocal moderation of excessive trade barriers. The inter-American conferences since 1933 have approved this policy, but the American governments have not always applied it in practice. The basic problem is the same in Latin America as in the United States. Powerful protectionist interests exist; customs unions are being considered; exchange controls, quotas, import licensing arrangements, regional preferences, and other discriminatory measures are being applied.

Much continuous uphill work will be required to persuade the American governments to apply the unconditional most-favored-nation principle on a hemispheric basis. The Inter-American Financial and Economic Advisory Committee, established at Panama, was created with this purpose in mind and to cope with the perennial economic and financial problems of Latin America which had become acute with the outbreak of the European war. * * *

Certain Latin American states have been attempting for some time to limit, even to abolish, the diplomatic protection of property abroad. The matter is of great importance to United States investors. The position against such diplomatic protection is as follows: The prospective foreign investor must take into account the hazards which are common to business in the country; if he invests he identifies the destiny of his capital with the social trends in the country; if he suffers a deprivation, he must charge it to profit and loss; he cannot invoke the aid of his government in demanding compensation through the diplomatic channel, and especially he must respect the terms of a Calvo Clause.

The basis of the argument is expounded as follows: Diplomatic protection of property is intervention, which is now inadmissible; as states are equal under international law, governments cannot claim, for their nationals abroad, more property rights than those of nationals of the country; as a breach of international law cannot take place in relation to the property of a national, neither can such a breach take place in respect of a foreigner; as denials of justice are few, diplomatic protection is unnecessary, as property claims involving a breach of international law can be arbitrated.

Althought there are cogent arguments in answer to these points, the argument cannot be wholly ignored. * * * Not all governmental interferences with property are confiscations. An international law counterpart of the doctrine of substantive due process of law may develop. * * *

Any possible agreement to displace the diplomatic method of protecting property by the use of arbitration would, however, require a system of compulsory inter-American arbitration. No such system exists, but a plan for an inter-American compulsory system, limited to types of pecuniary claims which would include property claims, has been suggested and is now being discussed by a few interested persons, including some Latin-American diplomats in Washington. The plan is to do away with the obligation to pay awards in cash if the American governments will agree to settle their claims on the basis of international law. The primary purposes underlying the idea are that, through the development of judicial precedents, the body of international law will be increased and the foreign office claims dockets cleared up. As awards are made, credits will be placed in special arbitral accounts. As great a portion as possible of the balances due will be canceled by a clearing-house process. The remainder will eventually be settled by the delivery of surplus products. To avoiding upsetting the domestic economy of the sending or the receiving state the deliveries will be made in small annual amounts over a long period of time, or by other diplomatic quid pro quo's such as port dues, trade agreements, or water rights. * * *

A large body of international law precedents would result from a thoroughgoing application of such a program.

The international rule that the courts of one state will not inquire into the validity of the acts of another state, while still generally upheld, is under much stress in the United States at present because of alleged confiscatory acts of foreign governments. In situations where foreign states ignore international law, as by confiscating the property of aliens or attempting to give extra-territorial effect to confiscatory decrees, the courts of American states may change this rule and refuse enforcement on the ground that such acts are contrary to public policy or international law.

VI

The inter-American conferences are progressively making use of multipartite international instruments. Although these are frequently designated as "declarations"—in one instance as an "Act"—they have been spoken of officially as "agreements" and as "understandings reached." Three declarations have been set forth by Under Secretary Welles in an official publication as being part of the "juridical framework" of the system of consultation and the Habana Consultative Meeting officially considered the Declaration of Panama to have "juridical effects." * * *

International lawyers are in disagreement as to the legal effect of international instruments not made in conventional form. The binding force of the formal declaration is still an open question.

This inter-American development is challenging. The chief reason for the use of declarations by the American states is that Latin American governments, too, have legislative difficulties related to ratification.

It may be observed in this connection that the form of an international obligation, whether conventional or declaratory, is not determinative of its effectiveness. Article 10 of the Covenant of the League of Nations, in terms, purports to extend the territorial integrity policy of the Monroe Doctrine on a world-wide basis, but it was never really applied, though adopted in treaty form. The declarations contained in the Monroe Message, on the other hand, were not in treaty form but have been applied with telling effect by the United States, and it is difficult to believe that the "continentalized" Monroe Doctrine will be less respected by Latin American governments because it is based, in part, on the Declaration of Lima. In the final analysis the efficacy of any international instrument depends upon the will to effectuate it. * * *

This development may have important implications for the future development of the law, and should perhaps be considered in relation to the difficulties involved in the adoption of well-stated codifications.

VII

The key to the prospective development of international law in the Western Hemisphere lies in the continuation of the practical statesmanship recently exhibited in the institution of consultation. The spiritual effect on Latin Americans of the "continentalization" of the Monroe Doctrine, and of being dealt with as equals, is tending toward an inter-American solidarity, different from the Pan-Americanism of the past. * * *

The importance of the consultative system is reflected in the viewpoint that consultation fulfills, or can fulfill, all the vital inter-American needs, and that consequently an American League of Nations is not needed. * * *

In contrast to a generally chaotic outside world where law in international relations is to a large extent being replaced by force the American hemisphere may conceivably become the repository of the primary principles of international conduct considered as binding on states for the past three centuries. The American governments and peoples seem to be progressively realizing this; and while they are aware of the need for reexamining certain fundamental postulates they are also conscious that if the current developments of law by the American states are ultimately to contribute to the growth of an orderly world the rules they initiate must be designed to operate not only to the advantage of some of the American states, or all of them, but to the world at large.

Wanted—For the American Army: Youthful Leadership and Promotion by Merit

ARTICLE BY HON. ROSS COLLINS, OF MISSISSIPPI

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to extend my remarks by including therein an article appearing in the Reader's Digest of July 1941, prepared by our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS]. I consider the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] to be the outstanding military authority in the Congress on national defense and one of the outstanding military authorities of the country.

The article follows:

[From the Reader's Digest for July 1941]

WANTED—FOR THE AMERICAN ARMY: YOUTHFUL LEADERSHIP AND PROMOTION BY MERIT

(By Ross A. COLLINS, Member and for many years chairman of the House subcommittee in charge of War Department appropriations)

(Congressman COLLINS contributed to the Reader's Digest last month an article of sensational importance, already widely quoted and discussed. In it he asked why we are drafting young men by the millions out of productive civilian life into an old-fashioned mass-army, larger than we can train or equip—or even need—for modern war.)

(This month, Congressman COLLINS discloses another grave defect in the organization of our Army, and urges specific steps to correct it.)

(Representative COLLINS is known as the outstanding military expert in Congress. Of him, Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen wrote in The Washington Merry-Go-Round: "During 20 somnolent years after the World War, when the U. S. Army was unworried over modern military trends which were to make Europe a shambles, the chief thorn in its side was Congressman ROSS COLLINS from Mississippi, who refused to let it sleep. He kept taunting it with the fact that what was needed was more tanks, armored cars, and airplanes—and fewer horses. He kept vainly goading it to adopt the type of weapons with which Hitler is now sweeping Europe. Today the Army, a little late, admits COLLINS WAS right.")

As the Nazi tide of world conquest surges ever higher the American people are coming to realize that, by contrast to Germany's mechanized might, the American Army is pitiably old-fashioned. As I pointed out last month, we not only lack a truly modern military force but no plans for getting one have been made public to date (May 25). Despite our huge Army camps, swarming with draftees, our state of unpreparedness is positively frightening.

Why is it that the military leaders to whom in the past we have entrusted American defense have failed us so often and so deplorably?

A military command that has lagged so far behind the progress of military science as to subordinate the dominant role of coordinated tanks and dive bombers is as absurd as would be a business house that still clung to kerosene lamps and used messenger boys instead of the telephone.

There is one primary reason, I think, that explains why our Army is old-fashioned:

Its peacetime leadership has always been old-fashioned.

It is still mainly officered by old men, too many of whom have been stodgily planning for yesterday's wars. They have seemed determined to keep unbroken our Army's long record of last-ditch resistance to every new weapon, to every new method, to almost all progress and originality.

If most of the men in our Army command are at fault, is there not something wrong with the way those men are chosen?

I think there is.

In nearly every other branch of American life, a premium is put on enterprise, vision, aggressive, and creative efficiency. In the Army, largely because of the method of promotion of officers by seniority, those qualities are penalized—and the plodding, backward-looking conservative comes to the top.

There are two distinctly disastrous consequences of our system of peacetime promotion by mere seniority:

1. The conservative, elderly officers who emerge into higher command have little sympathy with audacious progress.

2. The officers who must lead our young men in actual battle are untested in ability for such leadership. They are captains or majors or colonels just because they've been in the service a certain number of years, and not at all because they have ever been drastically and competitively rated on their ability to do the jobs they'd have to do in war.

From the Germans we ought to have learned again the lesson that it takes young men to win wars. To conquer and enslave all Europe, they have relied on youthful command, plus a diabolical ingenuity in the use of new weapons. They took our own American inventions—notably the plane and the caterpillar track—and with them reshaped their entire military, air, and naval establishment to a formula of destruction that has revolutionized warfare.

This formula, which even I anticipated repeatedly in the House before and after 1932, was one which our own dominant military figures could not, or would not, accept. The oft-told tale of their subordination of aviation—their opposition to its full military use and full development in an Air Department—is a matter of record. So, too, is their neglect of tanks. When today's crisis came we found ourselves with utterly inadequate air strength, with only a few tanks, and not one panzer division. We found ourselves without modern antitank guns, without enough antiaircraft guns to protect a single city.

Let me say at once that, though I think Congress should be better organized to do its part in military defense, it is utterly unfair for the Army to blame Congress for our present military dilemma. At no time, even before the Roosevelt administration, has our Appropriations Committee denied the War Department budget for experimentation with new weapons, for modernizing our Army, or for buying new matériel. (We have often increased such appropriations.)

The record proves, it seems to me, that things are not right in our Military Establishment as a whole and particularly in the War Department—which has never been overhauled.

Our desperate situation is doubtless far too involved to be charged wholly to any single factor, but if there is one factor more than any other it is—I repeat—that our dominant military policy makers have been chronically old, too old to anticipate and apply new ideas. As a result of their conservatism our soldiers will go on maneuvers this summer without sufficient tanks and other modern weapons—with only slight training by a few in plane-tank teamwork.

The skilled handling of a tank, especially at night, with all lights out, over rough terrain, with other vehicles driving ahead on all sides, is one of the sternest tests of modern soldiery. Many of our younger officers agree that it is silly to attempt to train a 1-year draftee for tank work. Yet an even sterner test of skill is the intimate, minute-by-minute coordination between these land battleships and dive bombers traveling 5 or 6 miles a minute.

It took German officers—handpicked young officers and long-term competitively chosen soldiers—6 or 8 years to train their plane-tank teams. What was our Army doing during those years? We had as much time, as much mechanical skill, as the Germans. And we knew what they were doing. But our military leaders did nothing. They were still thinking about past wars.

Goering has boasted that there is no mystery about German success. It is based on "modern and plentiful weapons, intensively trained young officers, and a high quality of leadership."

Here in America, where we have unequaled productive capacity and countless young men of inventive and mechanical turn, our military policy makers have been too old (in years or in point of view) even to make a pretense of keeping up with the Germans. Yet we might have been several jumps ahead of them had our Army encouraged youthful initiative and daring action in the way that American industry does.

In the World War, General Pershing "for the good of the service" restaffed the A. E. F. with young commanders. He cabled to Secretary of War Baker:

"Both the British and French higher officers emphasize in the strongest terms the necessity of assigning younger and more impressionable men to command brigades and divisions. General officers must have 'go' and initiative if they are to fill positions fraught with momentous consequences to the lives of thousands of our men."

Disregarding seniority, Pershing saw to it that his five chiefs of section in France were all young men. In the summer of 1918, Brigadier Generals Dennis E. Nolan and Harold B. Fiske were only 46, W. D. Conner only 44, Fox Conner and George V. H. Moseley, 43. Frank R. McCoy was made a brigadier at 43, and Douglas MacArthur and B. D. Foulois (Chief of the Air Corps) at 38. At 36, General Marshall's ability was recognized.

Compare our present situation: According to the Baltimore Sun published May 17, of 16 major generals on the permanent list 5 will be retired for age this year, 2 next year, 3 in 1943, and 4 in 1944. Of the 2 remaining, the younger, chief of General Headquarters, will be 58 years old next week. On the permanent list we have 41 brigadiers, with the youngest past 50. Twenty-five of our 62 temporary major generals—including staff generals—have passed the age of 60.

This condition, to my notion, is simply awful. We must do something about it.

During peacetime promotion in our Army is discouragingly slow. A second lieutenant can hope to become a first lieutenant only after serving 3 years, a captain after 10 years, a major after 17, a lieutenant colonel after 22, a colonel after 28—when certain to be 50 or older. Often there are long intervals when even this slow promotion is delayed lest the Army be top-heavy with officers. Still worse, during peacetime it is only after our officers become colonels, at 50 or beyond, that they are subject to selection, rather than automatic promotion, for higher ranks. The inevitable consequence, as General Pershing emphasized, is that men well along in years shape and dominate Army policies and plans right down to the moment of crisis.

What all this means to any alert, imaginative, ambitious, and able young officer can easily be imagined. He may know that he is a better man than many ahead of him. He knows that even high schools nowadays have different classes for the quick and the slow. He knows that corporations could not survive if their junior executives had to abide wholly by seniority. Nevertheless he must wait, years on end, through the best years of his life, for promotion to rank where he can reflect his ideas in Army policies or get large experience in handling men.

To correct so discouraging a condition, I make these recommendations:

1. Lower the age of retirement for all Army officers to 55.

2. Abolish the seniority rule altogether, all the way down into the ranks, and make promotion dependent wholly on merit. Merit should be demonstrated by exacting physical and competitive examinations and by competition in the field, with due emphasis on brains, initiative, imagination, resourcefulness, and all that it takes to be a leader of men.

3. Eliminate the bottom 5 percent, every year, of officers of all ranks. Why should the Government be the great white father of everyone who has obtained a commission? The Government discharges civilian employees for incompetence. So does every corporation. Nothing, I believe, would do more to get our officers on their toes than the everlasting threat of discharge.

4. Give up calling retired officers back to service even in times of crisis. This would be an aid toward discarding outmoded policies and training.

5. Extend all these recommendations to the National Guard, which represents an important part of our military defense and should be kept just as modern, provided with just as modern weapons and training, as the Regular Army.

6. Apply these recommendations to the Officers' Reserve, since about three-fourths of our present officers are drawn from this important reservoir.

7. Study the promotion methods of some of our most alert corporations with a view to bettering methods in our Army. The wise corporation leaves as little as possible to chance or favoritism. It bases advancement of distinctive young men largely on the recommendations of trained personnel experts who keep tabs on every junior executive from the time he enters the company's employ. This system would give the imaginative, inventive, and hard-working young officer a chance. It would help to discover born leaders—one of the Army's greatest needs.

Besides these seven innovations—none of which the oldest inhabitant of Capitol Hill has ever heard our military policy-makers propose to Congress—I would go further I urge that we:

8. Relieve Army officers and troops from all activities which civilians can do as well or better, at less cost. About one-half of our officers and men usually are concerned with other things than combat training. Their time should be spent in battle practice.

9. Abolish the arsenals and get the Army out of research and manufacturing—for too many valid reasons to be set down here.

Finally, as a direct aid to the morale and quality of officers and men and, even more important, as an imperative requirement of a modern army:

10. Eliminate the traditional barriers between the different branches of the Army, such as the lines separating the Infantry from the Air Corps, the Artillery from the Engineers, and so on.

There is a supremely important and conclusive reason for this if we are ever to get a compact, fast-moving, hard-hitting Army with the new plane-tank combination as its spearhead. In such an army no single branch can go it alone successfully. The modern commander must be able to coordinate in action two or three or all branches—tanks, planes, engineers, artillery, etc. In the formation of our triangular divisions—poor substitutes for panzer divisions—the War Department admits the need of the simultaneous movement of different kinds of troops, each with its special tasks. The time may rapidly be approaching when, to defend a port or a base, we shall need to call into action our total strength, naval as well as air and land. Meanwhile the least we can do is to prepare our Army as a whole to do its part as a unit, not piecemeal.

These innovations are, no doubt, the most radical in the long history of war.

There have been but few.

The most revolutionary innovations have appeared, and caught us unprepared, during the last year.

These will not be the last we shall see. Even now the number of ships crippled and destroyed by planes has mounted until it exceeds the number destroyed by submarine. Before long it may well be that the plane will dominate the sea and the land of this whole tortured planet.

To safeguard America and adapt our Army to the swiftly changing scene radical action is necessary. And it cannot come too soon.

Plan Is Made To Improve Physical Condition of Men Rejected in Draft

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH, OF WEST VIRGINIA, AND THE LEGISLATIVE OFFICER OF THE SELECTIVE SERVICE SYSTEM

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters:

MAY 19, 1941.

Brig. Gen. LEWIS B. HERSHEY,
Deputy Director, National Headquarters, Selective Service System,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR GENERAL HERSHEY: I appreciate your letter of May 16, in which you express interest in the comments which Members of Congress might desire to make on the operation of the selective-service system.

It shall be my purpose to contact certain officials of the draft board in my congressional district and get their reaction to the operations of the Selective Training and Service Act. I shall be glad to forward constructive suggestions to Captain Keesling, whom you have appointed as assistant operations executive.

It has been brought to my attention that 43 percent of the men examined for military training have been found ineligible for service due to physical disabilities. I believe that the large proportion of these have had trouble with their teeth. It would seem to me that a definite program should and must be undertaken to correct these physical shortcomings just as soon as possible. It is not enough to find the trouble, but attempts should certainly be made to improve the physical condition of these refused men. That procedure would seem to me to be the part of a good national policy, vital to our continued preparedness program.

With kindest personal regards, I am,
Sincerely yours,
JENNINGS RANDOLPH.

NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS,
SELECTIVE SERVICE SYSTEM,
Washington, D. C., June 20, 1941.

Hon. JENNINGS RANDOLPH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. RANDOLPH: I am writing to you pursuant to our telephone conversation of this date.

In your letter of May 19, 1941, and as supplemented in our conversation of this date, you have pointed out that a great many of the men examined for military training have been found ineligible due to physical disabilities and that some program should be established to improve the physical condition of these men and remedy the situation.

We have been greatly concerned about this situation, and over a long period of time have been giving careful consideration to it toward the end of developing a satisfactory and workable plan.

We have attempted and will continue to attempt by publicity, and otherwise, to encourage the registrants themselves to prehabilitate themselves prior to taking their local board physical examinations by familiarizing themselves with our physical standards, consulting their own physicians, and taking such corrective treatment as may be necessary to correct any physical defects and deficiencies that are disclosed.

In addition to this prehabilitation endeavor we have also been giving considerable study and consideration to a rehabilitation program in connection with those who are found to have remedial physical defects or deficiencies in the course of the local board or induction station examination. We are working in close cooperation and coordination with the War Department and with other governmental agencies who are also well aware of the necessity for establishing a satisfactory plan to remedy the situation. It is our hope and intention to proceed in this manner as rapidly as possible toward the end that a satisfactory and workable plan will be agreed upon and put into effect at the earliest possible time.

We believe that in addition to the War Department there are a number of Federal, State, and local agencies which may be effectively used in such a program. However, there are many problems and details which must of necessity be solved before any plan can be put into effect. Of such problems, one of the most troublesome is the problem concerning compulsory rehabilitation of men who have failed to pass their physical examination.

For your information I am enclosing copy of an address given by Brig. Gen. Lewis B. Hershey, Acting Director of the Selective Service System, at the National Nutrition Conference for Defense on May 27, 1941. This is the address referred to by the statements in the newspapers, with which you are familiar.

I shall keep you informed of the status of our endeavors in connection with this most important problem. If you desire further information concerning this matter or, from time to time desire information concerning any other matter pertaining to selective service, please let me know and I shall furnish it to you.

With best wishes and kindest personal regards,

Sincerely,
FRANCIS V. KEESLING, JR.,
Captain, Specialist, Legislative Officer.

HON. THOMAS D'ALESANDRO, JR.

LETTER FROM NATHAN STRAUS, FEDERAL HOUSING AUTHORITY ADMINISTRATOR

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

FEDERAL WORKS AGENCY,
UNITED STATES HOUSING AUTHORITY,
Washington, June 30, 1941.

Hon. THOMAS D'ALESANDRO, JR.,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN D'ALESANDRO: This is with further reference to your concern about the case of Mr. Bernard Ades, an employee of the United States Housing Authority, which has led to your discussing this matter with me, at which time you pointed out certain facts contained in his record prior to his employment by the U. S. H. A.

As soon as it was called to my attention earlier this month that Mr. Ades had run for Governor of Maryland on the Communist ticket in 1934, I promptly asked the Department of Justice for a thorough investigation of the whole situation.

Pending the results of this investigation, I asked a special committee composed of three members of the United States Housing Authority staff, including the Deputy Administrator, Mr. Keyserling, as chairman, to hold hearings in this case on my behalf and to summarize for me the facts as disclosed by these hearings.

While I do not believe that I ought now to take final action in this case without awaiting the report from the Department of Justice, which I expect by the middle of this week, the facts disclosed thus far and the findings and recommendations of the committee just referred to justify some immediate action. Therefore I have decided to suspend Mr. Ades without pay, beginning today, and to take such final action as will seem proper as soon as I receive the Department of Justice report.

Needless to say, there was nothing in Mr. Ades' file at the time he applied for and was placed in a position as a $2,000-a-year auditor with the United States Housing Authority in 1939 to indicate facts in his former record which have so recently been revealed to me.

Faithfully yours,

NATHAN STRAUS, Administrator.

STATEMENT BY JACK KYLE

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement by Jack Kyle, national educational director, the Regular Veterans Association:

No group mourns the death of the late senior Senator from Mississippi, the Honorable PAT HARRISON, more than the Regular Veterans Association. Senator HARRISON was perhaps our chief recognized authority on tax legislation. He was universally respected for his independent judgment, and he never failed to offer opposition to anything contrary to his homespun philosophy.

While PAT HARRISON was making history in the field of Government finance he was further demonstrating his statesmanship by actively championing the cause of the veterans of the Regular Services, a then forgotten minority.

Back in the dark days of the depression and incident economy acts Senator HARRISON—though not a veteran himself—alined himself with the cause of this neglected group.

PAT HARRISON took the lead in pushing the now famous Andreas Berger case to a satisfactory conclusion.

In 1935 only those disabled Regulars discharged for disability could be hospitalized under the law. Berger, with one foot in the grave, came to Washington and applied to R. V. A.'s then national commander, Walter Johnson, who immediately went to work with Senator HARRISON to correct the situation through legislation.

It was to the sympathetic PAT HARRISON that undisputed credit belonged for legislation that was enacted to remove this cruel discrimination. By the attachment of a rider on another bill, almost overnight the hospitals were again thrown open to literally thousands of former sailors, soldiers, marines, and Coast Guard men disabled while in the service of their country.

Later Senator HARRISON made a thorough investigation of the treatment being given our disabled Regulars. He was to have sponsored the 1936 bill—Public, No. 788—but, due to illness, he was obliged to leave the management of the bill to the Senate Pensions Committee. This understanding committee acted in full accord with PAT HARRISON'S recommendations, with the result that Public, No. 788, became more than a number—it was law.

The Nation can ill afford to lose such statesmen as PAT HARRISON.

Church Schools Closed in Nazi Territories

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH E. CASEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

Monday, June 30, 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Boston Daily Globe, of June 27, 1941:

[From the Boston Daily Globe of June 27, 1941]

CHURCH SCHOOLS CLOSED IN NAZI TERRITORIES—DISPATCH TO THE PILOT SAYS FAMOUS ABBEYS CONFISCATED

(From the Current Issue of The Pilot)

ZURICH, June 26.—The Nazi Government has directed harsh and oppressive measures against Catholic educational institutions in Germany, Austria, Sudetenland, and the Protectorate of Moravia and Bohemia, according to word reaching here from highly reliable sources.

Transformation of state Catholic elementary schools into nonsectarian schools has been widespread, and the suppression of private Catholic schools is almost complete. In all elementary schools religious instruction has been notably curtailed, and in the secondary schools there has been a general effort to replace religious instruction with lessons in the National Socialist doctrines. Crucifixes have been removed from the schools, and every means has been employed to keep members of the clergy away from the institutions.

Using the war as a pretext, Nazi officials have closed many major and minor seminaries. Numerous Catholic colleges and academies have been subjected to the same treatment. In some instances, where the colleges and academies were not closed by direct action, they were subjected to uses and placed in conditions so incompatible with the principles of Christian education that the school authorities themselves could do nothing but discontinue classes.

World-famous abbeys and a very large number of religious institutions—both the monasteries of priests and the convents of sisters—have been confiscated, together with all their appurtenances. The communities of religious men and of religious women were dispersed.

In Bavaria and Austria, the Nazis have abolished the financial obligations which the state and local authorities had to the Catholic Church. They have also seized religious properties, including funds, lands, and buildings.

Over and above all these repressive measures on the part of officials themselves ecclesiastical properties have been subjected to acts of vandalism without the authorities making any attempt to apprehend or to punish the guilty parties. In the press and in virtually every organ of publicity, grave insults are leveled against religion, against the person of the Sovereign Pontiff himself, against the Catholic Church in general, and the Catholic clergy in particular, without an opportunity being given to Catholics to defend themselves.

Even religious services are arbitrarily curtailed. The pastoral letters of bishops to their flocks, and even papal documents, are forbidden to be disseminated. There have been instances of the arrests of priests.

Subversive Influences in Labor Organizations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN S. GIBSON

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, the introduction of H. R. 5148 and H. R. 5149, which, in truth and fact, are one and the same bill, or contain the same substance, inspires me to make certain utterances.

I have said before, and will repeat that Hitler is the greatest immediate threat to American democracy; he has pushed himself forward as the potential conqueror of the world. I have further said and will repeat that the most definite threat our democracy is, and has been subjected to, is the forces of communism and fascism that have been boring and gnawing into our body politic like poisonous worms. Hitler stands up before us a disclosed enemy, and these other forces crawl and roll around amongst us as serpents trying to stay within our confidence until they have eaten the sinews from the body of our national life.

These forces are directed and sponsored, one by Hitler and his lieutenants and the other by the highlights of the Communists. They have for years worked hand in hand in our midst, seeking a common cause, each assuming that when they got us ready for the knockout blow, their country would prevail in the Old World and take us over. They have constituted such a harmonious team through the last several months until it has been very noticeable. They have worked hand in hand with Charles A.

Lindbergh and John L. Lewis, who seem to have established themselves as the most outstanding proponents of the two "isms" we are now called upon to deal with.

They have been, and by necessity must be, very shrewd and cunning, for they must fly under false colors to be at all effective. Unfortunately, they have chosen labor organizations as the medium through which to do their destructive work. I have warned my people of John L. Lewis for years and of Charles A. Lindbergh long before I entered the National Congress.

The bill I referred to in the beginning of these remarks, in my opinion, embraces some of the most far-reaching and important legislation that has ever been before this body. I feel there is no legislation we could pass that will bespeak more protection to the future of our democracy than is provided by this bill. In substance it provides:

First. That to hold office in a labor organization one must be a citizen of the United States.

Second. That such officeholder must have actually engaged in the trade represented by such organization for at least 3 years.

Third. That any officer handling the funds of such organization must be adequately bonded.

Fourth. That such organization shall render to each member an annual financial statement of the organization.

Fifth. That such organization shall submit to arbitration without stoppage of work jurisdictional and representation disputes.

Sixth. That the charter and bylaws of such organization shall bind its members to postpone strikes in any labor dispute for at least 60 days upon securing agreement that settlement of such disputes will be retroactive.

There is no man who is fair to labor and our Government that can oppose these provisions. The Railroad Yardmasters of North America, Inc., recently in convention assembled passed a resolution embracing the provisions of this act. It comes from the bosom of labor, an organization that is truly American and sincerely endeavoring to promote the best interest of American workmen and not sow seeds of discontent among a class to promote savage ideals of any foreign dictatorship.

Let us analyze the merits and prospective effect of this act.

Subsection 1 bars aliens from holding office in the organization. If this had been done in the past most of the gangsters would have been eliminated from labor—for one example, Harry Bridges. Labor would have been spared many deserving criticisms which have been thrust against it on account of acts of a foreigner who was at the head of the organization. This is the type of leadership that has exploited labor and made it possible for ex-bootleggers and ex-convicts to build and maintain large and expensive estates at the expense of honest American workmen whose wives and babies were, in many instances, living in shacks, with improper food.

Subsection 2 provides that to lead an organization one must be experienced in that special trade, which insures a leadership of understanding of both the problems of labor and management. I have always contended that there was not much harm in a man who was willing to work and who did work. This clause would prevent gangsters and racketeers who have no interest in the workingman obtaining control of the organization and through selfish exploitation enriching themselves at the expense of labor. This type of leadership seeks confusion between labor and management to further its own cause and to impress those whom it represents or its usefulness to them.

Subsections C and D go directly to the protection of the masses of the organization and need no comment for the value of their provisions to be at once recognized. Please be assured that no honest man minds to be bonded and to account for his handling of any funds entrusted to him. Furthermore, the bond requirement would itself prevent racketeers and those of questionable character from seeping into control. When application is made for bond, the company from whom the bond is sought will go fully into the record of such applicant and through this medium his record is disclosed. In fact, the bonding company would constitute a detective bureau for the membership of the various organizations.

Subsections E and F plainly by their own language justify themselves. When strikes over jurisdictional and representation disputes are controlled one of the greatest weapons of the racketeers at the head of labor organization is destroyed. No one can oppose the 60-day postponement as written in this bill, its retroactive provision fully safeguards the rights of those concerned.

I feel honored to know that I was one of the first to confer with the representative of the Railroad Yardmasters of North America, Inc., with regard to the advisability of sponsoring the referred-to bill I worked with the railroad 7 years with the various crafts and have throughout my life been associated closely with officers and members of labor organizations; but I thank God that they were organizations that were not only led by, but the membership of which was made up of, true, patriotic American citizens. I think I can safely say that the American workingman, when not beguiled by the poisonous elements hereinbefore referred to, represents as true a patriot as America has. I see as much danger to the rights of labor coming from these subversive sources as I do for our cherished democracy. They would have you believe that they are masquerading in labor colors and are labor's friends. Through this disclosure it can clearly be seen that they are representing other forms of government and not ours. I only ask the workingman of America, who cherishes his fireside and receives joy from the gleam radiating from the tender eyes of his babe, to reflect for a moment and consider what the workingman gets in Russia and Germany. This will answer the question of what labor will be subjected to if we do not stop the monstrosity of this well-planned and direct attack on our system of government.

The conduct of one wing of those who are desperately trying to uproot our Government, in recent months has been amusing. John L. Lewis has exerted every effort to break down our program of national defense. A bunch of foreign-born whose loyalty to communism cannot be questioned has disgraced the dignity of our White House by patroling it 24 hours daily with placards designed to establish their loyalty to America, when they knew their sole purpose was to destroy what our forefathers have wrought through the years, and take from your babes and mine the privilege of living in a free land. One hour before we had notice of Hitler's march on Stalin they abruptly withdrew and vanished to destinations unknown and now from every side we hear what great Statesmanship the lend-lease bill bespeaks. Within a few hours Lewis requests the coal miners not to strike as it would greatly impair defense preparedness. When they thought Hitler and Stalin were breathing together they cooed together as love birds when they were then by deceitful means pushing their venom into the vitals of our democracy. The minute they saw their standard of government attacked they become very strong for aid to the Allies and quickly come to the parting of the ways with Lindbergh's so-called America First Committee. We will be simple recipients of the blessings of a free land if we cannot see through the light of their "right-about face," their true colors. We will be unworthy soldiers of the great cause if we do not awake and enact laws that will forever bar their nefarious attempts to bore into the heart of our beloved democracy and force them to at least obey the rules of patriotism to and respect of our Government. This bill is a long step in this direction, and I hope it will have the full support of the membership of this great body.

In the face of the seriousness of the matter I find humor in the thought of what Lindbergh is going to do for an audience now to scream and holler for him when he is trying to build Nazi sentiment throughout our land. A great portion of his audiences in the past have been of communistic sentiment, and, true to form, they will drop him like a hot brick since Hitler and Stalin have thrown their military forces against each other. He will have his Fascist left, however, and will at least feel a little more at home in their company.

Will the people of America refuse to mark Lewis and Lindbergh and their ilk by the unquestionable exposure of their kind and purpose? I am confident not.

In conclusion, I want to appeal to the patriotic, peace-loving people of the United States to become awake to this great threat and appeal to their Representatives in Congress to support this measure. They are your only means through which you can speak your sentiments; ask them to help in this great forward movement to rid ourselves of the poison that seeks to drive freedom from our land. When liberty and freedom have perished from the earth you will be a slave without right of an opinion, to say nothing of expressing it. Let me ask you to act while the Stars and Stripes yet float triumphantly in free air over a free land.

Wire-Tapping Evidence

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. WILLIAM DITTER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, the present bill brings squarely before us the doctrine that the end justifies the means. I have always considered that doctrine a most dangerous one. It is the doctrine upon which vast delegations of authority to the executive branch of the Government have been predicated. It is the doctrine which has provided the excuse for repeated encroachments on constitutional limitations and restraints. It is the doctrine which has encouraged those who delight in ridiculing a regard for the rights of the citizen as their ambitious program of the supremacy of the state has whittled away at the sovereignty of the citizen. I repeat, the doctrine that the end justifies the means is a dangerous philosophy to adopt by those who cherish the rights of freemen.

I have listened attentively to the debate on this measure. I have sensed an apologetic approach by the proponents, tantamount to an excuse that they are found as supporters of the bill. It is evident that they themselves are apprehensive of the probable consequences which are invited by this legislation. They appear to realize only too well that the extraordinary means which they are advocating would under no circumstances be tenable were it not for the ends which they seek.

But even this dangerous justification has no practical basis upon which it can be rested. We have heard much of wire tapping today for the purpose of discovering espionage and sabotage. The fact of the matter is, this practice, which has been resorted to in many instances for the purpose of persecution rather than prosecution, is not barred at this time. Is it reasonable to suppose that any extended efforts by spies or saboteurs or even the most amateurish attempts by enemies of our Government would be carried on with a complete disregard of the means now available for their detection? Suspicious individuals can be brought under surveillance by the methods now at hand—and every opportunity is open to Government agents to secure factual evidence thereafter which would be admissible in a court of law.

The purpose of this bill is to open the door for the admission of evidence which would otherwise be barred from the consideration of a jury. Were we at war such procedure might be considered as a necessity. But, let it be remembered, we are still at peace. That which might be justified as a war measure cannot be justified as necessary by those who insist that the decision of peace or war must be determined by the Congress. We have taken no such action. Until that momentous issue comes before this body for debate and ultimate decision, a war measure such as we are now considering has no place.

I need not dwell at length on the possible abuses to which this legislation would open the door. My fear is that it is only a beginning. So much can easily follow in its wake. One step can so easily follow another. As the rights of the sovereign superstate becomes the more powerful by the enactment of legislation of the character now before us, the safeguards and protection afforded by established rules of procedure and by rights long recognized as essential are weakened and impaired. We have already traveled into dangerous territory by the inroads which have been made on the rights of the citizen. To approve and support, without justification and needlessly, another step in the same direction is a hazard which I cannot endorse. To me the sovereignty of the citizen is a possession which I am challenged to defend.

Some reference has been made to the endorsement of Mr. J. Edgar Hoover. I have studied carefully that endorsement. I fail to find in it the enthusiastic endorsement which I am convinced would have been forthcoming from the distinguished Director of the F. B. I. had he really felt the bill was necessary for the detection or prosecution of criminals. At best, the statement seemed to me to be a weak-hearted effort—more in the nature of a lukewarm approval than anything else.

The temptation in times such as these, Mr. Speaker, is to indulge in excesses. Restraints are easily set aside under the plea of urgency and emergency. Cool, deliberative processes are threatened by the passions of the moment. A government of men is advocated as a necessity by the exigencies of the moment. With this pressure present, an even greater duty than usual devolves upon us to consider cautiously suggestions as now appear before us. As I see it, Mr. Speaker, our duty demands a regard for principles which have afforded protection to free men against the invasion of totalitarian methods, and the compelling commands of all-powerful forces of Government. I am persuaded, to use the words of Justice Brandeis, that—

> In a government of laws, existence of the government will be imperiled if it fails to observe the law scrupulously. * * * To declare that in the administration of the criminal law the end justifies the means—to declare that the government may commit crimes in order to secure the conviction of a private criminal—would bring terrible retribution. Against that pernicious doctrine, this Court should resolutely set its face.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I refer to the warning sounded by the brilliant and distinguished jurist to whom I have referred, when he said:

> The greatest dangers to liberty lurk in insidious encroachment by men of zeal, well-meaning, but without understanding. As for myself, I shall oppose at all times the insidious encroachments which may endanger liberty.

Dentistry and Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. HENRY O. TALLE
OF IOWA

EDITORIAL BY DR. PAUL H. BELDING, OF WAUCOMA, IOWA

Mr. TALLE. Mr. Speaker, one of my constituents, Dr. Paul H. Belding, of Waucoma, Iowa, has furnished me considerable material dealing with the dental status of the American people. He points out in the monthly journal, entitled "Dental Items of Interest," of which he is the editor, that dental defects and diseases are a complicating factor in the national-defense program and that the physical well-being of our people is in jeopardy. The following is an extract from one of his editorials under the head of Dentistry's Status Must Change, which appeared in the issue for June 1941:

> The editorial, "Preparing for Eventualities," which appeared in the January issue of this publication presented statistics which revealed that 23 percent of the total rejections for military service from the Southern New York District of the Second Corps Area was due to dental defects.
> This editorial drew considerable comment, and there was a consensus that as the population group referred to was small and essentially limited to individuals from congested industrial areas the figures could not possibly be representative of the dental status of the potential national soldiery.
> It is, therefore, of interest to note that recent figures of a more representative nature not only substantiate the preliminary observations but also indicate that if there was any error, actual conditions were minimized rather than exaggerated.
>
> At the present time reports are coming in from widely separated geographic areas, and there is a relative constancy in the number of rejections due to dental defects. For example, the Selective Service Board of the State of Iowa recently reported that 27 percent of their total rejections was due to dental diseases, and a report dated March 7 from the director of the New York selective service indictates that up to the date of the release of the information 23 percent of the total rejections for military service was due to dental defects.
> It should be understood that the rejection percentages as released apply exclusively to the local oral conditions produced by dental diseases. It is true that these percentages are appallingly high; however, they are in no sense indicative of the actual number of rejections that can in all probability be attributed to these diseases in their totality.
> Due to the many intangible factors associated with dental pathosis, it would be hazardous to attempt to state in numbers, the total rejections that might be basically due to dental diseases. However, the opinion that disabling remote disease may be secondary to dental pathosis and would add considerably to the totality of dental disease, is supported by the opinion of many eminent authorities. For example, Charles Mayo stated: "The future of medical science rests with the dentist who can stop or kill the germs as they develop in the mouth.

* * * In America there has recently been a tremendous increase in heart disease and infections, and post mortem examinations seemed to show that much of this was fundamentally due to the teeth."

Dr. Edward C. Rosenow states: "It has been proven through innumerable experiments that various toxins or poisons originate in hidden abscesses around the roots of nerveless teeth, and find their way into various parts of the body, attacking the nerves or blood and causing long illnesses and even death attributed to other things." Too often, doctors (physicians) lay the death to heart disease and forget the teeth.

Sir William Osler, perhaps the greatest physician of the twentieth century stated: "The problem of mouth hygiene and the care of the teeth is the most important of any public-health measure. Most of the diseases which cause death in middle life are developed from conditions which begin in childhood, and the neglect of the mouth and the teeth is responsible for more loss of life than that of the use of alcohol in all its forms. * * * There is not a single thing in preventive medicine that equals mouth hygiene and the preservation of the teeth."

Dr. Weston A. Price, an American dentist, who incidentally is recognized by the Pickett-Thomson Research Laboratory of England as being one of the world's great scientists, has for years consistently emphasized that dental disease could not be divorced from general health.

The Declaration of Independence and the Republican Form of Government

HON. KARL STEFAN

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address by Mr. William Tyler Page and the introduction thereto at a home-defense program, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Department of Virginia, over station WWDC, June 29:

Mr. BURTON. I do not feel capable of introducing the next speaker. He has started each one of our programs by proxy with his composition that I am sure everyone is familiar with, The American's Creed. Mr. Page came to Washington 59 years ago and has been a servant of the people in the House of Representatives ever since. Mr. Page entered into competition with more than 3,000 contestants during the World War to write in 100 words the best summary of the political faith of America, and his The American's Creed won the prize of $1,000 offered by the city of Baltimore, the birthplace of the Star-Spangled Banner. Mr. Page bought liberty bonds from Charlie Chaplin, Mary Pickford, Douglas Fairbanks, and Marie Dressler with his prize money. I could talk about Mr. Page for an hour and not even begin to tell you of his many accomplishments. If you enjoy Mr. Page's talk call the studio and let him know that you do; I am sure he will appreciate that compliment. Ladies and gentlemen, may I present a real American, the Honorable William Tyler Page, minority clerk of the United States House of Representatives.

Mr. PAGE. Fellow Americans, happy am I and privileged to speak here tonight under the auspices of that patriotic organization of Americans, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Department of Virginia.

These men went overseas to save the Republic of the United States for the world. I repeat, to save this Republic. The one truly representative system of government on earth, representative of the majesty of the people. These veterans did their honorable part to preserve civilization and to make this Republic the only safe place in all the world whereon the dove of peace might find a resting place—a home.

They were willing to make, as many did make, the supreme sacrifice for the safety, the honor, and the perpetuity of the American Republic. They were the embodiment of democratic nobility, the living emblems of American genius.

They sought neither fame nor renown, but only their country's justification and to uphold its honestly acquired rights upon the high seas.

Such has been the idealism of all of our soldiers and sailors, worthy of the best traditions and valor, the world over and in all time. It was an idealism that recognized a Supreme Being, that planted religious liberty on our shores, that overthrew despotism, that established a people's government, that wrote a Constitution setting metes and bounds of delegated authority, that fixed a standard of value upon men above gold, and that lifted high the torch of civil liberty along the pathway of mankind.

Tonight I am especially pleased to be the guest of the Department of Virginia, Veterans of Foreign Wars. My forebears were Virginians, and I am justly proud of the part they took in the Colonial and constitutional history of our country. One was a signer of the Declaration of Independence, one a Governor of the Old Dominion, others were members of the House of Burgesses, of the Continental Congress, and of the Virginia Legislature, and contemporaries of Patrick Henry and of Richard Henry Lee.

In a few days we shall celebrate Independence Day, the one hundred and sixty-fifth anniversary of the immortal Declaration of Independence. Well might we exclaim on that day: "This is the day which the Lord has made; we will rejoice and be glad in it." For under the favor of God was the beginning of American history, in every crisis of which His oversight is indelibly impressed.

American independence was long in coming. Preparation for it was by slow processes. It had a long prolog. One event after another led to it inevitably. Tyranny could not hold sway over a liberty-loving people always. The American Colonies waited long and patiently. At long last independence was declared on July 2, 1776, by the resolution of Richard Henry Lee, followed by the form of Declaration on July 4, and a new nation was born. God set this event in a mighty framework of preparation.

Yonder historic river flowing by the seat of government on its way to the sea had its origin in the little hidden springs far up in the hills, and as its waters break upon the uncomplaining ocean shore the force that drives the mighty wave may have received its momentum in some cataclysmic eruption thousands of miles away. The shocks of newly cut wheat must lie in the sunshine and the rain for a long time before it ripens into golden grain for the use of man.

The little colony at Jamestown had implicit faith. Doubtless, some of them were descendants of the Barons of Runnymede, in whose breasts burned the unquenchable fires of liberty. "Doubt not," they wrote, "God will raise our state and build His church in this excellent clime."

It was this far-sighted group of people who, over 300 years ago, declared that it was their purpose "to erect a free popular state" in the New World, whose people were to have "no government putt upon them but by their own consente."

This doctrine, then originally laid down by the English founders of Virginia, the first Colony, was restated in the Declaration of Independence 169 years later, or 165 years ago, the anniversary of which we will observe next Friday.

"For more than a year Richard Henry Lee had openly advocated a declaration of independence." And, doubtless inspired by him "the Virginia convention of May 17, 1776, acting upon this line, instructed its delegation in Congress to move for absolute independence."

Lee was in Williamsburg at that time, where, he said in a letter to John Adams "the exultation here was extreme."

In pursuance of these instructions Mr. Lee brought forward on June 7, 1776, the following resolution:

"Resolved, That these united colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British Crown and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved."

It was the opinion of the members that he who first moved for independence would certainly be exposed to personal and immediate danger. John Adams seconded the resolution but neither his name nor that of Richard Henry Lee appeared in the Journal, the entry which was simply "certain resolutions respecting independence being moved and seconded," etc., indicating that the action was considered as one of fearful hazard and awful responsibility. Lee's resolution was referred to a committee, and debates followed from June 7 to July 2, on which latter date Lee's resolution was agreed to by a large majority, "and the adoption of the form of declaration on the 4th of July was a secondary matter."

Lee's resolution "was really the vital point, the crucial juncture."

It has always been a cause of wonderment to me why we celebrate July 4, the date of the Declaration instead of July 2, the date on which Congress actually agreed to Lee's resolution and declared then and there the independence of the Colonies. But custom has so decreed.

Tradition has it that Lee supported his own resolution in an eloquent speech, which he concluded in these prophetic words:

"If we are not thus wanting in our duty to our country the names of the American legislators of '76 will be placed by posterity at the side of Theseus, of Lycurgus, or Romulus, of Numa, of the three Williams of Nassau, and of all those whose memory has been, and forever will be, dear to virtuous men and good citizens." And they were so placed.

After presenting his resolution Lee, on June 10, left for home. It has been stated that he had learned of the dangerous illness of his wife. This may have been so, but it appears that while away he went to Williamsburg to assist in the creation of a new government for Virginia.

Had Lee remained in Philadelphia he, as author of the resolution for independence, undoubtedly would have written the Declaration for which he was preeminently qualified, but which honor fell to the lot of Thomas Jefferson as chairman of the committee.

Jefferson's draft was changed considerably from the original, a copy of which Jefferson sent to Richard Henry Lee with the remark, "You will judge whether it is the better or the worse for the critics." To which Lee very graciously replied, wishing "that the manuscript had not be mangled as it is"; "but," he added, "however, the thing is in its nature so good, that no cookery can spoil the dish for the palates of freemen."

Thus the vision of the first colony at Jamestown was translated into reality, that "a free State" whose people were to have no government "putt upon them but by their own consente" was consummated after long travail and self sacrifice in the cause of liberty.

Victory at Yorktown was followed by an attempt to establish a stable government, but the Articles of Confederation were as a rope of sand and proved inadequate. Then, in order to form a more perfect Union, wise and illustrious men designed the Constitution of the United States therein establishing the American Republic, a standard or pattern form of government.

The young Republic then began to make material progress unparalleled in history. It solved problems, secured fundamental privileges, stood the strain of a great civil war, and advanced step by step, stage by stage, "from the wooden spade to the steam plow, from the oxcart to the freight train, from the blacksmith shop to the manufacturing plant, from the flail to the steam thresher, from the cradle to the self-binder, from the needle to the sewing machine, from the spinning wheel to the great textile mills, from the stage coach to the Pullman palace car, from the messenger on foot or horse to the telephone and telegraph, from the prairie schooner to the automobile and the airplane."

This and much more was accomplished within the pale of the Constitution which created the best form of government mankind ever knew. The people had constitutional morality. This truly became a land of the free and we could rightfully exclaim:

This land of the free is for thee and for me,
Live in it, love in it, work in it, weep in it,
Laugh in it, sing in it, die in it, sleep in it;
For it's for thee and for me
The fairest and rarest that man ever trod,
The dearest and sweetest 'twist the sky and the sod,
And it's thine and it's mine, thank God.

This Republic then had character. It had a soul. For what would we exchange it? For communism, for fascism, for nazi-ism, for socialism? What could this Nation get that is better in exchange for its own soul? In exchange for its constitutional system, in exchange for its freedom, in exchange for our starry flag? Let those answer who are dissatisfied.

Let me ask:

Is this still the Republic our forefathers bequeathed to us under which this Nation developed and prospered for 150 years?

It is said that Benjamin Franklin was with a European friend when the news of the ratification of the Constitution reached him. "Is it a monarchy or a republic?" his visitor eagerly inquired. "A republic—if we can keep it," was Franklin's prompt rejoinder.

Yes. If we can keep it. That is the question. And it becomes the duty of every real American to see that it is kept. But in order to keep our republican form of government it is absolutely essential that we know why it was established and what it means and not confuse it with the radical ideologies of the Old World nor the socialistic tendencies within our own borders.

Men do not live apart from their fellow men. They live under some form of government. Governments are necessary. It is a question of what kind or form of government they choose to live under, whether of autocrats or a government of their own, through chosen representatives. We in America have the form of self-government. We make our own laws. Each of us is a part of the Government. To think of government as something apart from ourselves, as many well-meaning people do, is erroneous and dangerous.

Either we control ourselves or we are controlled by others. Public opinion is a great power. Intelligent use of the ballot and respect for the law make for righteous freedom and the general welfare.

First of all, the great discovery that the people might be protected from any danger to their liberties, from the legislature or the courts as well as from the Crown, even from that Federal Government they were going to create; second, the great principle of the separation of the powers of government, which first appears in the Virginia Bill of Rights of 1776, just 1 month before the Declaration of Independence; and again in the Massachusetts Constitution of 1780, in the famous words of the closing paragraph of their great bill of rights: "In the government of this Commonwealth the legislative department shall never exercise the executive and judicial powers, or either of them; the executive shall never exercise the legislative and judicial powers, or either of them; the judicial shall never exercise the legislative and executive powers, or either of them; to the end it may be a government of laws and not of men." These last 10 words, you remember, Daniel Webster said were the greatest words contained in any written constitutional document.

The one end and aim, therefore, of a constitution is to protect the people's rights, both the rights of the whole people, or any part of the people, or even of one man as against the people, in such cardinal rights as by our constitutions he is declared not to have given away; to protect them against either king or legislature. This is constitutional government. The object of republican government is to enforce the will of the majority; the object of constitutional government is to protect the rights of the minority; to guarantee to each and every man, to every class, the essential rights that he must never part with.

James Madison and Alexander Hamilton, leaders among the wise statesmen who, in the light of experiments and failures of the past to establish permanent popular government, knew the kind and form of government they desired to create in America, and they also knew the difference between an autocracy and a republic, and the difference between a pure democracy and a republic, and they succeeded in erecting a republic, and were jealous to call it a republic, in which, as Madison said, "The scheme of representation takes place."

Hamilton believed, with Madison, "that the political principles of the people of this country would endure nothing but republican government." And these two founding fathers and their compatriots were not only instrumental in creating a republican form of government for the Nation, but they also aided in guaranteeing in the Federal Constitution that form to each of the States of the Union. So that each of our States is a lesser republic, so to speak, and the republican form of each is guaranteed by all.

One of our statesmen over 100 years ago said: "A monarchy is a man-of-war, stanch, iron-ribbed, resistless under full sail, but a single hidden rock can bring her to the bottom. A republic is a raft hard to steer, your feet always wet, but nothing can sink her."

We can take courage, therefore, and face our problems unflinchingly, however bad the outlook, knowing that we are on a safe craft, even though it is uncomfortable, as we pass through the cross currents into which we may have drifted far from our course.

We have ever been in all our national life ready and in a strong position to extend all proper aid and encouragement to less fortunate peoples groping their way from the darkness of autocracy into the light of liberty. And in this work we can better engage as a national entity with all the vigor and powers of a self-reliant people, and exercise greater influence for good upon the world's affairs independently of other nations, whose speech, habits, and government are foreign to our own, than to kill the spirit of the American Republic, discard its glorious emblem, abrogate its Constitution, forget its holy traditions and be lost in the maelstrom of world politics.

In yonder shrine in the Library of Congress are deposited as in a safety deposit box our securities, the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution, the visible evidence of the faith of our fathers, security against tyranny, security of persons and property, security of our natural rights, and a reminder of our responsibilities.

Every real American is a receptacle of the faith of our fathers. In us, as in a safety deposit box, are those securities.

Let us, therefore, be true to the sacred trust and resolve to "keep the securities of the faith intact." Then, in all sincerity we can say—

"I believe in the United States of America as a Government of the people, by the people, for the people; whose just powers are derived from the consent of the governed; a democracy in a republic, a sovereign Nation of many sovereign States; a perfect Union, one and inseparable; established upon those principles of freedom, equality, justice, and humanity for which American patriots sacrificed their lives and fortunes. I therefore believe it is my duty to my country to love it, to support its Constitution, to obey its laws, to respect its flag, and to defend it against all enemies."

Lest We Forget—Why Aid Russia?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED BRADLEY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, when the European war began I counseled that we should be very careful of what we said and did officially. I counseled we should remember the advice of Washington to avoid all foreign entanglements and to avoid favoring any one nation as opposed to the others. At the same time, realizing that aggression was rampant in the world, I advised that we should so strengthen our own defenses as to make us invincible against aggression from whatever source. Do you not think that advice was sound in view of recent developments in Europe?

The first thing we did was to lift the arms embargo in order that legally we could drain our own meager reserves of arms, ammunition, and aircraft and give them to the "democracies" of Great Britain, France, China, Finland, Greece, Belgium, Holland, Norway, and so forth. Also, we opened our purse strings to all those nations, who were then friends of Britain and hence our friends, and who were resisting invasion by the aggressor dictator nations of Germany, Italy, Japan, and Russia. Furthermore, our official spokesmen heaped words of abuse on the dictator aggressor nations and words of praise on our friends, the "democracies."

Today the picture has changed completely. The Low Countries have been conquered and forced into complete submission by the Nazis, yet American food for these conquered "democracies" is denied by Great Britain primarily because the English common people have great faith in the blockade as a measure of bringing Germany to her knees and hence official England will not permit any breach in the blockade. Furthermore, Britain feels it is up to the conqueror, Hitler, to feed these peoples, realizing that every trainload of food he furnishes creates that much additional strain on the German economic system.

Greece has been knocked out because she relied too much on promises of aid made to her by Britain and the United States which they could not fulfill; and knew they could not fulfill in time.

France has been knocked out because she placed too much reliance on a 1918 mass ground army equipped with rifles and bayonets behind antiquated stationary fortifications and without an adequate air force which could withstand the assaults of Germany's modern mechanized mobile army supported by a strong air force. Some feel that we are committing the same folly in our own preparedness today.

However, France is now forced to resist aggression in Syria and Africa by the democracy of Britain and, therefore, has now alined herself with Hitler and perchance may be using some of our own American-made airplanes which we rushed to her aid long ago—despite the fact that she had not paid her last World War debts and had no intentions of so doing.

Then our hearts bled for brave little Finland in her valiant stand against the overwhelming hordes of atheistic, dictator, communistic Russia. We rushed her a few airplanes, considerable money, and far more promises of additional aid, which we knew we could not fulfill in time. Today, Finland is again defending herself against being ruthlessly bombed and invaded by communistic Russia; but, today, Russia has been accepted as a friend by England and, therefore, accepted officially as a friend of ours. And so, now, possibly some of those American-made airplanes are being turned against our own friends, though Finland is now alined with Hitler.. Shall we now regard honest, debt-paying Finland as our enemy and order her consulates closed in this country? Shall we now furnish Russia with planes to bomb Finland?

Lest we forget: Over two and one-quarter million Christians have been slaughtered in atheistic Communist Russia. Has she now become Christianized?

Lest we forget: For more than 20 years the openly announced program of the American Communist Party, operating under orders and supplied with funds from Moscow, has been to bring about dissatisfaction, chaos, and eventually revolution in this country. Does the party now take the oath of allegiance to our flag, our principles, our cherished traditions? To my mind, the only essential difference between Hitler and Stalin is that Hitler is the more efficient.

Lest we forget, it was Stalin's economic alliance with Hitler in 1939 that encouraged Hitler to begin hostilities. Since then the Dies committee has uncovered countless reams of evidence to prove that many of the strikes in our defense industries have been started by Communists designed to stifle our own defense program and delay aid to Britain.

Now the tables have turned. The hungry wolves of dictatorship and aggression have fallen upon each other and the shaggy Russian bear has been greeted by Winston Churchill as an open ally. Churchill has promised that Britain and ourselves will give all possible aid to Russia. Our President and the Congress have refused to invoke the Neutrality Act, which would prohibit our shipments of war materials to either of these two dictator nations—Germany and Russia. I want to leave these questions with you: Has Russia overnight suddenly become a democracy in which Mr. Roosevelt's "four freedoms" prevail? Have we suddenly determined upon a policy that the only difference between the Nazis and Communists in America is that the Communists may now work for the Government and hold key positions in our defense industries? Are we now to hail each other as "comrade"? Are we now to take the Communist, who yesterday would bring about the overthrow of this country, and pull him to our bosom as a friend?

But, after all, supposing the administration is sincere in its promises to aid Russia, just what is it going to give her and just how is it going to get it to her in time to do any good? Why mislead the Russians as we did those in the Low Countries—in Yugoslavia, in Greece? After all, is not honesty still the best policy?

Personally, I think our best policy in the future should be to "keep our powder dry and our mouths shut and, in addition, let us make a lot more powder."

Daylight Saving

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

LETTER FROM HON. HAROLD L. ICKES, SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter received by me from the Secretary of the Interior:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, June 27, 1941.

Hon. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MRS. ROGERS: In response to your inquiry over the telephone, I have no hesitation in saying that I am in favor of daylight saving on a national scale. In fact, I have expressed myself to this effect on several occasions recently, particularly since it became apparent that we not only had a present shortage of electric power but that this shortage would increase as time passed.
